Few, if any, of the masters of the shipping at our wharves exhibit the keen sense of the value of time thus claimed for them, except our steamships, and a part of our West India traders. The cleanliness and order so generally observed on steamships, the rapidity of their transits, the shortness and other circumstances of their stay in port, and the quality of their passengers, render them less obnoxious to the restraints of Quarantine than other descriptions of sea-going vessels. And these considerations, taken in connection with the great expense of keeping such vessels, whether running or idle, render every indulgence to them, compatible with a due regard for public safety, proper and expedient. And we hope the Board of Health will find it consistent with its duties to detain this class of vessels only so long as will secure the great objects it has in view. It is only during the summer months that the little trade we maintain with West India and other intertropical ports, will be subjected to the restraints of our Quarantine. But once the system is established, this branch of our commerce will be accommodated to these restraints, which thereafter will be no more thought of as a subject of complaint, than would be a succession of head winds that prolonged a passage equal to the period of detention.

But, we find this article growing so long that we are compelled to clip the thread of our discourse until to-morrow.

[New Orleans Daily Crescent.

Quarantine on the Mississippi.

We resume our remarks on yesterday's interesting topic:

The revenue law of February 25, 1799, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in respect to Quarantine, and to vessels subjected thereto, to prolong the time allowed for the entry of such vessels and their cargoes, and to vary or dispense with any other regulation, even to the entry and discharge of cargo of a vessel at Quarantine, and their loading and clearance [illegible] there. Such arrangements will very probably be made by the Board of Health with the Treasury Department, as will enable vessels destined at our Quarantine to enter or clear at our Custom-House, and to unload or take in cargo there, in the same manner as if at our wharves.

Any one who will consider for a moment the nature of that trade which forms the great feature in our business—that of the West and South-West—must at once arrive at the conclusion that every measure calculated to [illegible] it should be adopted. And if the detention at the Quarantine for a few days, of vessels from [illegible] with a deadly infection, is necessary, not only to prevent a suspension of this great trade, but to avert a loss of life under the most harrowing circumstances, of from 3,000 to 13,000 a year, who can justify himself in maintaining the impropriety of such detention? The [illegible] ments, national, State and municipal, of the country, are all administered with the view of securing the greatest good to the greatest number; but these writers seem to have forgotten for the time a principle so salutary, to the moral recognition of which, we are chiefly indebted for our national greatness. In their solicitude for what they erroneously regard as the [illegible] interests of an incosiderable part of our foreign trade, they seem to have ignored the existence of our city and its 150,000 inhabitants.

Commerce we regard as the leading [illegible] of our national greatness; but one of its characteristics is, to push on its vocation, regardless of all other considerations but that of making money. Human liberty equally with human life, and all other considerations, must yield to the advancing car of commerce. This "King," whom we—stern Republicans, we are—all bow down to and worship.

But as the people of this city and State use the means of preserving themselves from dangers in question, we do not anticipate that hereafter they will be enjoined into a [illegible] ment of those means deemed necessary to preserve their lives, to secure their health, or re-establish their city on the road of [illegible].

The writers in question, as well as others, believe the theories on which Quarantine is founded, and consider them vexatious and [illegible] morce without securing the public from infection from abroad. They believe—especially in relation to yellow fever—that the danger would be entirely avoided if we adopted and enforced an ordinance having for its object the cleansing of the streets and gutters, and the better [illegible] private premises free from filth. Now, we, thus believing, there never has been a more [illegible] rected attempt made in this city to carry into salutary measures into effect. If they are correct in thus believing, why do they not put these sanitary measures into effect? Until we do, the public will be justified in thinking that they have no faith in their own theories, that, in their extreme solicitude for what they most erroneously regard as the interests of commerce, they are willing to deceive the people of this city, divert their attention from the only measures of safety and suffer them to be sacrificed for the maintenance of notions equally fish, erroneous and inconsiderate.

For several years, the free and unrestricted introduction into our city, from abroad, of yellow fever, cholera, small-pox, and the [illegible] of other deadly and infectious diseases to which mankind are subject, has resulted in increasing our chances of dying from [illegible] tious a greater than those of dying in the ordinary course of nature. Hardly a season passes without leaving behind it sad memorials of the deadly career of one or the other of these pestilences. Our situation has been not unlike that of a besieged town, the inhabitants of which do not know the moment when the fire of the besiegers would hurl them into eternity. This is readily perceived when we look at the facts. We understand that in the spring of last year upwards of twenty persons, all suffering with the small-pox, were landed from one vessel at our wharves, and sent to the hospital! Every spring and fall the typhus fever comes, with the shipping arriving at those seasons; and the hospitals and the boarding-houses, with their deadly infection abroad. And so it is with cholera, and other diseases of a foreign origin. All this must be remedied. The first step has been taken towards the establishment of a institution which will save us from such horrors. We do not believe that the people of this city and State will allow this praiseworthy undertaking to be cried down, or suffer themselves to be any longer the victims of error or [illegible].

THE OPELOUSAS RAILROAD

This great work is progressing rapidly and cheeringly. The present management, the head of an able and efficient President, has done wonders—have surpassed the most sanguine expectations of the most sanguine friends of promise—substantial indications of future prosperity—are plentiful on every line. A new life has been infused into every department, and works follow calculations more rapidly than could be reasonably expected, under the circumstances.

From the tenor of the following article, which we take from that excellent and sterling paper, the Thibodaux Minerva of last Saturday, it is clear that a great desideratum will be accomplished by next fall—namely, a railroad connection between Algiers and Berwick's Bay, Tigerville at all events, which will be equivalent to it—in time to take off from the most fertile sections of Louisiana, will not only be a great public convenience, but will add immensely to the revenues of the company, and amplify its resources and extend it. The Minerva says:

The grading on that section of this road lying between the Terrebonne and Tigerville has been completed. The process of placing the cross-ties and laying the rails is now being pushed forward with the greatest vigor, and it is now positively certain that the road will be in successful operation from Algiers to Tigerville, a distance of about sixty-one miles, by the first day of November next, or before.

The embankment through the Chacahoula and Lafourche Swamps average about five feet in height by twenty feet in width, done in the most substantial manner. The minimum cost that has even surprised the Chief Engineer and Board of Directors. The contract was taken by Cade & Baker to take the contract of completing that portion of the road leading to Berwicks Bay, for the sum of $1,000 per mile, saving to the company of over one hundred and fifty thousand dollars—an small, or insignificant item.

We are just informed by Mr. M. H. Sullivan, one of the most energetic and persevering foremen, who has been attached to the company through good and evil report from the commencement of this grand enterprise, that the entire section of the road lying between Tigerville and Berwick's Bay has been put under way, and a large number of hands under the direction of the Chief Engineer are now actively employed in grading the Bayou Boeuf Swamp, and which is to be completed at an early day. It is indeed gratifying to the friends of the road to note the great progress that has attended every department since the present management has fallen into the hands of the present officers of the Company. We would warn our Tigerville friends to prepare themselves for a visit from the iron horse on the first of November next. Bring out your big [illegible] villians.

By Rev. H. N. McTyeire, June 16, Mr. F. PERIN to Miss MARY Y. PORTER, all of New Orleans.

Deaths.

In Shelby county, Ala., on the 28th ult., Mrs. SARAH J. WEST, in the 24th year of her age.

She is dead! The fond sister, the affectionate wife, and the loved mother! She has passed through the "valley and shadow" to "that bourne whence no traveler returns." Young and beautiful, in the bloom of life, she has flown to the spirit land. Ere time had planted a single furrow on the smooth brow or dimmed the light of her mild eye, "the silver cord was loosed and the golden bowl broken." She was a professor of religion and a member of the Methodist Church. One more of the young and promising ones has been called from the great temple of Methodism on earth to the Temple of God—the "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." A sister band awaited her on the bright shores of Canaan, where, perchance, even now she is wandering with them "though green pastures" and "beside still waters." Those are left behind who miss the sunlight of her dear eyes and the music of her sweet voice, yet to them hope sings a cheerful song of comfort; it tells them that though the once beauteous casket is mouldering in the grave, yet the jewel, still brighter, is beaming softly in the skies. She has but added another link that binds their spirits to Heaven. And although the "pale rider" came when none felt the shadow of his presence, yet the summons found her ready, and with the cygnet ring of Heaven on her pale lips she fell asleep on his breast. But her awakening was in a "brighter morn than ours."

C.

GEORGE BURGESS HOLGOOD, son of Henry and Mary Holgood, died of scarlet fever on the 8th inst., aged nearly six years.

George was a handsome and manly little fellow, of very attractive person and manners. In him his parents had freighted many fond hopes, now all safely stored in the haven of Heaven. The parents have been called, in the providence of God, to drink often and deeply of this bitter cup. But their faith in God has never faltered. They have large treasures in Heaven. Six children call them from above: "Come this way father, this way mother." In this "looking up" there is "lifting up." J. W. B.

Bayou Tunica, La.

DIED—June 7, 1855, in Fayette county, Ala., CYNTHIA ANN BENNETT, aged fourteen years. Cynthia had been a member of the Church near two years, and a consistent member, so far as human eye could discern. I conversed with her relative to her departure. She said she felt resigned. I conversed with her again. She spoke of having doubts. I left her in this condition. About 11 o'clock the same night I was aroused with a message to go and see her again. I found her in the greatest agony of soul. After laboring with her she again found the Redeemer, and expressed entire satisfaction of her salvation.

Afterwards, she lost her reason, dying with a pleasant smile on her countenance.

W. E. CAMERON.

DIED—At his residence, in Holmes county, Miss., on the 22d May, JOSEPH MCGEE, aged 69 years. The morning of his death he arose as usual, and with his accustomed energy engaged in the business of his farm. After a short absence he returned to the house, and laying down, expired. He removed to Mississippi in 1835. For forty years he was a member of the M. E. Church, occupying at different periods official positions in it. Thus passed from earth to a blessed immortality a man venerable for his age; respected for his love and exercise of justice, ambitious only in an humble way to be useful in his Church and his neighborhood, practicing with cheerfulness and liberality charity toward his fellow-man. He was a patriot. Prior to the last 4th of July, with his own hands, assisted by but few others, he labored in the preparation of the ground for the celebration of our national anniversary; and only a few days since, in the payment of his stock to the railroad company, I witnessed another original display of patriotism, which inspired me with fresh zeal and renewed hopes. He left a numerous family and a large circle of friends to mourn his death. Farewell, departed sire; long may your example be remembered and imitated by those of the present generation. A. M. WEST.

Rev. JOHN J. WEEMS came to a sudden and violent death at his home, near Alexandria, La., killed by a negro boy, and his head severed with an axe. Bro. Riley, after detailing the incidents, which were of so shocking a character we spare the reader, goes on to say:

"Bro. Weems was a man extensively and favorably known, both in the States of Louisiana and Mississippi. Eight years of his life were spent as an itinerant Methodist minister. As a minister of the gospel, he was industrious, persevering and useful, counting no labor or sacrifice too great for the cause of his Master, until his health entirely failed, and thus he was compelled to locate, and by the labor of his own hands supported himself and wife. As a Christian, he was faithful to his duty, and possessed of as few faults as most others. As a man, he was open, frank and unassuming, warmly attached to his friends, and possessed of a truly generous heart.

He leaves an affectionate, pious and bereaved widow, who is well deserving the prayers and sympathies of a praying people.

URIAH RILEY.

June 12, 1855.

DIED—At Milton, St. Rosa county, Fla., on the 16th inst., EMMA BALSORA, youngest child of Rev. Lewis P. Golson, aged eight months and eighteen days, the third female infant who from this family has winged her flight to Heaven:

An angel gatherer has taken
A cherub infant from her parents' love;
She sleeps in death, and will awaken
A brighter spirit to the realms above.
Thus have three sisters from the cradle risen
To join the seraph band around the throne of Heav'n.

RED RIVER.—The engineer, chambermaid, and others of the crew of the steamer R. M. Jones, which went up Red River more than a month ago, returned to the city on Thursday without their boat. They report the Jones as inextricably "glued up" somewhere about the raft, with bats roosting and alligators sleeping in her wheels. There was no water in the river; only a little "alligator heath," over which the voyagers poled their way on a raft, all the way to the mouth. They lived on milk, eggs, and hogs, as whenever they kindled a fire on the bank at night, indefinite myriads of insects would singe their wings and fall into the pot, which had no lid. They brought along splinters of the Jones, as mementos for her friends, who never expect to see her again.

General Intelligence.

NEW ORLEANS AND JACKSON RAILROAD.

We find the following in the Jackson (Miss.) Mercury of the 14th inst. We are glad the prospects of completing the Canton section of the road are so good; but would be more pleased to chronicle rapid progress on the section of the line beyond Osyka. Until the gap between Osyka and Jackson is filled up, the forging of disconnected links in a great chain of public improvement, can be productive of little benefit. It seems to us. Every energy and every dollar should be devoted to pushing the road forward from its principal starting point—New Orleans.

The suggestion of the Mercury, contained in the last paragraph, ought to attract attention:

CANTON RAILROAD.—N. O. ROAD.—We are glad to learn that the iron for ten miles of this road is now being handled at New Orleans, and that a large lot of cedar cross ties have reached Vicksburg. The grading of the whole line is almost completed, and the track-laying can progress at the rate of a mile a week. It is expected that the road will certainly be in operation to Canton towards the end of the year.

On the New Orleans road above Osyka, we learn that about three quarters of a mile of track per week is being laid, but there is only iron for six or seven miles. The grading is nearly completed 25 miles above Osyka—within 14 miles of Jackson, to which point the company hope to run the cars early this fall.

The Canton Planters' Convention meets on the 4th of July at Hooper's Well. We suggest that the friends of this great work meet at the same place on that or the succeeding day, and make an effort to enlist public interest in its behalf.

[From the New York Express, 13th]

The Philadelphia Convention.

The report below, so specific in detail, beyond anything elsewhere published, (and correct it is) comes to us by an authentic channel. The way of getting knowledge for the Press. Some abolitionist in the Convention, reports for the Springfield (Mass.) Republican and Tribune, the "chiefs," and our correspondent puts on the inevitable "auditoria." It is the pursuit of knowledge under difficulties, but it only shows the absurdity of attempting to conceal what the Convention is doing.

It will be seen that the two "Sambos" North and South, have split the Convention right in two. New York only goes after the Southern Sambo.

(Correspondence of the N. Y. Express)

"Sambo" has eclipsed "Sam," who has not been here for some days now, and all that we here of is "Sambo" North and "Sambo" South. The Southern Sambo has got the better by a vote of two, of the Northern Sambo, and declaring him out of Convention, in company with Sam.

[Here follows the Majority Report which has been received here, and published:]

The following gentlemen voted for this Report:

John F. H. Thom, of Ga. Judge A. W. Hopkins, of Ala
Judge R. R. Gamble, Miss. Judge T. Randall, Fla.
Judge V. Ellis, Wash., D. C. J. Cunningham Jas., Esq., S. C.
J. L. L. McCall, Esq., Texas. W. M Burwell, Esq., Va.
Dr. C. M. Hitchcock, Cal. Albert Pike, Esq., Ark
Col J. S. Williams, Ky. T. J. Lyons, Esq., N. Y.
J. H. Haughton, Esq., N.C. Neil S. Brown, Esq., Tenn.
A. H. Roby, Esq., Miss. Col. J. B. Ricaud, Md.
Delegate for Minnesota, probably.

Mr. Lyons of N. Y., alone in the free States, voted for the report.

Iowa was not represented. Minnesota territory went with New York, as also the District of Columbia; and these with the united South, carried the majority report in Committee.

MINORITY REPORT.

The minority resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the repeal of the Missouri Compromise was an infraction of the plighted faith of the Nation, and that it should be restored, and if efforts to that effect shall fail Congress should refuse to admit any State tolerating Slavery which shall be formed out of any portion of the territory from which that institution was excluded by that Compromise.

Thus "Sambo South" and "Sambo North," with their tatterdalions, thus kill poor "Sam," who appears to have little or nothing to do in the Convention.

The minority report was signed by—

Ex-Gov. Johnston, Pa.	N. D. Sperry, Conn.
Thos. A. Ford, Ohio.	Ex-Gov. A. Colby, N. H.
John H. Gayward, Me.	John W. Foster, Mass.
A. Green, R. I.,	Joseph H. Barrett, Vt
Hon. Schuyler Colfax, Ind.	D. S. Wood, Wis.
M. C. elect,	Rev. J. Cogshall, Mich.
	W. J. Phelps, Ill.

Twelve in all. Richard Clement, of Del., and C. D. Deshler, of N. J., went for the first clause of the Minority Report, disapproving of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise.

Two Ex-Governors of States,—one member of Congress elect, and the old Webster and Clay Whigs in the North, went against the majority platform. There has been no slander man in the Northern States than Mr. Foster, of Mass.

In the General Council, when the resolutions were reported, Gov Gardner, of Mass., took up the guantlet, and declared that neither he or his State, nor a majority of the Free States, would shield by the resolutions first reported. The party could not carry a village in Massachusetts upon them.

The union of the North has a little alarmed people—and hence it is now proposed to dilute the majority resolutions a little, and then put them through.

The Council will thus be broken in two pieces—North and South. The two "Sambos"—Northern and Northern—will have husted. "Sam," who will have to muster his clans again, exclusive of Sambo.

The spectacle here is curious. The Sewardites of the North have got into the Council three or four untra Abolition men, on purpose to make mischief—and as outsiders of the Council, they have to pay two or three from New York—but especially one José Mr. Lyons, so pro-slavery, that he is republican every where South out of South Carolina and Alabama, for over-saving his pay.

Thus "Sam" is assailed by double Seward factics—the ultra Southern "Sambo" South and New York—and the ultra "Sambo" of Massachusetts in part, Maine, and the Lake shore of Ohio and Indiana.

Poor Sam! This "Democracy" will sow out him all up, as "the Sambos" North and South have cut him to pieces, and lay him out in Northern and Southern slices. The "negro" is the death of every party that touches him.

LATER FROM THE PLAINS.—The St. Louis Republican of the 11th has the following latest intelligence from the Plains:

A mail was received on Saturday from Fort Laramie and Fort Kearney. Several letters have been placed at our disposal from each of these posts, from which we gather some interesting items of news. The feeling of the Sioux Indians is decidedly hostile to the United States.

One letter from Fort Laramie, dated on the 6th of May, says: "The Snake Indians were not concerned in the recent robberies at the Platte Bridge. It is known that the Minnesotans Sioux are guilty of all the late robberies. This week they stole four of Maj. Johnson's escort mules, not far from the fort, on the Salt Lake side. Some squaws have brought in a report that two war parties, one hundred strong each, are coming down on Laramie to steal. All the traders agree that the Government ought to whip the Sioux—in fact that it is absolutely necessary."

The trial at Salt Lake of the Indians surrendered as the murderers of Capt. Gunnison and his party—a blind old man, a woman and a child, with one warrior—was a most disgraceful affair. They were sentenced to six year's imprisonment, and got out of jail the second night.

Another letter of the 18th, says: "The Indians are stealing horses and mules at the Platte Bridge and the Devil's Gate. John Reichard has lost eighty head. Archambault all he had. From all that I can see and hear, I apprehend that there will be no war with the Sioux. It is astonishing that the Government will see depredations and murders committed repeatedly, and yet take no steps to protect the people. We, who are here in the midst of these occurrences, and know the Indians, have good cause to complain that the Government will not pursue the proper course towards them.

A letter from Platte Bridge, dated April 27th, says:—"Only eight days ago, Sioux Indians came here and stole seventy-five head of horses. They have robbed traders who have lived with them for years. They look for war with the whites, and say they are ready for it."

From Fort Kearney, in a letter of the 27th May, we are told, "The escort arrived from above to-day. The Salt Lake mail had not arrived at Laramie on the 18th inst. Some emigrants on the road between this and Laramie have lost all their stock by the Sioux Indians."

ABUSE OF LAUDANUM.—The New York Evening Post publishes a communication from a private source, calling attention to the increased use of laudanum by many young persons of that city, who procure it, the writer says, "in large quantities at the druggists, and swallow it like water!" Adverting to his own experience, he goes on to state that his "feelings are daily harrowed by the sight of a young relative who has taken to this awful species of intoxication; every means have been tried to break her of it; money has been withheld from her—the druggists nearest home have been warned against furnishing her any—but all has been in vain. It is idle to think of warning all the druggists in this vast city. She procures it in immense quantities in various places, on trust, gives a false name and address, and when she is prevented from going out, bribes my servants to get it for her. In despair at this state of things, which is fast hurrying her to her grave, I have sought information respecting this singular species of vice, and have discovered among families known to me, no less than five persons whose lives and intellects have been sacrificed by this deleterious drug."

NOMENCLATURE.—One out of the many evidences of the love and regard that Americans feel for the great men of their country, may be seen in the use they make of their names for towns, villages, cities and counties. Washington's name has been given to the capital of the country, one territory, 27 counties, 140 towns, and 12 places with ville or borough appended; Jackson is remembered in 15 counties, 120 towns, and 45 villes, boroughs, valleys, &c; Lafayette is godfather to 4 counties and 30 towns; and others of the illustrious are proportionately immortalized. The custom is a foolish and absurd one, where the original Indian names would be better and more euphonious, as well as more distinguishing. But it shows the sentiment.

FROM VENEZUELA.—Advices from Laguayra to the 28th ult. have been received at New York. The Commercial Advertiser says:

All was quiet, though an invasion of the provinces of Maracaibo by New Granada was still deemed probable, and troops were being mustered for its protection. The duties of the American legation were reported as proceeding pleasantly. Prior to its adjournment Congress granted dictatorial powers to the President.

American produce was in abundance. Flour was being largely imported from Spain. Col. Dias, of the Venezuelan navy, came passenger in the Cuba. He is proceeding to Washington, as commissioner to procure from the United States Government the recognition of the Venezuelan claim to the Isle of Aves, with its guano.

The American Convention.

PHILADELPHIA, June 16.—The Convention has passed resolutions denouncing the Administration.

The ritual of the party has been somewhat modified, and the Catholic test re-affirmed.

The representatives nominated to attend the Convention comprise one delegate from each Congressional District, and one from each State at large.

The platform which has been adopted comprises four sections.

The first section acknowledges the existence of an Almighty Being. The second resolves on the cultivation and development of American feeling.

The third resolves on the maintenance of a union of the States, and on the suppression of all tendencies to political divisions founded on a belief of a real difference of fairness and views between various sections of the Union.

The fourth proclaims the necessity of obedience to the constitution as the supreme law of the land.

The fifth section resolves on the necessity for a modification of the Naturalization laws, and for the making of provisions for the settlement of immigrants, offering a friendly reception and protection to honest ones, but condemning the introduction of paupers.

The sixth section declares a modification of the naturalization laws as essential to the well-being of the country.

The seventh declares hostility against the corrupt means by which political leaders have forced upon the people rulers and political creeds and proclaims that in imitation of the purer days of the republic the office should seek the man and not the man the office.

The eighth section resolves on restrictions to the aggressive policy and corrupt tendencies of the Roman Catholic Church, by the advancement to all political stations—executive and legislative, judicial and diplomatic—of those only who do not owe civil allegiance, directly or indirectly, to any foreign power, and which allegiance must be due by all others than those who are citizens and Americans by birth, education and training; thus fulfilling the maxim that Americans only ought to govern America, while protection must be extended to all citizens in the legal prosecution and carrying of their civil and religious rights and privileges.

The ninth section declares it the right of every man to have the full, unrestricted and peaceful enjoyment of his own religious opinions and worship, and that a jealous distance will be given to all attempts by any sect, denomination or church, to obtain any ascendency over any other in any State, by means of any special privilege or exemption, by any political combination of members, or by any divisions of their civil allegiance to any foreign power, potentate or ecclesiastic, or by any action of the National Legislature.

The tenth section proposes the restriction of executive patronage.

The eleventh resolves on the necessity of providing for the education of the youth of the country, by our public schools, without reference to any creed or party.

The twelfth section demands the maintenance of the existing laws respecting slavery, as a final settlement of the subject, in spirit and substance, and declares that Congress has no power to legislate upon it.

The thirteenth section proclaims a desire for peace with all foreign Governments, while we repel injuries from the strongest, and at the same time justice to the weakest.

The fourteenth section declares that the principal order shall here after meet at New York, the next meeting to be held in June, 1856.

LAFOURCHE ITEMS.—We clip the following items from the Thibodaux Minerva, of the 16th instant.

The Lafourche has again commenced rising at this point. May it continue to do so. We've had no rain since Saturday last. The recent rains have had the most salutary influence on crops of all kinds. On our way home from New Orleans via the Opelousas Railroad, on Monday last, we noticed quite a visible improvement for the better in the cane and corn crops, to what they were when on our way down a week previous, and now, although an abundant sugar crop cannot be expected, in consequence of an inferior stand, caused by an excessively wet winter, an abundant crop is confidently anticipated. The young corn on the route is looking remarkably well, and with favorable weather in the future will yield abundantly. The crops of beans, potatoes (sweet and Irish) promise well, and will amply repay the husbandman for his trouble. The gardens begin to assume a fine and healthy appearance.

The health of town and country was never better than at the present writing. Our dentists complain that there is not even a single case of toothache, on which to exercise their professional skill. Can any other country in God's creation boast of a better state of affairs than this? Guess not!

The Lafourche Dragoons intend celebrating our national day of freedom, by a grand military turnout in the morning, after which they will partake of a sumptuous dinner at the residence of their commander, Capt. R. G. Darden. They will have a delightful time of it, we bet.

The Artillery Company, the "Thibodaux Canoneers," are now thoroughly organized. All the subordinate officers were elected on Thursday night last. We learn that nearly fifty members have given their measure for uniforms. This is pretty good evidence that the right kind of spirit exists among the members.

NATIVE WHEAT.—We have had the pleasure of examining a most beautiful specimen of native wheat grown in this parish, on the farm of Mr. John Laralby, about seven miles below this place. It will compare favorably with the best specimens of Northern and Western wheat. The ears are large, well formed and heavy, the berries hard, heavy and round; the straw of fine length. There is not the least appearance of rust, or smut. From the lights now before us, we doubt not that this quality of wheat might be cultivated to advantage on the low lands of this and adjoining parishes.

CLARKE MILLS AND HIS STATUE OF GEN. JACKSON.—"Joe" writes from Washington to the Baltimore Sun as follows:

Prominent amongst the improvements of a few years on the line of railway between this city and Bladensburg, is the fine estate of Clarke Mills, Esq., the American artist, renowned for his equestrian statue of Jackson.

The spacious and hand-some new building on the north side of the road is the foundry, which supersedes that destroyed by fire a few months since. With commendable energy this establishment and all its manifold machinery is already in full operation. The artist is now engaged in casting the equestrian statues of the illustrious Jackson, which is to be erected in New Orleans on the 8th of January next—and for which the pedestal is already laid.

On the south side of the road the new studio is nearly completed. This is a decided improvement over the former structure, which was blown down by a severe gale of wind. So soon as the roof is on, Mr Mills will commence putting together several parts of the anxiously looked for statue of the Father of his Country, which is to adorn our city. In his design the artist has happily conceived the appearance of the illustrious Washington, as, at the battle of Princeton, he passed his fine charger immediately in front of the British soldiers at such imminent hazard that even the noble animal recoiled at the effort—his head erect—nostrils distended—flowing mane, and every muscle indicating the agony he endures in view of the conflict. In his mind's eye the heaven-directed leader of the American forces, possessing a countenance as firm, courageous, calm and dignified, as he ever displayed in the ordinary duties of life. The uniform of Washington is purely continental, modeled from the identical coat he wore, and which is on exhibition at the gallery of the National Institute.

Application has been made for a statue of Jackson, to be cast in bronze, for the city of Baltimore—and probably to go placed in the square given for that purpose by Robert Howard, Esq. Other engagements, however, compel the artist, for the present, to defer the responsibility of any additional work.

Something new was learned by New York State Engineers, in the use of the first locomotive ran upon the Copiapo Railroad in Chili, South America. This was, that there is water whose boiling is quite as much a process of making stone, as one of generating steam. They were astonished down there to observe the difficulty of getting up steam, within a week after the engine was put upon the road. The machine soon became nearly useless. On examination, a deep deposit of stone, hard enough on its lower side to scratch glass, was discovered upon the sides and bottom of the boiler and its fines. Trials chemically applied, showed that it was composed of magnesia carbonate of lime, and earthy matter. Subsequent observations proved that the water of the country deposited this coating in the boilers at the rate of one quarter of an inch per week. To obviate this great difficulty, the Railroad Company was obliged to distil rain water for the use of their locomotives.

LIABILITY TO COLLISION AT SEA.—Lieutenant Maury has published a pamphlet, entitled "Letter Concerning Lanes for the Steamers Crossing the Atlantic," in which he states that the part of the ocean used by the European steamers in their voyages to and fro, between the meridians of 16 deg. and 65 deg. West, is, for the American steamers 300 miles broad, and for the English 150 miles broad. The American roadway overlaps and includes the English. Consequently, there is a breadth of ocean 300 miles wide, in any part of which a sailing vessel, by night or in a fog, is liable to be brought into collision with the steamers. Lieutenant Maury, therefore, proposes new lanes for steamers across the Atlantic which will "lessen the liabilities by diminishing the chances of collision." He gives in his pamphlet full charts of these lanes, which will engage the attention of the nautical world, and answer, no doubt, as valuable suggestions to avoid danger.

SAD MEETING.—A steamer of the fleet before Sebastopol, whose family lives at Pelpero, Cornwall, England, was ordered on shore, for the purpose of assisting in burying the slain, who fell in a late attack of the Russians on the British batteries at Sebastopol, and almost the first person he met with on landing, was one of his brothers, of whose presence in the fleet he was not informed, and who had been severely wounded in a late engagement. From him he learned that his two other brothers were also serving in the naval brigade on shore, and with him he remained till he saw him expire. He then proceeded on the duty for which he had landed, and soon discovered the bodies of his other brothers, who had been killed in the battle.

ELECTIONS.—Alabama, Arkansas, Kentucky, Iowa, Missouri and Texas held their elections on the first Monday in August; Tennessee on the first Thursday, and North Carolina on the second Thursday of the same month. On the second Monday in September the election in Maine occurs, and that of Vermont on the first Tuesday of the same month.

ACTION FOR NON-INSERTION OF AN ADVERTISEMENT.—In the Court of Exchequer, Dublin, on the 11th May, an action was brought by M. Charles Rousselle, a performer of feats of strength, against the proprietor of the Saunders' Newsletter, for neglecting to insert an advertisement challenging another artist to a trial of strength. Damages were laid at one hundred pounds sterling. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, with costs, holding that the editor of a newspaper has a right to exclude any matter he pleases.

A MASSIVE CASTING.—In New York, on Wednesday, the 13th, the Globe Iron Works, on Thirty-third street, turned out a casting weighing eighty eight thousand pounds—the largest, we are told, ever effected in a single mass in this country. It is a plate of iron designed for some of the uses of the American Plate Glass Company.

Further Foreign News.

PROGRESS OF THE SEIGE, ETC

From the New York papers of the 14th, we extract the following further interesting items of foreign news received by the steamship Atlantic:

The official dispatches go back to the 15th of May, on which Lord Raglan writes, that the fire of the enemy has been slack, being chiefly directed against the French works. The Sardinian troops were landed and the 12th English batteries had arrived. Fifty cases of Cholera and 20 deaths were reported in the English army, with some cases among the French. Abundance of food was supplied to the troops. Much praise is mentioned on the appearance of the Sardinians, who have landed in fine condition and well supplied with all the material of war.

May 19th.—The fourth parallel was completed. Heat had succeeded to rain. There had been fatally easy firing on either side. Large convoys had entered Sebastopol from the north side. The Russians acted vigorously at the north side, where they are erecting an earthwork. The Russians are moving all their heavy mortars of 13 and 10 inches, into the advanced parallels. Two deserters from Sebastopol, reported the garrison very strong numerically, but the hot weather was causing sickness.

The Capture of the Place d'Armes

Gen Pelissier, in dispatches dated the 23d and 24th of May says:

"The enemy had formed between the central bastion and the sea, a large place d'armes, where they proposed assembling considerable forces to make important sorties in the night between the 22d and 23d. We attacked those works which were defended by nearly the whole garrison. The combat was fierce, and lasted nearly the whole night. I hope to be able to announce to-morrow that we shall have taken the remainder."

On the next morning, accordingly, the General telegraphs:

"We last night very successfully carried the remainder of the works we had attacked on the previous evening. The enemy, whose losses were enormous in the night, could not make so stout a resistance. Our losses, though considerable, were much less. The Allied armies, to-day, formally celebrated together the birth day of Her Majesty, Queen Victoria."

The British ship Highflyer captured a boat containing a new carriage belonging to the Governor of Kertch, and the explains of the cruiser sent in a flag of truce, offering to spare the life on hearing. This offer was accepted, and English boats took it in. At the early hour of taking sounding, which enabled the English fleet to follow.

Seven hundred and forty-six Russians are prisoners in the hands of the English, while the Russians have but 108 private men and 10 officers belonging to the British. We have no return of the French prisoners.

A conspiracy to assassinate the Emperor Alexander, Grand Minister of Finance, has been discovered at Athens, and some arrests were made.

Miss Nightingale had been laid up with fever, but was recovering.

Apprehensions had been fondly expressed in the camp, that the army would soon be destitute of water, but the possession of the river Tchernaya will supply the want.

During the recent encounter before Sebastopol, a Russian bugler, quite a young boy, leaped on the top of the British parapet and sounded the charge. He was instantly shot with numerous balls, and his body fell into the English trenches.

The Turkish Bamazan commenced May 10th, with the usual ceremonies.

Letters from the Sisters of Mercy, of whom there are 03 within Sebastopol, portray in lively colors, the scenes of carnage they have to witness, and give a romantic account of their breathless toiling over the wounded in the Malakoff Tower, while it was under the fire of the enemy in the recent bombardment.

A contract is said to have been entered into with L. Gisbourne for a telegraph from Constantinople to Egypt.

Official accounts state the whole number of lives lost in the earthquakes at Brousa, February 20, at 649 viz: 549 in the first shock and 24 in the second. Besides this loss of life, one fifth of the city was destroyed by fire.

Postponement of the Proposed Conferences.

It was announced, by the last steamer, that the Conferences at Vienna would be resumed—the meeting to take place on Saturday, May 26th, without the presence of the Russian Plenipotentiaries, and another on Monday 28th at which all the Ambassadors would be present. The necessary instructions did not, however, arrive from London and Paris, and no Conference took place on Saturday.

A Vienna dispatch, of the 26th May, mentions that no direct answer had been received to the proposals sent by the Austrian Government to London and Paris, on the 20th. From Paris it is stated that the new Austrian propositions are peremptorily negatived by the Cabinets of England and France—but this latter statement is probably premature. Austria will adhere to her neutrality (the dispatch says) unless the Principalities "undertake her protectorate" be invaded.

Asia.

According to letters from Caernarvon, Mad. Williams was busy fortifying the city with earthworks.

Kurdistan is not yet quiet.

The Russians have recently manifested some intention of an attack on Kars.

Life in Camp—Scenes and Incidents.

We extract the following from the correspondent of the London Times. The writer apprehends great distress to the army during the heat of summer from the scarcity of water, and says:

The bulk of our army is ten or twelve miles from the anchorage of the fleet, and water is one of the most difficult articles to carry known to us. Where are our tanks, our water lings, our transport to supply us from Kamiesch? Above all, where is our transport? Diminutive have already arisen respecting the carriage of rum from Balaklava to the front, because it is in puncheons, and not in smaller vessels. And then, suppose some accident occurs to the fleet or the distilling apparatus! If the fleet to remain here to manufacture water for the army? Are we, in my absence, to go to sea to take our chance of dying of thirst in summer, just as we were drowned by wet in winter? Even supposing we had possession of the Tchernaya, it would be far to carry the water up steep hills 200 or 300 feet above its bed to the plateau at the east end of which it flows, and the source would remain in the possession of the enemy. This is a vital question, Mr. Bowyer, to remain here.

Shelling, Shooting, etc.

Since the bombardment has ceased, there is indeed, very little to record. Lord Raglan took Gen. Mermonlute the trenches to-day, and proceeded to the advanced parallel, explaining the nature of the position. On their return the enemy caught sight of them, and sent some unpleasant tokens of recognition in the shape of heavy shot and shell, which excited the attention of every one around Lord Raglan, but did not at all disturb the equanimity, or draw the notice of the Field Marshal. The Russians persisted in firing random shots here, there, and everywhere, and occasionally Mr. Whistling Willison drops in at an unexpected place, and does more damage than we bargain for.

The work of arming our advanced batteries continues to be executed with extreme activity and success, and it is said that we are about to take the grand guard, a very high spot near the Ovens, which the Russians have for some time occupied and covered by their fire. We are now mounting all our heavy mortars—13 inches and 10 inches—into the advanced parallels. A shell from the enemy fell by chance yesterday on the platform which had just been laid for one of these large mortars, and utterly destroyed it. In order to give an idea of the magnitude of the labors supposed with having been undertaken, and of the loss caused by such an incident, I may say that the engineers were four days getting the rock levelled for the platform, that that latter required two days to lay, and that it weighed nearly three tons. There was scarcely a shot fired to-day on either side.

Terrible Mistake.

A private letter from the camp, dated May 14th, contains the following: We have had terrible work here. Last night, the 13th, Eaglment fell in the fifth by mistake. The Russians made an attack on the advanced batteries and were repulsed by the 57th and Rifles; the Russians returned in a short time with reinforcements, again attacked the batteries, and a fearful struggle then took place. The reserves were then sent up—the 9th, 68th, and 44th.—and when they got into the advanced trench, both sides were so covered with mud that we could not tell Russians from English. Both reserves opened fire, but it was unfortunately on the poor 68th. They then charged on them, when they found out their mistake, but not till a good many of the 68th had fallen. However, the Russians had it hot and warm afterwards. The poor fellows who are wounded in advance of the trench are obliged to remain there all day till dark, as the Russians fire on any of our people who go to bring them in. Many of the wounded might recover if brought in, but they lie and bleed to death. The Russians make sorties daily and nightly, as, since General Jones came up, we are pushing the works close up to the town, so the work is very hard upon our poor fellows, often being three or four nights without rest.

The Sardinians.

The tents of the Sardinian Lancers are upheld by their lances, which are stuck into the earth, one at each end of the tent; and their accompaniments, with its warlog peacoats, has a very pretty effect. The Sardinian horses are rather leggy, but they are in excellent condition. They are certainly not such formidable neighbors as the horses of the 10th Hussars, which leave the most restless habits, break their picket-ropes, tear off through the camp at night, and are small targets to the quiet sleepers in the vicinity, whose tents are rudely agitated in the darkness by these playful steeds.

It was only yesterday that an officer of artillery and an officer of the 6th Hussars, in company with myself, were riding peaceably along through one of the ravines near Kataryi, when suddenly we heard cries of "look out! look out!" and lo! there came a furious steed, his mane and tail erect, down upon us. The lead stepped forth out of a pack of Hussar horses, which were feeding on the meadow grass, to offer us battle, and rushed at full gallop towards our ponies. "Out swords!" was the word, as the interesting quadruped ran round us, now menacing us with his heels, now with his teeth, but he was repelled by two bright swords and one strong whip, and at last, to our great relief, he caught a gl

Agricultural.

Col. Lomax, of the Columbus (Ga.) Times and Sentinel, has been in luck. The case is between guano and compost:

Watermelons in June.—On our return from Milledgeville, on the 7th, we were gratified to find upon our table, as a testimonial of remembrance from our kind friends, Messrs. Beaumont Lee, of this vicinity, a large and luscious watermelon. It was raised with guano and no other kind of manure. What says Mr. Peabody now to the impossibility of raising early watermelons with guano? A taste of the article convinces us that this manure is not fully appreciated by Southern horticulturists.

Columbus is a fast place in horticulture as well as politics. Who can beat Messrs. Means and Lee in raising watermelons?

It Never Rains but it Pours.—On the 7th inst. we acknowledged the receipt of a fine watermelon from Messrs. Means & Lee, of this vicinity. The next day Mr. Charles A. Peabody brought into our office another one, a little larger, perhaps, than that of his competitors. It was raised with compost manure. From the circumstances we are unable to say whether guano or compost is the most efficient manure in garden culture.

ASHES IN AGRICULTURE.—Wood ashes is one of the most important fertilisers. It is easily obtained in any quantity, and at little or no expense. Take them carefully from your hearths and save them until your corn and potatoes have risen two or three inches from the ground, and then take a basket on your arm, and from it a small handful of ashes, and cast it at the root of your plants and hoe them soon, so as to cover the ashes. Ashes contain all the inorganic substance of the wood or plants which are consumed; part of these are soluble, and part insoluble. But the soluble substances, mixed with water, will dissolve the insoluble. Thus, dissolved potash will dissolve silica and prepare it for placing the stalks of cane, corn, wheat, &c.

Not a particle of ashes should go to waste. Leached ashes has parted with most of its potash, but still retains its phosphoric acid and most of its lime.

Ashes neutralises acids in the soil; they warm cold, mossy, wet places; they are very destructive to insects; they assist to break down and dissolve the coarse fibres of stalks in compost heaps; render hard, clayey soils open, loamy and fertile.

The potash, as material to most crops, can be obtained here only from ashes. In granite regions potash is obtained from the dissolution of the feldspar, but we have none in this region of country.

Wheat contains a large proportion of potash. Fifty-nine per cent. of the ash of corn is the estimate of potash; one-half of the earthy portion of Irish potatoes is pure potash.

Save your ashes, therefore, as carefully as you do your five and ten-cent pieces, apply them to your crops with care, and you will find them of a rich deep green color while growing, and heavy with nutriment at harvest.—Ancient City.

Later from Texas.

The steamship Monico, Capt. Lawless, arrived on Saturday last from Galveston, bringing dates to the 14th. We are under obligations to the purser for usual favors, manifest, papers, etc.

The Intelligencer Bulletin of the 9th has the following paragraphs:

We are informed by one who knows, that there are upwards of 1,500 Germans emigrants now on their way to this part from Hamburg. They are mostly expected. The majority of them go into the interior of our State. Quite a large trade of wagons are now in waiting for them in the vicinity of our town.

We were informed yesterday by one or two gentlemen, that several rockets were passing through our streets on last Thursday night. One of our informants shot at one of them, but he was too far from it to hit it. Either the paucity of water or of provisions in the prairies, have enabled them to pay us the unwelcome visit.

The proprietors of nearly all the drinking houses and hotels of Galveston have united to make common cause, in an endeavor to try the validity of the late ordinance closing up such establishments on Sunday.

At Galveston, on the 13th instant, an interesting suit, in which R. D. G. Mills was plaintiff, and the owners of the steamship Louisiana defendants, was decided in favor of the plaintiffs. The suit grew out of the loss of a bag containing three thousand five hundred dollars in specie, sent by the plaintiffs on board the Louisiana, for New Orleans. The bag was abandoned by some means, and another bag containing a lot of clothes and some coin substituted in its place, and the robbery was only discovered when the bag was delivered in New Orleans.

Several letters have been received in Galveston, which give full assurance that the Galveston, Houston and Henderson Railroad will yet be built, and that the first twenty-five miles will be completed before the expiration of the time limited by the sixteen section bill. Captain G. says that the iron is now on the way out from England, and may be expected here shortly.

The Indianola Bulletin of the 9th has the following:

A youth, only sixteen years of age, son of Mr. T. J. Chastain, of Fentress, Marion county, Va., lost his life a few days ago, while attempting to save the life of his father, who was placed in a perilous situation by losing control of a boat while crossing Valley River. The son, knowing that his father could not swim, and believing himself an excellent swimmer, plunged into the river, which was much swollen from recent rains, for the purpose of saving his parent from a supposed watery grave; but his father reached the shore in the boat, while his noble and affectionate son sunk only to rise a corpse.—We learn from the Fairmount Virginian.

The Montreal Commercial Advertiser has been shown letters from ministers and others, both in Eastern and Western Canada East, which describe the rampant fever raging among all classes from the necessity of bread stuffs, so frightful in the extreme. In some parts scurvy has made its appearance.

LIABILITIES OF INSURANCE COMPANIES.—A suit has just been decided in New York, which touches the liabilities of insurance companies. Harper & Bros., publishers, and their publication office destroyed last year. The fire is supposed to have originated in the room where gutta percha was cleaned with camphene. A company insisted the payment of their policy, on the ground that the use of camphene was prohibited. The use of camphene was merely incidental in the mechanical department, and the plaintiffs contended was not such as was intended to be prohibited. The jury sustained this view, and rendered a verdict of $6,372 with costs.

A Night Attack.

The Crimean correspondent of the London Times thus graphically describes one of the night attacks, now so frequent before Sebastopol:

Thursday, May 10.—About one o'clock this morning the camp in front was roused up by an extremely heavy fire of musketry and repeated cheering along our right attack. The elevated ground and ridges in front of the third and fourth divisions were soon crowded with groups of men from the tents in the rear. It was a very dark night, for the moon had not yet risen, and the sky was overcast with clouds, but the incipient flashing of small-arms which lighted up the front of the trenches, the yell of the Russians) which our soldiers have christened the "Inkermann screech,") the cheers of our men and the volume of the fire, indicated the position, and showed that a contest of no ordinary severity was taking place.

There is an earnestness and reality about the musketry on such occasions, which has a language of its own that cannot be mistaken. The regularity and precision of the feu de joie, the platoon or file firing of our reviews, have little in with the passionate, intense and startling bursts of rifle and musket, and give but an imperfect notion of the deadly battle and fitful rolling small-arms in action, where every man is loading and firing as rapidly as he can, and the formation of the line is altering every moment. For a mile and a half the darkness was broken by outbursts of ruddy flames and bright glittering sparks, which advanced, receded, died out altogether, broke out fiercely in patches in innumerable twinkles, flickered in long lines like the electric flash along a chain, and formed for an instant crains of fire.

By the time I had reached the front—about five minutes after the firing began—the fight was raging all along the right of our position, and as some extra men had been sent down to the batteries when the relief marched down, it was thought we might have an attack on the Russian works close to our advanced trenches, but it was soon tolerably certain that the enemy had either made a sortie upon Gordon's new works, or a vigorous assault upon the men in front of the trenches. I cannot now ascertain the particulars of the affair, even if one could have the heart to disturb the poor fellows who may have come up from the trenches, and I can only describe what I saw. It seemed as if the fiercest and most determined struggle took place on the left of our right attack, but the ground is so very deceitful at night, that it is impossible to determine localities with anything like precision.

The wind was favorable for hearing, and the cheers of the men, their shouts, the voices of the officers, the Russian bugles and our own, were distinctly audible. The bugles of the Light and Second Division were sounding the alarm out on our right as we reached the high ground, and soon afterwards the alarm sounded through the French camp close to them. Hundreds of the soldiers had got up, and there watching with the most intense interest the fight before them, as far as they could see it. The tents of the Fourth Division were lighted up, and the old Inkermann men were all anxious and ready for the word to march, should their services be required.

The musketry having rolled incessantly for a quarter of an hour, began to cease at intervals along the line. Here and there it stopped for a moment altogether, again it burst forth. Then came a British cheer, which thrilled through every heart, "Our fellows have driven them back; bravo!" Then a Russian yell, a fresh burst of musketry, more cheering, a rolling volley, subsiding into spattering flashes and broken fire, a ringing hurrah from the front; and then the Russian bugles sounding "the retreat," and our own bugles "cease firing," and the attack, after half-an-hour's duration, was over. The enemy were beaten, and were retiring to their earthworks; and now the batteries opened to cover their retreat. The Redan, Round Tower, Garden Batteries and Road Battery, aided probably by the ships, lighted up the air from the muzzles of their guns.

The batteries at Careening-bay and at the north side of the harbor contributed their fire, and the sky was stained by the red track of innumerable shells. You could see clearly at times the ground close around you from the flashes of the cannon. The round shot tore the air with a harsh roar, and shells burst almost in volleys along our lines. The Russians were avenging themselves as best they might for their repulse, and the extent of their mortification and anger might be inferred from the vigor and weight of their cannonade. The instant they began the fire, our own and our allies, the French, on our right, opened from their batteries over Inkermann and from the redoubts, to draw off the Russian guns from our men; and our own batteries also replied, and sent shot and shell in the direction of the retreating enemy.

The effect of this combined fire was very formidable to look at, but was probably not nearly so destructive as that of the musketry. From half past one till three o'clock the cannonade continued, but the spectators had retired before two o'clock, and tried to sleep as well as they might in the midst of the thunders of the infernal turmoil. This conflict must have caused considerable loss, and it is a time of painful suspense, while one is in a state of uncertainty respecting the fate of friends and the result of such an encounter. Soon after three o'clock A. M. it began to blow and rain with great violence, and on getting up this morning, I really imagined that one of our terrible winter days had interpolated itself into our Crimean May. The tents are dark with wet, the whole camp looks black and miserable, and one step out of doors takes you over the shoes in mud.

A SEA DEVIL OR OCEANIC VAMPIRE.—The Falmouth (Jamaica) Post gives the following description of a Devil Fish recently captured and towed into that port:

A remarkable "Monster of the Deep" was harpooned in the harbor of Montego Bay, on Friday morning last, by Capt. Thompson, of the "Antigua Packet," and towed up at Gun Point Wharf, at about 10 o'clock, affording a sight of great wonder and amusement to crowds of spectators. It agreed, in appearance, with what is characterised as the Sea Devil, or "Oceanic Vampire," and this prodigious kind of fish is thus described by a modern author:

"THE SEA DEVIL.—This name is given to an enormous flat fish of the Ray tribe, which was seen by M. le Vaillant, about ten degrees to the southward of the Equator. Three of these monsters were met around the ship for three days, and one of them was calculated to be fifty or sixty feet wide. The smallest was harpooned, and found to be twenty-eight feet wide, and one and twenty feet long. Its mouth was wide enough to swallow a man with ease. It differed from the common ray in the shape of its head, which, instead of being pointed, formed a crescent, and from the extremities of the semi-circle, issued two arms, as it were, two feet wide at the base, and only five inches at the extremity. A similar monster, to which Dr. Mitchell gave the name of Oceanic Vampire, was taken in the Atlantic Ocean, near the entrance of Delaware Bay. It was more than seventeen feet long, eighteen feet wide, and believed to have weighed four or five tons."

The animal taken in the Montego Bay Harbor resembled exactly the Sea Devil or Oceanic Vampire, in its crescent-formed head, and frontal fin-like arms; described in the preceding quotation. Dr. Skues, of the military detachment at Montego Bay, took the measurements, and found the transverse width, from points of lateral fins, to be fifteen feet; length of body, night and half feet; tail, five feet; and width of mouth, two feet two inches. The weight was eleven and a half hundred weight. In former years Sir John Keane, Lieut. St. John, and other marine sportsmen, used to be celebrated for giving chase to, and capturing, the Devil Fish, among the Keys at the entrance of Port Royal Harbor. Our informant, however, is not aware whether that was the Sea Devil or ordinary fish shape, given in Buffon's plates, with lance and spear-formed spines on the ridge of back toward the head; or the Oceanic Vampire of the Ray tribe, of more recent descriptions.

THE HABITATIONS OF CRUELTY.

The present state of Feejee is deplorable in the extreme, notwithstanding the numerous triumphs of the Gospel there. A few incidents given in Wesleyan Missionary Notices by an eye-witness, illustrate the actual condition of the islanders:

Strangling of widows has engaged our frequent attention, and called forth our utmost energies. Six or eight women have been directly saved from this inhuman practice by our interposition, and several others indirectly and principally by the influence of what we have done. Some of these have subsequently lotued. Those scenes require no ordinary promptitude, and sacrifice. We have to adopt the Feejean national custom of presenting property when requesting a favor; and hitherto such life has involved the expense of about 1£.

But sometimes our interference is prevented, and sometimes it is spurned and ineffectual: few months ago a man died in a heathen town within a mile of ours. Mr. Malvern and I hastened to the abode of death; but the people fearing our arrival, and having heard of our success in other quarters, had already strangled the widow. We entered the house; there were the husband and wife both sleeping in death. We examined the woman's body; but the last spark of life was extinguished. Ah! and there stood the son of those new dead, who, with fiendish expression, lifted up his hands, and told us that by those hands that mother died!

"Ah!" was our language, "this is seen in Heaven; this will not be forgotten in Heaven; its punishment will follow."

A few weeks afterward I stood by an open grave in that town. I had gone in pursuit of the widow of a young man brought home a corpse from war. Her friends had consigned her to our care, and she had escaped from us. I stood by the open grave that I might witness the ceremony of a heathen burial; the corpse was brought out shrouded in mats; a bullet had pierced the brain. I looked upon the dead; I recognized the features; it was the murderer!

"Ah!" I exclaimed, as the corpse was laid in the last resting-place, "did we not speak the truth when we said: 'He sin was seen in Heaven; it was written in Heaven; its punishment would follow!'"

Several women have, in spite of our efforts, been strangled; and wherever there is a son, he is chosen to be the principal agent in the murder of his mother. Within my own knowledge, "Father Isa, with his own hands, suffocated (by choking or gagging) his own daughter who was sick. One day, standing by the corpse of a warrior painted and blackened as if for war, the club lying by his side, I turned round to his brother and inquired the cause of his death. The reply from that brother was: "He was very ill, and I suffocated him!"

Infanticide is written on another page of Feejean life. I wish to confine my illustrations as much as possible to cases that bear directly upon the point, and that have passed under the immediate notice of myself or other missionaries, or credible informants. Nothing do I state on mere rumor. A woman brought me a child, who, from want of proper treatment was nearly dead. I undertook to prescribe for it, if the mother would reside for a time in the house of one of my servants, so that I might see that it was with proper attention. My treatment was successful; the disease was subdued; the child could again run about, talk, and eat; in a day or two the mother could have returned to her friends, but maternal patience was exhausted, and one night she suffocated it.

A man was informed that his wife had given birth to a daughter. Hearing of its existence at directed it to be strangled. Again, a female once child was spared for several months; its death was then resolved upon by the parents. They dug a deep hole in the centre of the earthern floor of their house—the father flung into the grave his helpless and innocent babe. He then cast some heavy stones with violence upon it, and filled up the grave with earth. These inhuman parents still occupy that house. They daily tread over the decaying remains of their murdered child. Such is Feejee at the present day.

ALLEGED CONSPIRACY TO GET A HUSBAND.—It has always been considered the duty of the sterner sex to woo, win and possess the question to the "fairest portion of creation," except when Leap Year gives an implied license to women to win for themselves a husband and a home. We like the wooing to be done by the masculine gender, and we must admit that our sense of propriety was somewhat shocked on Saturday, June 2, at hearing of a case before Alderman Hilliard, in which it was plainly proved that a beautiful young female, not only "popped the question," but attempted, to supplant a wife in the affections of her husband. The facts of the case are as follows: It is alleged that a young man, daguerreotypist, recently traveled through Pennsylvania with his mother and two sisters, the eldest sister about twenty years of age, and quite beautiful, and the youngest about nine years. Their way led to a public house in a small village in Jefferson county, Penn., kept by a very worthy gentleman, the husband of a fine looking woman, and the father of an interesting little daughter. A few days after their arrival, the wife of the travelers were sent to work, it is alleged, to appropriate the snug quarters to themselves, and during several days' absence of the landlord from his home, the mother of the daguerreotypist, it is alleged, by some means or other, induced the wife of the landlord to elope with her son. The guilty party, having with them the child of the faithless wife, fled to New York, and subsequently came on to this city.

The landlord, on his return home, was greatly alarmed and uneasy at the absence of his wife, the alleged conspirators having told him that she had merely taken a ride with the young man. In the meantime every effort was made by the mother and daughter to induce the forsaken husband to forget his wife, and cling to the "girl left behind her;" but he refused their entreaties, though, at the same time, he acknowledged that he only wanted his child, and that the mother should never be clasped to his bosom again. The mother and daughter, finding their schemes unprosperous, made tracks for this city, and, on their arrival, sought out the runaways, and stopped at the same hotel with them. The disconsolate husband also came on, and, after a diligent search, discovered their whereabout. The wife, hearing of the arrival of her husband, removed, with her daughter, to another hotel, and thus saved herself from arrest at the time the others were taken in charge. She was, however, discovered on Saturday, and taken to the Alderman's office, and she was about to be committed to prison, when the husband requested the officer to take her to the hotel, and see that she was kept in close confinement. This was done, and the husband slept in an adjoining room with the officer; who used his best exertions to obtain the wife's forgiveness. He at last relented, and the same day returned to his home with her who had caused him such anguish and disquietude. The other parties were held to bail for their appearance whenever wanted, the landlord of the house in which they are now residing giving security for them, notwithstanding their indebtedness to him is quite a large amount. The whole case, according to the allegations, exhibit one of the coolest efforts to obtain a good home that we have ever seen on record, and also shows this traveling family are as devoid of feeling as they are of principle. [Phila. Ledger.

STEAMER AUSTRALIA SUNK.—We learn by a passenger on board the steamer Alma, in from the Missouri river, last evening, that the steamer Australia, freighted with Government stores, snagged and sunk about two miles below Glasgow, on Saturday afternoon at 2 o'clock. About an hour after this event the steamer Alma came up and rounded to at her side. The Australia is sunk in nine feet water. She lies perfectly straight and can probably be raised with bell boats. She had been chartered by the Government, was bound for Fort Pierre, and had a considerable number of troops aboard, who were immediately shipped on the Grey Cloud and proceed on up the river.

The Australia was owned by Capt Bart. Abie, her commander, and other parties in this city. She was a good and popular boat, legitimately belonging to the Missouri river trade. [St. Louis Republican, 11th.

The trophies taken by the English in the present war with Russia are very few, but they make the most of them. We see that there is on exhibition in a museum in Dublin, Prince Menschikoff's cane, captured in his carriage after the battle of Alma, and the keys of the fortress of Bomarsund.

As Elephant's Fraternal Feeling and Affection.

While a wagon drawn by several elephants was passing our office yesterday, the following story was told, which we vouch for as true:

Last season a menagerie visited the village of Johnstown, Fulton county. When the cavalcade left town, it passed over a bridge which the road crossed, leaving two elephants to bring up the rear. These were driven to the bridge, but with the known sagacity of the race, they refused to cross. The water of the creek, which flows through a gorge in the slate formation, presenting at that point banks of precipitous character, and thirty feet in height, was low, and by taking a coarse across a corn field, a ford could be reached. But the proprietor of the cornfield refused to allow his property to be so used, except on the payment of an exorbitant sum, and this the agent of the menagerie refused to submit to. Accordingly, the elephants were again driven to the bridge, and again he refused to attempt the crossing. They would try the structure with their great feet, feel cautiously along the plank with their proboscid fingers, but each time would recoil from making the dangerous experiment.

At last, however, goaded by the sharp iron instrument of the keeper, and accustomed to obedience, they rushed on with a scream, half of agony half of anger. The result showed the prudent prescience of the poor animals to have been correct; the bridge broke and went crashing to the bottom of the gorge, carrying with it both the monstrous beasts. One of them struck upon its tusk and shoulder, breaking the former, and very badly injuring the latter, the other was, strangely enough, unhurt. Now was shewn the most singular and remarkable conduct on the part of the brute which had escaped. Its comrade lay there, an extemporn bed being provided for its comfort, while no temptation, no force, no stratagem, was sufficient to induce the other to leave and proceed with the main portion of the caravan which finally went on, leaving the wounded beast and its companion under the charge of their keeper.

Day after day the suffering creature lay there, rapidly failing and unable to move. At the end of three weeks the winter in the creek commenced rising, and there was danger it would overflow and drown the disabled elephant. The keeper desired, therefore, to get it up and walk as far as a barn near by, where it would be out of danger and could be better cared for. But it would not stir. He coaxed, wheedled and scolded, but all to no purpose. At last, enraged, he seized a pitchfork and was about pronging it into the poor thing's flesh, when the companion wrenched the fork from his hand, broke it into fragments, and flung the pieces from it; then, with eyes glaring, and every evidence of rage in its manner, stood over its defenceless and wounded friend, as if daring his keeper to approach, which the man was not so green as to do again, with cruel purpose.

Thus, the injured animal lay there until it died. When satisfied that it could no longer be of service, the other quietly followed the keeper away from the spot, and showed no desire to return. If this was not reasoning mingled with an affection some men might pattern after, we should like to know what to call it. [Buffalo Democrat.

REVOLUTIONARY BONES.—It will be recollected by many that years ago the Tammany Society at New York, at a heavy expense, caused the bones of the American revolution prison-ship martyrs to be disinterred from their resting places, scattered on Long Island and the Jersey shores, and reinterred them temporarily in Brooklyn, designing eventually to procure for them an appropriate final resting place, and to crown it with a suitable monument. The society having at length determined if possible to place them and the monument in the Brooklyn navy yard, have sent a committee to this city, headed by Sachem William D. Kennedy, to solicit a place in that establishment for the purpose. It is sincerely to be hoped that the President and Secretary of the Navy may feel at liberty to give a favorable reply to this so patriotic request. [Washington Star.

SINGULAR FIGHT.—The attention of Mr. Jeremiah Pierce, of New Boston, was attracted a few mornings since by a fluttering on the surface of a small pond near his house, and at first supposed it was only a skirmish between two swallows, but a closer examination found the combatants were a good sized frog and a swallow. The frog had seized the swallow, and had drawn it under the water, which was quite shallow, and the bird in its turn would again struggle to the surface, the frog obliging tenaciously to his prey. Mr. P., considering the conflict as a rather unequal one, interposed with a long stick, by the aid of which he threw both combatants upon the bank; the swallow apparently being nearly exhausted, but soon recovered itself, and after a few moments rejoined its mate, who had all the time been a very interested spectator of the fight. The frog in the meantime made tracks. It is supposed the swallow was in quest of food for his nest, and was seized by his equntic opponent. Such instances of apparent voracity in the frog tribe are very rare, we believe.

SINGULAR SUICIDE.—An Indian, aged about nineteen years, residing upon the other side of the river, upon his return from a visit to this place one day last week, came to his death under the following peculiar circumstances: When quite small he occasioned the death of a brother, since which time his parents have treated him with great cruelty when intoxicated, upbraiding him with his brother's death, and beating him severely. On the day in question they had been over to this side, and got their quantum of whisky, and upon their return commenced the usual beating, whereupon the young man becoming desperate, went out to the boat, took up his gun, and pulling it off with his foot, fell dead upon the bench. [Lake Superior Journal.

HALF MORE THAN THE WHOLE.—It is amusing to see how the addition of a word or two operates as a diminutive of the idea: as to say of a man that he is a fine writer and——book-keeper. A good story is told of a set of convivial fellows, all authors or artists, who were dining one day at a club in London, when one of the literary men proposed the following toast: Filling his glass, he said, "I give you, gentlemen, the worthy company of painters and——glaziers." The laughter was very uproarious against the artists, when one of their number immediately retorted as follows: "And here, gentlemen, is to the honest trade of gliders and——paper stainers."

Some grave and twaddling gentleman thinks (in the Journal of Commerce) that "it is time sportsmen had done killing fish for enjoyment." This rouses the wrath of a piscatorial gentleman, who eases his mind as follows:

"In the name of sense, man, if God made fish to be eaten, what difference does it make if I enjoy the killing of them before I eat them? You would have none but a fisherman by trade do it, and then you would have him utter a prayer, and a pious salutation at each cod or gallonk that he killed; and if by chance the old fellow sitting in the boat at his work, should for a moment think there was, after all, a little fun and a little pleasure in his business, you would have him take a round turn with his line and drop on his knees to ask forgiveness for the sin of thinking there was fun in fishing."

A SHOWER OF FROGS.—One of our subscribers informs us that about 5 o'clock yesterday morning, when in the cars on the Hamilton and Dayton Road, there was quite a heavy shower when near the Middleton station, at which place the cars stopped for several minutes. On going outside it was perceived that the ground was completely covered with little frogs or toads about one inch long, which had evidently been rained upon the earth; and strange to say, they appeared all to be alive and kicking. [Cincinnati Gazette.

BUYING LAND WARRANTS.—An officer of the Department of the Interior inquires whether the recent circular issued by the Secretary of the Interior, reprehating the practice of speculating in land warrants by officers of the government, will preclude him from purchasing one or two land warrants to locate for his own benefit. In reply he was informed that a fair and legitimate investment is not regarded in the character of speculation, which implies buying and selling, and is, therefore, not inhibited.

Dr. HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS, prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson, are justly reckoned among our most valuable medicines. In cases of Dyspepsia it acts like magic, strengthening the tone of the stomach stimulating the digestive powers, and giving ruddy health to the cheek, and brightness to the eye. There are thousands in this community who can testify to their virtues and thousands will hereafter add their testimony.

Payment to be made at the close of each term. Board, including lodging, washing, lights and fuel, can be procured in the village and immediate neighborhood at ten dollars per month. Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would however, respectfully urge all parents or guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the institution to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, facilitating, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.

School books, stationery, &c., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the usual rates.

Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral deportment of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.

As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass into another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.

The government of the school is to be understood as that of authority—though parental and mild, yet decided and firm. The institution, in a religious point of view will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.

Pupils will be required to attend church at least once on the Sabbath, and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.

The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.

The first session commences on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second session commences on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July. At which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.

All applications for admission of pupils, &c., to be made to the president of the College.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswolds Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

DR. JOHN BECKWITH, WILLIAM MCNUTT,

A. C. BASTON, JOHN W. FRIERSON,
D. L. DINSMORE, REV. DUNCAN BROWN,
COL. ISAAC LANE, THOMAS B. PILLOW.

S. GRISWOLD & CO.

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Water Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and moto well. They are convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not their durability. In short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be.

June 19, 1855.

Mr. Editor—I confess to you, sir, that unrecently, I imagined myself visited by the ers of prophetic light, but now am like e unfortunate patients who whilom were ed by the great Doctor Turnhull, then your city; now, missing. Poor souls, lost what little day they had; though Doctor, you know, always insisted that he ld get work miracles, and only promised store sight. The comparison is in their ; for my darkness, complete and origi- has come by several doctors. First, author of the "United States in Pro- cy," from which I drank in a draught; a correspondent, signing himself "H. who confused me sadly. Did I, fool-like, that book clean through and not see deep homor? Lastly, Brother Columbus, "Tennessee," what does he mean by ristis," &c., having decided the case? it got into court? There is, now I k of it, a good deal of downright fili- erism in what "H. P." might con- r the author's happiest strokes,—as this: ow the United States is the first suc- ful organization of democracy in the ld, and it is the representative of the l-wide democracy. It is inseparably al- to democracy everywhere, from the very ure of things, and must make common e with it when it strikes for the great enial release. We are not ready for an with monarchy on democratic princi- ; it has been our proper and steady aim fied our own business." ow, sir, I am after light; and in my con- n am obliged to go back again to Daniel lf. With Daniel, I should at least get to my former dimness of a light neither ar nor dark," were it not that I find the hor of Armageddon, Mr. Baldwin, occu- g all three of my most reliable passages, 24th, 25th and 26th verses of the IX. of prophecy:

. 24.—"Seventy weeks are determined the people and upon thy holy city to sh the transgression and make an end of , to make reconciliation for iniquity, and ring in everlasting righteousness; to seal the vision and prupheecy, and to anoint Most Holy."

. 25.—"Know, therefore, and understand from the going forth of the command- t to restore and build Jerusalem, unto the iah, the Prince, shall be seven weeks and sixty and two weeks; the street shall be t again, and the wall, even in troublous ."

. 26.—"And after threescore and two ks shall the Messiah be cut off, but not himself; and the people of the Prince shall come shall destroy the city and the tuary, and the end thereof shall be with ood, and unto the end of the war desola- ns are determined."

When confounded by "fifty thousand or ore calculations" of others, and a few of my , I instinctively strive to find out what I know. And I ask, is anything in those ree verses certainly known? The words, Messiah be cut off, but not for himself," it me to me, are—they must mean the crucifixion of Christ. What else? Why, that event, the crucifixion, is to take place ty-two weeks after the commandment to ild Jerusalem.

These two things, the event and the inter- are certain, if anything is of these verses. hat ground does Mr. Baldwin occupy here? ok any. What says he of Messiah being off? That it means the crucifixion of rist. And what of (62) "threescore and o weeks?" Not a word. Look at page l of his book. He tells us "the first thing ted in the prophecy," the "second thing ed," the "third thing" and the "fourth g;" but nothing does he say of the sixty- o weeks, and yet is professedly analyzing passage.

Mr. Baldwin concludes that there are 70 eks between the commandment to build rusalem and the crucifixion. Daniel ex- ly says there are 62 weeks. Mr. Bald- n reasons, with good show of reason, that the 24th verse, when the prophet says, to make conciliation for iniquity, and make end of sins," he means the crucifixion; and asmuch as "70 weeks are determined" tween the commandment to build Jerusa- m and the making reconciliation, therefore ere were "seventy weeks" between the mmadment and the crucifixion; which ould no doubt be well enough, if the pro- het did not expressly say, only "threescore nd two weeks."

But is not "the making reconciliation," making an end of sins," &c., the crucifixion? : that is a question. It is not a question, owever whether the "Messiah being cut , but not for himself," means the crucifixion. This Mr. B. and everybody grants ut if this refers to the crucifixion, it is cer- in that cannot because the same event cannot be distant from the going forth of the command by 62, and also by 70.

The 24th verse refers, Mr. B. says, "to the crucifixion, and to the closing of the canon," and "to the beginning of the mystic prophetic period." Three events that must in their nature be wide apart. As to the canon, it was not written till after Christ was crucified, the apocalypse long after, and the roll must have been written before it could be sealed. Is 70 weeks the exact measure of the distance of each of these three separate events from the "decree of Cyrus?"

But what of the other items of this verse—"the bringing in everlasting righteousness," and the "anointing of the Most Holy?" Are these also of the date of the crucifixion, of the closing of the canon—either, or which? Or rather, have they not all reference to the events of the 2d Psalm? We take it, as it is given, that 62 weeks measure the interval between the commandment to build Jerusalem and the cutting off of the Messiah.

Mr. B. will give us two periods for "70 weeks," a "secular" and a "sabbatic;" but can he, by either secular or sabbatic theory, make 62 weeks equal to 70 weeks? As he says not a word about "sixty-two," I conclude he cannot.

I suggest a prophetic problem. In the 25th verse it is stated that there were sixty-nine weeks from the decree of Cyrus to the coming of the Prince Messiah. Now, if it were 69 to His coming, how could it be 62 weeks to His death? and if 62 to His death, how is it that it is 70 weeks to His making reconciliation for iniquity? "Let him that readeth understand." But by what authority does Mr. B. make "70 weeks" to mean 560 years? By virtue of his "DISCOVERY" that sabbatic time is to be added to secular time? Then by saying, as 70 weeks is to 560 years, so is (1) one week to the number of years in a sabbatic week, he obtains his guage for measuring prophetic time. But what has the 560 to do with the "70 weeks?" Why, they are but different ways of saying the same thing—viz., the interval of time between the decree of Cyrus and the crucifixion. Who says so? The prophet? I beg pardon, the prophet says no such thing. He says expressly that it was 62 weeks. Now if by hair-line calculation "70 weeks" are "discovered" to mean "564 solar years and 116 solar days," then 62 weeks mean 499½ years of solar time; a considerably shorter period than the time which intervened between the decree of Cyrus and the crucifixion, and quite a blunder for so old a prophet as Daniel.

Mr. B. supposes that "a week" may be either "secular" or "sabbatical." He says, page 449, Formula 1st: "If to 490 we add one-seventh for sabbatic time, we shall have 560." If the Sabbaths are already in the 490, I do not see by what authority "we" put them in again. Seventy times 7 days are 490 days (or years, as they are interpreted.) What Sabbaths there may be in prophetic years, is not the question, so long as prophetic "weeks" are being estimated. Daniel writes it "weeks," which includes the sabbatic time, as a Jewish week always included a Sabbath. "If we add one-seventh for sabbatic time!" But how can we? Did any week ever consist of 8 days? I suppose, after putting in all the Sabbaths, Mr. B. adds in all the "Sundays," and so furnishes the full tale.

But "weeks" are not always the same "weeks;" some are longer and some shorter; conveniently so, if one is allowed to put in sabbatical sevens quantum suff. As "weeks" are made up of "days," and "years" are made up of "weeks," it follows that every prophetic period of Scripture is in some sort a multiple of the number, "seven;" so, by an ingenuous mind all periods, from a week to a jubilee, and from that to 7,000 years, can be obtained by sabbatical "calculation."

But to return somewhat. The sixty-two weeks—let us look closely: "AND AFTER THREESCORE AND TWO WEEKS, THE MESSIAH SHALL BE CUT OFF, BUT NOT FOR HIMSELF." Can this refer to the death of Christ? I think it can to nothing else. Did any one ever suppose that it referred to any other event? No—not even Mr. Baldwin. But if that be so, the prophet has not in the "70 weeks" prophesied of the death or the coming of Christ. The 62 weeks are, then, the only unmistakable period in this prophecy, and they measure the time that elapsed between the "going forth of the commendment to build Jerusalem" and the death of Christ—say a period of "564 years and 116 days of solar time." Mr. Baldwin will have to make a new guage, even according to his own rule; a 62:564 guage, instead of a 70:564 guage. I commend you, sir, to "50,000" and one calculations, and Mr. B., sir, through you—that is, if you think with Mr. B.

But if the 70 weeks guage goes, what becomes of the "coincidences"—the long list of "democratic" events which have startled the silence of two wildernesses—those which are yet to disturb the repose of one entire world? What of that illustrious band that came over, by a miraculous coincident, not through the sea dryshod; they and their little ones; making a fire on the Plymouth Rock, to warm their shivering selves and cook their food; of which the Rock of Horeb in a blaze, surrounded by that vast trembling "democracy" of Israel, is no mean type? Or of those "thirteen" corporations, including Wm. Penn's "Benjamin," that settled one by one all along shore; so like the 13 disciples, including the one by lot; or those "thirteen" who were so typical of all sinners, "upon whom the tower in Siloam fell;" or, moving from the apostolic and the legal to the prophetic, those twelve yoke of oxen with which Elisha, the son of Shaphat, ploughed the wilderness, he himself holding the plough and completing the number thirteen; or those equally significant thirteen tribes of patriarchial days? And what becomes of this great Yankee Nation, covered with glory, having annexed all the rest of mankind, the prefiguration of which Mr. Baldwin recognizes in the "Ancient of Days;" a power of discernment which, I should suppose, might see General Washington foreshadowed in the Messiah. And what of the fate of that Great Red Dragon that gave us birth—Great Britain? What of her armies, her Church and State, her Wesleyan Methodism, her British and Foreign Bible Society, her great missionary societies, which irrigate the nations with the gospel, all now so rampant, so full of the spirit of martyrs, if not of their blood? Painful question! What becomes of all those persons, facts and things, now that there are no "seventy weeks" to calculate from! And, say you, they are all suspended upon the "70 weeks?" I do—the whole. What! the whole 480 pages? Yes, all; they all stand upon the 70 week—"discovery!" It's dreadful to think that so fine a "fabric" should leave "not a rack behind." O, never mind, console yourself; these delightful, long-sought horrors will maybe come by some other calculation, some shorter guage may yet be found, and the "millenial release" (of Cuba) be even nearer than Mr. B. proves it.

"But can it be possible that this country was left out of prophecy? * * * the alone proscribed nation in all the prophetic calendar?" But you see, my friend, we or "1776" are in the book that John swallowed, and in the seven untold thunders (Rev. x., 4, 10;), which is not so very bad after all. Indeed, from the inadequacy of language to do us justice, I for my part, prefer it this way; it carries a meaning of internal security, and the majestic reserve of a great power, like ourselves; it leaves us uncommitted to any particular fate; and yet secures us a considerable position in prophecy.

However, as for those Apocalyptic connoisseurs who conceit themselves the spectators of the fortunes of our poor world; or, those fifth-monarchy prophets who seem bent upon hurrying up the judgment to secure a benefit; who, impatient of the fates, often go up beforehand in their big fancy, and, floating high at leisure, thence look down with sadness upon crumbling dynasties, wounded dragons, solemn ruins, fierce dissolving elements and horrid (home-made) armageddons, they must console themselves by remembering what Swift says to those who were continually looking for his death:

"My good companions, never fear,
For though you may mistake a year,
Though your prognostics run too fast,
They must be verified at last."

Yours, TUSCULUM.

THE PAST AND THE PRESENT.

NO. III.

THE CONTRAST.

Bro. McTyeire—The "Minutes of the Annual Conferences," of which you took occasion to speak, contains a vast amount of the names of men who claimed to be "moved by the Holy Ghost to preach the gospel." In view of the frailty and corruption of human nature, it is no marvel that some of these should have mistook their calling, and even made shipwreck of their faith. The only wonder is, that the number of such has been comparatively small. The labors and hardships incident to an itinerant life, in times past, and the duties prescribed in the discipline, and rigidly enforced, were so onerous, that the remark in the discipline sometimes proved true: "Then, likewise, no preacher will stay among us who is as salt that has lost its savor." Moreover, the compensation was too small for those who cared more for the fleece than the flock. But at present the fields of labor are contracted; many rules prescribed lay dormant, and the pay is better; and some may, and no doubt do, cling to the itinerancy, who are as salt that has lost its savor. Mr. Wesley did not doubt but that the Methodists would continue to exist as a people, but said, in substance, that "unless they continue in the doctrine, discipline and spirit in which they set out, they would only exist as a dead sect." The favorers of innovation, "progress," &c., may start back and cry "croaker," but there are fearful omens of such a state of things.

If a want of zeal, and of the unction of the Holy One—the neglect of class meetings—the neglect of discipline—"the putting on of gold and costly array," &c. are sad omens, they are visible to sense.

The first volume of bound Minutes of the Annual Conferences, published in 1813, is a sealed book to the multitude, few of the present generation ever having seen it. These Minutes commenced with the first Annual Conference held in America, in the year 1773; the preachers numbered 10, and the membership 1,160. Then the names of men professing to be "moved by the Holy Ghost to preach the gospel" began to appear on the Minute, and the number of preachers raised up in America began to increase gradually, notwithstanding the difficulties and distresses attendant on a revolutionary struggle. So that in ten years, at the close of the war, the preachers numbered about 60, and the membership about 14,000. And although the labor was arduous and hazardous, and the annual allowance or quarterage only "£8, Virginia currency," yet few, very few names of preachers disappeared from the Minutes. The work was of God; it was "Christianity in earnest;" and the men gave incontestible evidence that they were really moved by the Holy Ghost to preach the gospel. They were, to be sure, accounted, as was Peter and John, "illiterate and ignorant men" by the fastidious and worldly wise. The truth of the historian Hawe's remark was strikingly exemplified—thus: "The plain story of the illiterate man, telling of the sufferings of Christ and the glory that followed, has done more in converting men to real Christianity than all the great polemics put together." But at present there is reason to fear that there is a tendency to rely too much on, and to glory too much in, education, eloquence, fine talents, honorary titles, fluttering eulogies, &c. The secret of the success of the early preachers was, that they were deeply imbued with the spirit of their mission, and carried with them much of the unction of the Holy One. They were men full of faith and of the Holy Ghost, wholly devoted to God and his work; and signs followed.

In traveling from the General Conference at Baltimore, in 1800, in an afflicted state, I heard the excellent William Waters preach, in the neighborhood of Alexandria, Va. His name appeared on the Minutes in the year 1774. After enduring hardness as a good soldier for many years, he had "located, through weakness of body or family concerns;" but was still a living minister, a pillar in the Church. On reaching Glocester Circuit, to which I was appointed, the first house I entered was the plain residence of the venerable Lee Roy Cole. The name of this worthy man, eminent for talent and usefulness, appeared on the Minutes in the year 1777. After many years of hard and useful service his name disappeared from the Minutes; but he was still an able minister of the New Testament. He filled my appointments while I was prostrate at his house with bilious fever, and was ever ready to encourage and sustain young preachers who were able to render effective service.

The following year, 1801, I traveled Greenville Circuit, Va. Here, in Old Virginia, I found these eminent ministers, Edward Drumgole, John Easter and Ira Ellis, who had been the early pioneers of Methodism, and the instruments of remarkable revivals of pure religion. Their names had appeared on, graced, and then disappeared from the Minutes; they occupied a local sphere of action, but were the salt of the earth, beacon lights to young ministers, and examples to the flock. Barnabas McHenry was "moved by the Holy Ghost to preach the gospel" at an early period in the history of the Western country. He traversed the mountainous regions west of the Alleghanies as early as 1789–'90; passed through a savage wilderness to the then limited settlement called Cumberland, (now Middle Tennessee) where he labored usefully, although ever exposed to danger from prowling savages. He was also one of the instruments of the remarkable revival of religion in Kentucky, in the years 1790–'91; under whose ministry the writer embraced religion. He was a man of commanding talents, but of plain, unpretending demeanor and ardent piety. He, too, located through weakness of body or family concerns; but continued to adorn the Christian ministry until his decease, in the year 1833 or 1834.

The humble name of the writer of these brief sketches appeared in the Minutes in the year 1794, and disappeared in 1806. The toils, hardships and afflictions of twelve years had enfeebled a vigorous constitution; necessity—having a family, drove him to the plough, the hoe and the axe; but not to surrender his holy calling. To preach every Sabbath, and often in the week, was his common practice. A new country—preachers scarce—the Macedonian cry pressing—he had enough to do, and did do, without fee, reward or ostentation—more than many now do with good salaries. His pilgrimage has been prolonged; he neither knows nor inquires wherefore. A. SUPERANNUATE.

LAST WORDS.

"Oh! I Could Die Six Deaths to Save One Sinner!"

The last words of a dying Christian are always fraught with more or less interest. It has been the writer's privilege to witness the happy exit of many a saint from "earth-born woe and care" to the home of the blessed; but never has he, under such circumstances, heard an expression which struck him with so much force, or which more fully illustrated the effect of our holy Christianity upon the human heart, than the words written above.

They were among the last words of a most lovely young lady, who died in this place a short time since. They were uttered at the conclusion of a most impressive and affectionate exhortation to an impenitent young friend to be a faithful Christian and meet her in Heaven. It was spoken with a degree of emphasis which evinced that it was the language of a heart overflowing with a sense of the divine reality of our blessed religion.

What else could have dictated such an expression? She was rational, calm and self-possessed, entirely free from mental alienation. Could she have been influenced by anything but a profound sense of the priceless value of an immortal soul?

But is it true that Christ, by his death, has so illumined the darkness of the grave as to enable a timid girl of twenty years to be willing to pass through the same ordeal so many times to save one soul? Yes, "Death is swallowed up in victory."

She had always dreaded death. But when the hour arrived, that hour to which all are hastening, she felt that death has no sting, that her faith had triumphed, that Christianity was true, that Heaven was a reality, that her precious Saviour was with her to accompany her through the "valley of the shadow of death." Said she "Jesus has made it easy to die."

But this was no deathbed conversion. It was the closing scene of a life which, from early childhood, had been spent in the service of her Heavenly Father. Reared in the lap of piety and brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, when but a child she professed faith in Christ, and gave evidence of a conscientious devotedness to His cause.

Like most Christians, she regretted that she had done so little good in the world, and her full heart was burdened with the desire that in her death she might be instrumental in saving some one. Such was her anxiety upon the subject that all who came within the reach of her voice were made subjects of special exhortation to be faithful Christians and meet her in Heaven.

Who would not be a Christian for the privilege of dying such a death? Who would not deny himself of all that earth can give to feel, when dying, the earnest of a rich inheritance at God's right hand? Where is the young girl who would not be willing to renounce the fashionable follies of this life, and even have her name cast out as evil, for the certain prospect of a happy death and a glorious immortality?

Then let all the youth of the land imitate the pious example of the sweet tempered Helen M. Loveland, that their last hours may be like hers. T. Y. R.

RESPONSIBILITY OF LAWYERS.

"LAWYERS' SPEECHES NOT SLANDERS.—It was recently decided in Milwaukie Court, by Judge Larrabee, that a lawyer is not liable for an action of slander for words spoken in arguing a case before a jury or court. The decision was given in the case of John Jennings vs. James H. Payne, an action on the case for slander, where the defendant had said that plaintiff 'came into court with black perjury on his soul.' The Judge decided, though the allegations were both false and malicious, the defendant's position as counsel protected him."

The moral and legal aspect of that decision, if it was really made by the Wisconsin judge, are degrading both to bench and bar. It is about equivalent to declaring that a professional advocate is at perfect liberty to say anything he may please, irrespective of propriety and regardless of responsibility. The interests of his client ought to be fully protected, and he is justly allowed all reasonable freedom to discharge the duties which he may owe him. But false assertions and grossly malignant charges on opposing witnesses or parties in a suit are never a duty. It is shocking to intimate that a lawyer is not responsible for anything of this sort, and there is no surer way for a judge to lower his position than to give his sanction to a sentiment so irreconcilable with the common dictates of truth and justice. Whatever may be the privileges of the lawyer, he can never cease to be a man. Nor can he, in any degree, sink the duties of citizenship and the moralities of life in his professional relations.—Southern Times.

Foreign News by the St. Louis.

FULL PARTICULARS.

The steamship St. Louis arrived at New York on the evening of the 19th, with four days later intelligence from Europe.

The Royal Mail steamship Asia arrived at Liverpool on the 2d inst., and the United States Mail steamship Hermann reached Cowes, en route for Bremen, on the following day.

The War.

Scarcely had the Atlantic left Liverpool with the news of the great successes which had taken place on the part of the Allies against the Russians, than further intelligence in reference to their position in the sea of Azoff had reached England. From a dispatch which had been received at the Admiralty from Sir E. Lyons, at Kertch, dated the 31st of May, it appears that the squadron in the sea of Azoff had appeared before Genitchi, landed a body of seamen and marines, and after driving the Russian force from the place, had destroyed all the depots and vessels laden with corn and supplies for the Russian army. Only one man was wounded. Since entering the sea of Azoff, four steamers of war and two hundred and forty vessels employed in carrying supplies to the Russian army in the Crimea, have been destroyed.

The Moniteur, of the 4th inst., publishes the following dispatch from Gen. Pelissier to the Minister of War:

CRIMEA, June 1.—We have sprung two mines in front of the flag-staff bastion; the second explosion did considerable damage to the enemy. In the ravine of Caresning Bay, in advance of our works, our engineers discovered a transverse line of twenty-four cubic ounces filled with gunpowder, each forty centimeters thick in the inside, placed at equal distances and buried just beneath the sod. Each one, containing one-fiftieth of kilogramme of powder, is covered with a fulminating apparatus which would explode by the simple pressure of the foot. More cases have been taken up by our engineers.

Later advices from the Sea of Azoff state that the steam flotilla of the Allies has destroyed about two hundred vessels and six millions of rations of corn and flour destined for the Russian army at Sebastopol.

The Conferences at Vienna were formally closed at a late sitting held on the 4th inst.

The Morning Herald in a telegraphic dispatch dated June 21, states that the Allies have taken the town of Strangeobi, at the mouth of the Putrid Sea, burnt a month's rations of the whole Russian army, and destroyed the shipping. There is little doubt but that this account is the French version of the affair at Genitchi.

A dispatch from Prince Gortschakoff, dated the 20th ult., states that the Allies have occupied Kertch, but have not pushed inwards. He reports that in consequence of the measures which he has taken the Allies will not be able to cut off the communications of the Russian army.

The Post Gazette, of Frankfort, publishes a dispatch from Odessa to the effect that the Russians are raising batteries to command the channel near Genitchi, which connects the Putrid Lake with the Sea of Azoff. Another dispatch says that Gen. Oushakoff had arrived at Perekop with his division—four infantry regiments, each 3,600 strong. Gen. Grekenbeljeu had also arrived at Perekop with his light cavalry division, the third, consisting of four regiments, each 960 strong. These figures would give Gen. Gortschakoff a reinforcement of 18,000 men, a number which more exact information would probably reduce.

Letters from Berlin of the 1st inst., state that the successes of the Allies in the Sea of Azoff have made a deep impression there. It is observed that the large proportion of cavalry in the Russian army will cause the stoppage of supplies from the countries of the Don to be felt with peculiar pressure by the enemy. On the 23d ult., there were 190 cases of cholera at St. Petersburg.

News from Kertch in the 3d inst., state that everything was going on satisfactorily. Soujak Kall was evacuated by the Russians on the 28th May. They burnt the principal buildings, abandoned sixty guns and six mortars, having first rendered them unserviceable.

The Times received the following dispatch from their Vienna correspondent, dated Gelatz, June 1st: "There was a great fire last night in the artillery and cavalry stables, close to the ammunition depot. The Austrian garrison succeeded in extinguishing the fire, but one hundred and three horses were burnt.

A letter received from the French camp before Sebastopol, and dated May 22d, states that the Allies were on the eve of great events; everything was prepared. The last arrangements had been made in a counsel of war at which Generals Canrobert, Pelissier, Bosquet, Lord Raglan, Omar Pascha, Brown, Delli Marmora, and Admirals Bruet and Lyons were present. All the reinforcements had come up, making the French army amount to two hundred thousand men.

A telegraphic dispatch from Cagliari announces the death of the Bey of Tunis on the night of the first of June. His successor and cousin, Sidi Mohammed Bey ascended the throne without obstacle.

The Principalities.

The Austrians are acting with a high hand in the Principalities.

A letter from Constantinople of the 24th says: "Martial law proclaimed in the Principalities, and Bucharest in a state of seige, have produced at Constantinople a most painful effect. Count Coronini acts precisely as if he was in a conquered country."

It is also stated that the Austrians have expelled French subjects, and new complications are feared.

It becomes more certain also that Austria will maintain a neutral position as long as she can.

Position of Affairs.

The London Times of June 5th, says:

The formal dissolution of the Vienna Conference, which took place on Monday afternoon, is the most definite commentary we have received upon the situation of Europe and the prospects of the war. It terminates that state of suspense which was sometimes mistaken at home for a want of resolution, and abroad for a want of power. It consigns the protocols of the past spring to that limbo in which the diplomatic relics of this long controversy may be preserved. It teaches us to rely on our own resources for the success we hope to obtain, and brings to a decisive step the falterers and waverers in this contest.

[Correspondence of the London News.]

OFF CRONSTADT, May 28, 1855.—The fleet have at last ventured to sight the terror of our friends. Yesterday the Orion, Magicienne and Merlin went in pursuit of some small vessels; they followed them into a small place called Caporlo. The Dragon cut out three of these vessels, about 300 tons each, and made an attempt to bring out another vessel of 500 tons, but the number of Cossacks that came down to oppose them prevented their success.

The Magicienne then chased thirteen similar vessels, but was very soon obstructed in her chase by a battery of twenty guns opening fire on her, which she very bravely answered, but as yet we have not heard the result. The Merlin has been sent to her assistance. The Firefly takes the mails to Faro, and the Princess Alice takes them on from thence to Dantzic. The weather here is very cold as yet, and all the gunboats are in readiness for action. The Ajax and Lightning were in Nargen Roade when the Vulture passed through. She met several small vessels that were undesirable prizes, but Capt. Glasse having dispatches on board, and knowing the importance of his mission, endeavored to reach the fleet as quickly as possible, and did not lose his valuable time in boarding the enemy, and arrived here at 11, A. M., after a quick passage of fifty-four hours.

England.

Both Houses of Parliament met on the 4th inst., after the Whitsuntide and Derby races.

In the Lords the Newspaper Stamp Duties bill passed through committee.

In the Commons the adjourned debate on the conduct and policy of the war was resumed, and after a somewhat lengthened debate, was again adjourned. Mr. M. Gibson considered the Turkish territory now intact and safe, condemned the persistence in a war which he described as of indefinite extent, and only pursued in the vain desire for military glory. Sir W. Molesworth denounced the temptations which had been presented for the conclusion of a reverent peace, and contended that the safety as well as the glory of the British empire would be periled by any signs of cowardice or surrender of the high principles which constituted the real bond of union amongst the scattered elements of the English national grandeur.

Spain

According to the Espana of the 30th ultimo, there was every indication of the Carlist insurrection being concentrated in the Maestrazgo, and the Queen's authorities were collecting forces to enter that province on different points. A body of troops had been sent from Madrid in the direction of Hiendelaencina, to preserve order amongst the miners, attempts having been made, it is said, to excite them to insurrection. The Minister of War had received a dispatch from General de Bedoya, announcing that after a combat of two hours, he had just put to flight the faction of Marco de Bello, and taken eighteen of its men prisoners, and had captured some horses, and a quantity of arms and ammunition; also that General Thomas had subsequently made twelve of the same band prisoners. The general added that the insurgents were struck with terror. The governor of Saragossa had informed the government that the faction of Cabpe and Alcaniz, 110 strong, had been routed by the Queen's troops, and that two of its chiefs, one of them a priest named Buyson, had been shot.

Most of the factious bands in different parts of the country had, it is stated, dispersed; and in Arragon the revolted cavalry soldiers were in full flight before General Gurrea. The Cortes, on the 30th ultimo, adopted the fourteenth basis of the constitution. Two deputies, having got into an altercation, exchanged blows; and, in consequence of this outrage, the public were excluded, and the chamber held a secret sitting.

The accounts from the scene of the insurrection are, upon the whole, more favorable this morning. Small parties of prisoners have been brought in to various places. The brigadier second in command of the province of Arragon communicated to the Minister of War, at 10 o'clock last night, that the factious bands formed at Caspe, Alcaniz and Castilleras, had been met by the general commanding in the Maestrazgo and completely beaten. Two chiefs, Don Silvestre Buyran (a priest from Caspe) and Ignacio Masanillos, were made prisoners and forthwith shot.

The action was not very bloody, for only one man was killed. Arms, horses, and other effects were taken. The affair occurred on the 28th last. According to this statement of the chief, the band consisted of 110 men and 8 horses. A dispatch from Calatayud states that Marso's party was so completely dispersed that nowhere could more than four men be met with together. In the affair at Avanto, Brigadier Serrano reports that he had not a single casualty, so that the resistance of the Carlists must have been small or none at all. To counterbalance the favorable intelligence it must be observed that from the very dispatches received from the officers in command of the columns, it results that new bands spring up as rapidly as the old ones are defeated. General Gurrea, in a communication dated the 28th inst., speaks of the "faction of Garcia de Berges, consisting of some 200 men, many of them without arms." We learn the appearance of other small parties. The points upon which all eyes are fixed with anxious expectation are Catalonia and Navarre. There are reports in town this morning of disturbances in the former province, but up to noon there was no official intelligence on the subject. Up to yesterday evening Navarre and Biscay were tranquil. General Gurrea and the other officers commanding columns in Arragon display great activity.

At the opening of the Cortes to-day, a vote of thanks was proposed to the troops and nationals in Arragon operating against the Carlists. The Marquis of Tahunrigas opposed it, upon the very reasonable grounds that those forces had done no more than their duty, and that it was unwise to be prodigal of such distinctions, which gave rise to unreasonable pretensions. Nevertheless, the vote was passed unanimously, the Marquis himself sacrificing his opinions in order not to spoil the harmony. It certainly is absurd to see the Legislative Assembly, the representatives of the nation, bestowing the highest honors in their power for a few paltry skirmishes. On the same principal Brigadier Serrano is promoted to be Major General, for an encounter with wretchedly armed irregulars, in which he lost not a man.

The movements of the two Dukes and Duchess of Montpensier are uncertain. The Duke has repeatedly offered to take up arms against the Carlists in defence of his sister-in-law's throne, but the conflict is not yet sufficiently serious to induce the government to accept his offer. The Infanta's health being quite restored, it is possible that when she and her husband leave Madrid it will be to return to Andalusia. They will not leave before the 10th of June.

PARIS, June 3, 1855.—A telegraphic message from Madrid, dated the 2d, inst., says:

A dispatch from General Gurrea, dated May 31, announces the total defeat of the Carlist bands in Lower Arragon.

The government read to-day, in the Cortes, the project of the forced loan.

Russia.

[Berlin (June 2) Correspondence of the London Times.]

The Nordeutsche Zeitung publishes a statement, dated "the Russian frontier," to the effect that the appearance of the English fleet off Revel had caused "a great sensation in the capital, as well as along the whole coast of Esthland and Finland." It is affirmed that the veteran Yermoloff, who was the commander-in-chief of the militia, had ordered every druschine that was as yet organized to set out on its march for St. Petersburg, in the neighborhood of which two camps were to be formed, one on the north, the other on the south. Adjutant-General Von Sievers, the commander of the Baltic army, had beteken himself to the threatened point (Revel) for the purpose of conducting the defence; and it is stated that the approach to the town had been made inaccessible by sinking old unseaworthy vessels.

On the occasion of the Emperor's visiting Cronstadt, on May 9, he received a deputation of the inhabitants, who brought him, according to the Russian custom of welcoming a new comer, bread and salt. After a few expressions of good will, the Emperor exhorted them to—

"Pray to God for the peace of the soul of our Lord and Emperor Nicholas I., now resting in God. He loved you, and I will do so too. Put up your prayers to heaven; we will hold Cronstadt; and if God will there shall be peace, your trade shall improve."

Latest Intelligence—June 5.

The English funds were less, from the public showing a disposition to realize. Consols declined to 91¼, which was the last official prices. Bank stock closed at 208½ to 214.

In the Liverpool cotton market the demand was again good and the transactions exceeded 15,000 bales; 10,000 on speculation and for export at the extreme rates of the 1st inst.

SATURDAY, JUNE 30, 1855.

Music—R. Werlein keeps pianos at No. 5 Camp street, and music to play on them. We have a parcel of the latter on our table, fresh as a bird-song. Among the pieces is: "Little Daisy," (Ruth Hall's Daisy,) "Old Homestead," music by Warrel. The last is a very sweet piece, having soothed our ear more than once.

Accounts.—They are going out every week. We have to request brethren, when writing, to add a list of the post offices within their circuits, as annual changes, more or less, necessitate a correction of our list. If one should receive accounts belonging more properly to his neighbor of the next circuit, please forward it to him.

O, I Would Die to Save!—We recommend young ladies a solemn study of the death of Miss H. M. L., as described by T. Y. R.

German Reformator.—The first number of this paper will be issued in Galveston, Texas, the first week in August. They have received the type and fixtures pertaining to the German office; have the paper on hand; the editor, Rev. P. Mülling, is making thorough preparation, and will bring out a paper in the German language which, in taste, ability and interest, will be equal to anything of the kind. The second number will not be issued till October. The German preachers will act as agents, receiving it gratis. Price, $1. The American preachers cannot do a better work than help its circulation as much as in them is. Address Rev. P. Moelling, or Rev. C. C. Gillespie.

Rev. J. Lusk, P. E. of Covington District, writes on the 19th inst., from Clinton, La.:

"Some of our quarterly meetings, of late, have been attended with fine consequences. I left my quarterly meeting at Manchac on the second day; four accessions; many penitents at the altar for prayer; a deep state of religious feeling through a large congregation.

We have five pains through this portion of the State."

Abbeyville, Ala.—The postmaster, to a letter of business, 20th inst., adds a P. S.:

"A fine meeting going on at the M. E. Church in this place. Last night there were fifteen anxious inquirers at the mourner's bench, although there was but a slim congregation, on account of a hard rain falling. The night before there were twenty-five at the altar for prayer; and I do hope they will all be converted. Much is doing here for the cause of God."

We learn from the Montgomery Journal that the Hon. H. W. Collier, of Tuscaloosa, died a few days since, of jaundice, while on his way to Blount Springs. The deceased was once Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama, and subsequently Governor of that State.

Prize Essay.—"We have just stereotyped," say the Nashville Book Agents, "a pamphlet entitled 'The Claims of the Christian Ministry to a Support: a Prize Essay, by S. H. Browne.' The prize ($200) was offered by the Louisiana Conference for the best essay on the support of the ministry. Five MSS. were submitted to the committee, who gave the award to that of Mr. Browne."

Decrease of Roman Catholic Priests.—We extract from the Philadelphia Roman Catholic Herald the following item of domestic intelligence, referring to the concerns of their Church in Philadelphia:

"Whence come Roman Catholic priests to this Diocese of Philadelphia—or rather, from what quarter comes the material out of which they are fashioned? Few of these young men are from France, comparatively few are natives of this country, and without doubt the main portion of the supply is of Irish origin.

Catholicity is not likely to be a very fashionable creed in this country for many years, if, indeed, it ever become so; and few of the best portion that Roman Catholic parents, rich or poor, are likely to desire for their children in the ministry of Roman Catholicism. Weak, well meaning fathers and mothers, won't encourage their sons to an avocation that will bring to their offspring obloquy along with it. So that the States are not likely to supply the ranks of the priesthood with many soldiers; and although hitherto Ireland, in the exuberance of its Catholicity, has been supplying us with as many priests as would meet the exigencies of the mission here, still it cannot be doubted that the Hibernian supply is on the decline; and every year brings us less priests from that country, and less young men desirous of becoming priests, than the preceding year did."

Teachers' Meetings.—Periodical meetings of the teachers are among the most important parts of the Sunday school system.

Religious Tests—Catholic Disability.

Our Sphere—Eighth Article of American Platform—Principle at Stake—Catholic Interference—How to be Met—Misfortune to the Controversy—Evils—Practical Effects—Disastrous.

The sphere of our discussions is moral, religious and ecclesiastical. Beyond this we do not purpose to extend our remarks upon the Eighth Article of the "American Platform." While presenting our readers with a summary of events making up the current history of the day, and which it behooves them to know, we have steadily recognized an implied covenant toward them, not to meddle with their politics; to cast not a feather's weight on either side of questions dividing them as citizens of the State. If on our part this covenant has not been faithfully kept, this we can say, with a good conscience, we have tried to keep it, and are ignorant of any infraction. And we shall keep it to the end.

No mawkish sensitiveness, however, shall prevent us from speaking out on a subject even with a political complexion, falling within our sphere.

The proceedings of the Convention lately assembled in Philadelphia, whose platform is published in another column, were watched by us with great interest. Ecclesiastical matters were early introduced. An attempt was made, principally by Southern men, to throw them out. But the "Catholic test" was affirmed, and finally reaffirmed. "The Roman Catholic Church" is named distinctly. "Resistance" to it is propounded among the things credenda and the things agenda. If we read correctly, every Catholic is proscribed. He may be an American—native, good and patriotic; he may stoutly and practically deny the power of the Pope in civil matters as an inference from the ecclesiastical. Yet, for his religion's sake, he is barred "advancement to all political stations—executive, legislative, judicial or diplomatic." This is a test to which our religious principles and republican instincts, the spirit of our institutions and the liberty of conscience, as interpreted by the age, are all opposed. No party holding it, however excellent be other principles held in combination, may expect to pass before the conservative people of the United States, especially of the South. It cannot budge a step—it cannot stand, with this millstone about its neck.

There are thousands of the best men of the old parties who sympathize in the movement for an essential modification of our naturalization laws, who see danger in the immigration of felons and paupers, and the power of unnaturalized persons by voting in Territories, to shape the character of States; but they will neither pursue or accept it upon conditions impairing religious liberty. If the two be disjoined, they go for the former; and in their ranks many of the naturalized. Former party attachments would be sacrificed to this end, but religious liberty never. We are glad it is so. We rejoice to believe this sentiment is imbedded in the heart of the country. It proves our civilization a thoroughly Protestant one.

No one suspects us of Popish affinities. The "corrupting tendencies" of the Roman Catholic Church we take every occasion to expose and counteract. The Pope is a king as well as a priest, having his soldiers and his jails. His cardinals are ministers of state, of war, of finance. The organization has ever shown a tendency to political interference, and presented a difficulty in the application of religious toleration. But the difficulty has been solved, and this is the solution:

"The maintenance of the right of every man to the full, unrestrained and peaceful enjoyment of his own religious opinions and worship, and a jealous resistance of all attempts by any sect, denomination or church to obtain an ascendency over any other in the State, by means of any special privileges or exemption, by any political combination of its members."

An open Bible, public schools and a free press are good defences against Catholics and Protestants; for all men love ascendancy, though all denominations have not equal instincts for it. If the Methodists ever so far forget their high calling and wander away from their foundation as to intrigue for special privileges, or form their members into political combinations, we hope they may encounter "a jealous resistance." So of any other sect, denomination or church. If in their ecclesiastical character they stand about the ballot box at the call of the highest bidder, mark him that bids, and apply to the sect so prostituting its influence a moral and local remedy.

Heretofore the religious element of the order was doubtful; in some places acknowledged, in others repudiated. Up to this authoritative declaration of the Convention the case did not address itself to us. Had the religious feature been left out of the platform we should now have nothing to say. There are principles set forth in it challenging respect and assent, and doing honor to those boldly avowing them—as, the cultivation of a national and American spirit, the faith of compromise, reverential obedience to the laws, the Bible in common schools, and the unequivocal ground taken upon the constitutional rights and institutions of the South.

Beyond the principle involved, there are grave considerations of expediency. A misfortune has befallen the controversy as between Catholics and Protestants. Our opponents have suddenly been put at immense advantage.

The sympathies of a powerful party are unavoidably with them. Public speakers and journalists are become their apologists and eulogists. Invidious comparisons are drawn between Catholics and Protestants, in disparagement of the latter, and by those who have hitherto thought and acted otherwise.

A comparatively feeble sect has been elevated into undue importance. According to the representation of the census, in 1850, the Roman Catholic Church has but 1,112 churches, which can accommodate only 621,000 hearers! Not one-eleventh of the number of churches belonging to the Methodists, scarcely more than one-eighth of the number of the Baptists, not one-fourth the number of the Presbyterians. It has not one-thirty-third of the whole number reported, while Methodists have more than one-third, and the Baptists nearly one-fourth.

And this handful a party aspiring to nationality proposes to resist!

If the General of Jesuits himself had been in council he could not more effectually have devised to weaken the Protestant and aggrandize the Catholic cause.

Should this platform succeed to the government, we shall be put back where England was before the act of Catholic emancipation. This is taking steps backwards—back of ourselves.

It gives Catholics the tremendous benefit of persecution. That cry will rally to any sect-hosts of noble spirits, who otherwise would hold it in religious abhorrence.

Many who were hanging loosely by the skirts of Catholicism, and being gradually but surely disintegrated from its communion, are fired with new zeal and compacted by the sense of oppression.

The weapons of this warfare are not carnal. We acknowledge the kind intentions, but decline the alliance of politicians. It is burdensome. This controversy belongs to us—Protestant Christians, Protestant churches, Protestant journals and societies, as such. We want no direct or indirect aid from Government in managing it, believing that if let alone, with truth on our side, we can bring it forth to victory.

Evils of Church Aristocracy.

The charge of being an aristocratic Church is such a soft impeachment, and carries such a flattering implication, it is not always repudiated as it ought to be. The actual evils of it may perhaps open the eyes of those who are blinded by the compliment.

A correspondent of the Christian Witness (Boston) puts the case undisguisedly:

"Mr. Editor—I am glad to see in a late number of the Witness an extract from some Methodist paper, accompanied with some editorial remarks, touching the character and mission of our Church in this country. That we have given some reason for this, I have no doubt. * * * Our want of success, therefore, is to be found in something else than our organization. And if we have exhibited a proud and aristocratic spirit, it comes not from the nature of our institutions, but from the wickedness of the human heart.

How shall this evil be corrected? I answer, in two ways. First, our clergy must unbend themselves and take hold in earnest of all kinds of work in which it is proper for the ministry to be engaged. I like to see white cravats and black coats, but when these stiffen a man up so that he cannot put his hand and shoulder to anything; when they keep him away off from the multitude, prevent his climbing up into garrets or down into cellars; when they make him fit only for the drawing room and the society of ladies, then I think they are a great hindrance, and had better be pulled off. This it is which makes people think we are very aristocratic. But I am sorry to believe that this spirit of seclusion and separation is very common among us. In the great work of moral and religious reform in the world our clergy stand aloof. They will criticise and find fault, but they will not take hold and labor with all their might to make matters better. One is afraid it will dirty his coat, another that it will ruffle his collar, and another that it will soil his fingers; or, in plain speech, it is beneath their dignity. Now this was not the course of the Savior or of the Apostles. They went everywhere, and engaged in everything which tended to benefit and bless mankind. They were called all sorts of names, and treated with every kind of indignity by the genteel people. No doubt they were thought to be very vulgar and undignified.

The second way of correcting this evil is for our people to allow and encourage their own ministers to engage in every good work. Many a clergyman would be glad to take hold along with his fellow-men and help on every good work; but he is restrained and held back by his people in the parish. They are willing the Methodists and Baptists should do these things, but it is altogether too common and undignified for an Episcopal clergyman. In my judgment, the people have a great deal to answer for in this particular. They operate as a hindrance; and while this is so, we ought not to wonder that our Methodist, Baptist and Presbyterian brethren leave us in such a small minority."

A Child's Logic.—"How many brothers have you?" said a gentleman to a little boy. The child mentioned the number, adding, "and one in Heaven." "No my son," interposed his mother, "you have no brother in Heaven." "Yes I have," persisted the young reasoner. "Didn't you tell me that God was my Father, and that Jesus Christ is the Son of God? Then He must be my brother in Heaven!"

"And Jesus called a little child unto him, and set him in the midst of them, and said, Verily I say unto you, unless ye be converted and become as little children, ye shall not enter the Kingdom of Heaven.

LETTER FROM BISHOP ANDREW.

The Conference—State of the Church—Comparative—What has been done—Is there need of the Methodist Church South in California—Case Examined—Decided—Health—Return.

Mariposa, Cal., May 28, 1855.

Dear Brother—I believe, when we parted, you requested me to write you as soon as I had a chance to look around at the state of things in this country. Since the adjournment of the Conference, I have been traveling so incessantly as to allow but little time for correspondence, and even now, you must accept a brief and hurried epistle.

To the main subject then, viz., the prospects and necessity of the Southern Organization in this country. The session of our Conference was a precious season, specially to the preachers. From the commencement to the close, the presence of God was realized, and the preachers left for their different fields of labor full of confidence and hope as to the future. Some seven or eight preachers were admitted into the Conference; six were received by transfer; three had returned to the Atlantic States during the year, and they had lost a probationer by death, giving to the Conference a net gain of some nine or ten preachers.

The membership amounts to some nine hundred and forty—an increase of about two hundred during the last year. The Missionary collections of the year amounted to some eight or nine hundred dollars. Now take these facts in connection with this, that during the past year nearly one-third of their work had no preachers on it, and that through the whole year there was but one Presiding Elder in the Conference, that the grumblings and muttering of those hoding prophets of evil in the Atlantic States who seemed determined to kill off the Southern Church here right or wrong, had been wafted to these shores and seized on by those who were inimical to us, to discourage our brethren by giving it out in private and in public that we intended to abandon California, thus blocking up our way and rendering many people who were with us in sentiment and policy dubious about the perpetuity of our church, and preventing them from uniting with us in church fellowship: I say when all these things are considered, it strikes me the wonder is, not that we have succeeded no better, but that we have lived at all. And small as the exhibit is, I believe that in several respects it is about as good a showing as that which has been made by some of the Atlantic Conferences for whom preachers and editors claim considerable regard.

But is the Southern Organization necessary, and may not the Southern people who are in California be gathered and cared for by the preachers of the Methodist Church, North? To this I reply there are thousands and tens of thousands of Southern people in this country. In some places the majority of the population is Southern in its character and affinities; and in almost every place they constitute a very respectable portion of the community. To this class of the population our Northern brethren can have but a very limited access. Some from the Southern and South-Western States have, in many places, united with them, because there was no Southern church in reach; but these are comparatively few in number. The great body of the people referred to, will never unite in church fellowship with a church, whose abolition tendencies are so strongly marked, whose pulpits so often give utterance to this anti-Nebraska gospel, whose press teems with articles denunciative of slaveholders, and which numbers Uncle Tom's Cabin amongst those publications suitable for circulation as a Sunday School book.

Men who would fear to cross salt water to reach this country may gravely sit down and decide that Southern Methodists who are here ought to identify themselves with the Church North, and may talk as prettily as they choose about the oneness of Methodism every where; yet a large proportion of the Southern people who are here will never support the institutions of that Church; nor would the very men who thus write, do any better if they were here.

An abolition lecture on the Sabbath and in the house of God would be just as acceptable to a Methodist in Mississippi or Alabama as it is to a Southern Methodist in California; and the hundreds and thousands of worldly men here with Southern affinities will never be reached by the preachers of the Church, North. The Southern Church must supply these people with the Word of God or they must perish. We can reach them; we can have access to them; and by the aid of the Holy Ghost we can save many of them. Shall we abandon the effort? For one, I answer, no, never. But let us rather with quadrupled energy and zeal apply ourselves to the work of evangelizing the thousands who dwell on these lovely plains and valleys, and who delve for gold in these mountain gulches.

But I hear a brother whose eye looks with economic vigilance on the dimes, exclaim, "We have spent thousands upon California, and after all this outlay of money and men, what have we to show? Only a few hundred souls: this is bad economy: it wont do; let us call home our men and let the money be applied nearer home."

Let us examine this matter a little more closely. Upon the principle urged by this objector, all the churches should call home their men from the Pacific Coast—for I hazard nothing, when I give it as my deliberate opinion that, all things considered, the Southern Church stands numerically as well as any other church in the State. Let us see: The Northern Methodists were here before us; they have been comparatively well supplied with preachers, numbering as they do about sixty travelling and forty local preachers, and yet they number only about two thousand members, and they have probably the largest number of communicants in the State, except the Roman Catholics. Now, if the smallness of numbers renders it necessary that we call off our forces, the very same reason would require that every other Protestant church should do the same; and then what? Why this fair land would be abandoned to the Pope and the Devil.

The fact is, this way of deciding upon the continued occupancy of our missionary field, by comparing the dollars expended with the souls converted, is rather a doubtful process, unless there could be a standard established, by which it could be fairly settled how many souls a thousand dollars should convert. If this were settled, we might know how to act. Perhaps it might be well to call a convention for the settlement of this momentuous principle.

But I must leave this subject now. I may possibly address myself to it, more at length, hereafter. I may just add, that hitherto, God hath sustained me. I am eating no idle bread here. Yet my health is good, and I enjoy almost uninterrupted communion with God. This is a lovely country, and I wish I could ramble over it for six months longer, but important obligations call me home. I expect to sail in the steamer of the 10th June. Shall probably go the Nicaragua route."

Yours affectionately, James O. Andrew.

Heart Gleanings.

A pleasant instance of a father's love is within our knowledge. A few days since a gentleman sent his wife and infant child up the river for their health, the mother being unable to suckle her little one. In order that the baby should not suffer, he purchased a valuable milch cow, and put her on board the boat, and then hired a servant to take care of the cow!

We have another fine instance of a father's tenderness. A gentleman who lost his wife last year, in a Northern State, had occasion to visit this city and remain here a few months on business. His child—a bright little girl of three summers—he could not think of leaving behind, although she was being excellently well taken care of by near relations. So he brought her along, and brought also a young lady relative to take care of her. He could not endure our city boarding-houses, and so rented a cottage, purchased furniture, and went to housekeeping—all for the pleasure of seeing his little one come running to meet him when he went home in the evening, and for the privilege of tumbling with her on the carpet when ever he felt like it—such luxuries not being fashionable in a boarding-house. A few days since the gentleman finished his business, sold his furniture at auction, and left for home, having spent upwards of a thousand dollars for the comfort of having his child with him. The great charm of this child was that it was so very like its mother.

As affectionate as either of the above fathers, we dare say, was the father of a graceless young scamp within our knowledge, whose heart, if it gleams anything, gleams only Satanic fire of "purest ray serene;" some mention of which may not be inappropriate in this connection. This father, a well known citizen, well to do in the world, was killed by a steamboat explosion a few years since. The disaster left an amiable wife and several children—of whom our scamp was one—without a means of livelihood. The little property of the family was soon exhausted, and they changed their abode to a cheap cottage in the suburbs. In time they became very poor, and want would have seized them in its iron embrace, but for the generosity of a relative in a distant city, who forwarded them a monthly allowance of twenty-five dollars, as well the kindness of a city officer, who gave our scamp—a lad of seventeen—a situation for which he was incompetent, at a salary of forty-five dollars a month. Our scamp, however, had imbibed the dandy mania during his prosperous days, when his father lived, and now, although his mother and sister could not afford butter to their bread or milk to their coffee, he could not come down from broadcloth and patent leather. He squandered nearly all his earnings upon himself, and was at length discharged for neglect of his duties. Being a "gentleman about town," he must needs keep up his old airs, and so he expended twenty-five dollars for a revolving pistol, a new pair of patent-leathers, and a lot of big cigars.

We know our readers will find it hard to believe, but it is an actual fact, that these twenty-five dollars were the monthly pittance sent by his relative to his mother, which he, by an easy breach of trust, had appropriated to his own use. Meantime, a young gentleman who had known the family in their prosperity, desired to pay his addresses to our scamp's sister, a girl as angelic as her brother was brutal, but found the family in such a state of poverty that he could not visit them with decency. The widow, too proud perhaps to make her wants known, and not having energy sufficient to curb the ingrate she had brought into being, submitted patiently to his heartlessness, until, in the midst of her poverty and despondency, she was attacked by cholera. The daughter attended to her mother nobly, and in the course of a few hours was herself stricken down. Kind neighbors then flocked to their bedsides, and did all that lay in their power, while the young man, knowing that his mother and sister were writhing beneath the scourge, kept away from the house. At last death announced his approach; and while the poor widow lay on her bed, past pain, and her life-current ebbing slowly away, her son passed through the room smoking a cigar. With a mother's last, fond yearning for her offspring, she beckoned him to her bedside; but he refused, with a harsh remark, and passed on without turning his head; and that was the last she ever saw of him, for she expired an hour afterward. A few hours after that, the daughter followed her mother to the invisible land, her brutal brother having never once been near her. As it is fashionable to sit up with the dead, the young man that night observed the fashion; but smoked his cigars, and deported himself in a manner which showed the utter absence of human feeling in his heart. On the following day the widow and her daughter were buried, by charity, as cheaply as they had lived and died; and as it is fashionable to wear crape for the dead, the model son and brother put a strip of it on his hat, and now sports it as an additional embellishment to his dandyism. There is no particle of fancy in this story, good reader.

We are confident that this young man was as good when born as the generality of baby-kind, but that his present callousness is owing to his having been badly raised, petted, and permitted to consider himself before all other things. Callousness is the sure result of such breeding, and the example of our scamp should be a lesson to all parents.

From Rio Janeiro.—We are placed under obligations to Capt. Graves, of the bark Panama, for copies of the Jornal do Commercio and Correio Mercantel, of Rio Janeiro, up to as late a day as the 22d of May.

There is nothing of importance to be found in the papers. The Legislature is in session, and a variety of measures have been introduced and discussed—none of any moment, however.

There was a great regatta in the middle of the month, attended by the Emperor and Empress, sundry French and English boats, but no Americans.

OUR NASHVILLE CORRESPONDENCE.

Nashville, Tenn., June 17, 1855.

Mr. Editor—If anything could inspire me with a wish to gratify the curiosity of your readers respecting on dits from the City of Rocks, surely this enchanting weather would. The atmosphere is cool, clear and bracing, and one cannot breathe it without feeling amiable; a feeling heightened by meeting, wherever, we go, with faces answering back to ours brightly and hopefully. Of course there are croakers who would outstare all the pleasant things in the world, if they could, and wrap not only themselves—for which nobody cares—but every one they meet in a winding sheet of dismal fancies. The melancholy Jacques is still wandering in the forest, but I, for one, will have nothing to say to him.

The Nashville Female Academy has just closed another session. A large audience assembled to witness the closing exercises of the last day, which, as usual, were interesting. Diplomas were given to thirty young ladies, and all parties separated well pleased with the morning's entertainment. Something has been told me of a dancing master who is employed in this institution, by the Principal, just as the other teachers are; a thing which, for the credit, not so much of Bro. C. D. Elliot, as for that of the Methodist ministry and the Church at large, I was not disposed to believe, until no room was left for doubt. It is said that a young lady, belonging to an honorable and wealthy family in an adjoining State, herself a member of our Church, on being urged by Mr. Elliot to take lessons in dancing, replied: "No, sir! If I had no objections myself, nothing should induce me so to wound the feelings of my father." Young ladies who have been educated there, on being reproved for dancing, have answered: "We were taught it in a Methodist preacher's house!" On inquiring how this thing could be permitted, I was told that on a former occasion some attempt was made to put a stop to so glaring an impropriety, to say the least of it, on the part of a Methodist preacher, but that the Discipline did not condemn him, and therefore his brethren could not. What say you, Brother McTyeire, would the Discipline have permitted such a thing in our Church twenty or thirty years ago? and what difference is there, under this sort of dispensation, between Christians and people of the world?

The High School, recently established here, has also been holding its examinations for a week or two past. Most persons are well pleased with its various arrangements, but the building accommodations are yet insufficient for the number of pupils.

Speaking of public improvements reminds me that not long ago I had the pleasure of going through the Capitol. It is a magnificent structure, and would do honor to any city either in the old world or the new. No pains or expense have been spared to render it complete and elegant in all its details. But the most interesting feature in the whole building, to me, was the burial place of its architect. Permission having been obtained from the Legislature, he selected the place and prepared his tomb in one of the marble blocks composing the northern wall, and a few months afterwards they laid him there to "sleep the sleep that knows no waking." An inscription on the outside tells to visitors what is within. It was a beautiful and fitting idea, that he who planned this architectural poem should lie down amidst its massive grandeur to await the final summons.

Mr. Gray, a distinguished civil engineer and bridge builder, has just completed two very handsome plans for another wire suspension bridge across the Cumberland, or as it should be called by all lovers of good taste, the Sewanee river. One of these contemplates erecting it where the Publishing House stands; the other, at the foot of the wharf. Either position is eligible, and the bridge will be a magnificent addition to the public adornments of the city.

Our German missionary, Rev. Mr. Barth, is doing a good work here. Subscriptions to the amount of fifteen hundred dollars have been obtained for building a German Methodist Church, and some of the ladies are now interesting themselves to get up a supper, the proceeds of which will be given to assist in finishing it.

You have before this, I suppose, received the March number of the Home Circle. The engraving of Charleston is a beautiful thing, and said to be an accurate representation of that city. Mrs. J. T. H. Cross, one of its most valued contributors, has just passed through Nashville, on her way to Kentucky, where she purposes spending a part or all of the summer.

Dr. Stevenson arrived here a few days ago, in an apparently dying condition, but has revived again, and is slowly recovering. His spirit and perseverance in his appointed work are wonderful. The Book Committee were in session day before yesterday, and determined to give the Doctor leave of absence for six weeks in which to recruit his health. It is supposed that if not better at the end of that time, he will resign his arduous office. I understand that the committee bought out the Charleston office and Depository, but without assuming their liabilities, or claiming the advantages of any existing accounts.

The editors and their families do not feel quite settled in their new home. Some are for going into the country, others for staying in town. We Nashville folks like them all very much, and hope it will not be long before they are comfortably "at home" for the next three years, and as much longer as it shall please the General Conference to leave them with us.

By the way, your correspondent H. P., to whose supercilious fling at Armageddon you directed attention in a late issue, is perhaps hardly aware that the lofty air of irony and scorn which he assumes necessarily implies a supposed possession on his part of vastly more learning and logic than belong to Professor Baldwin. In that respect he is probably quite alone in his opinion. I am no apologist for Professor Baldwin, or for his book, but know him to be a man of extraordinary learning; and one of the most distinguished lawyers and statesmen of Tennessee said of his lecture, the other day, that it was one of the most learned and powerful arguments to which he had ever listened. Would it not, H. P., be acting a more manly part to invite Professor Baldwin to a free discussion of some one of the ridiculous doctrines of Armageddon?

Missionary Reports.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South.

Catoma Mission, Ala. Con:

I now send you the report of the Catoma Mission, Alabama Conference, for the first and second quarters. If I am correctly informed, this is among the first colored missions established by the Alabama Conference; and I am glad to say the state of the Mission is good and somewhat encouraging. I have taken in five appointments, at one of which there was never any preaching before; making in all twelve, all served on Sabbaths but one, once a month. Four have joined the Church, two have been expelled, and one died. I catechize fifty or sixty children, and some of them are learning very fast.

War Prophecy.

The English papers say Dr. Cumming has recently been plunged into great disrepute by a most unfortunate philological blunder. The Doctor read in some penny magazine an absurd statement that Armageddon, in the Hebrew language, had the same meaning as Sebastopol in Greek, and not having the intelligence or sagacity to put the matter to the test, he proceeded, upon the basis of this discovery, to lay open the seals, trumpets and thunders of Revelation, proving, no doubt, to the satisfaction of his sheep, that the siege of Sebastopol is the final battle of the world, and that when it is over the new heavens and the new earth will dawn. As the Duke of Newcastle would say, the splendid discovery "grew upon him;" as Lord Clarendon would add, his mind "drifted" into it beyond recall, until at last the imposture was detected; for every scholastic reader at once discovered that Sebastopol and Armageddon had no more linguistic affinity than Bonaparte and Bashan; indeed, much less. Dr. Cumming, however, notwithstanding this discomfiture, sticks to that part of his text wherein he says that the end of the world will happen in the year 1865.

Free Thinking and Free Inquiry.—A manifest and important distinction is here set forth:

"The distinction between free thinking and free inquiry is marked and unmistakable. The free thinkers denied that any truth in relation to philosophy and religion was settled by those who had gone before them, and settled none themselves; and, according to them, in our search after truth we are to be always beginning. They were, besides, infidel to truth and credulous to error. Whereas the free inquirers consider some things well settled and established, especially Revelation and the facts and doctrines contained in the Bible; and they seek to arrive at its true interpretation by "searching the Scriptures" and "reasoning out of them," in the use of all the instrumentalities afforded by the light of all nature and human learning."

Country News.—The Shreveport South-Western is about as valuable a country paper as we receive, and contains all the local news of the region in which it is located. The last number that has come to hand contains the following items of useful information, which we clip to show the world that matters in Louisiana are not so bad as we have had reason to suppose they were;

We daily receive most cheering accounts of the growing crops. The rain of Wednesday night extended throughout the parish, and was of incalculable benefit to vegetation. A friend writing to us from Elysian Fields says:

We had a heavy rain last night, the first to do much good since the crops were planted. I have not seen within the last five years so fine a prospect for a heavy cotton crop as we have at present. Blooms made their appearance a week ago.

Cotton Bloom.—We have received from W. A. Jernigan, Esq., of Bethany, Texas, a fine cotton bloom, plucked out of one of his fields on the 20th of May.

No inconsiderable amount of complaint is made by persons doing business between this city and Shreveport, on account of the inefficiency of the present mail arrangements. There is no reason why it should require a week for the transportation of the mails from New Orleans to Shreveport, and we are not astonished that the sufferers should occasionally give vent to their indignation. The South-Western says:

There is no regular mail conveyance for papers between the two cities, although they might without any additional expense or trouble regularly arrive and depart three times a week. According to the new schedule, the mail lies over three days between this place and Alexandria, and it takes it a week to get through to the mouth of Red River.

Missouri River Rising.—The St. Louis Republican, of the 22d, received intelligence by a private dispatch from Weston, dated Wednesday, 20th inst., of a rise of fifteen inches in the Missouri at that point, and still rising. There was a dispatch from Lexington yesterday, which stated that a rise of ten inches had taken place at that point. This will be cheering intelligence to the traders in that river, and there is every prospect of a continued swell, as rains have been plenteous all through the Missouri country.

Deaths.

Gone to rest in the better land, Sister C. Cox, in the 46th year of her age. Seventeen years of her natural life were spent under the child of God. She was a member of the M. E. Church. She labored with pleasure and honor to the cause of Christ. The work was chronic, and well calculated to test human nature and make one peevish and fretful. But she had learned to trust in Jesus, who, through her protracted illness, never failed to bestow grace to meet every emergency.

J. M. JONES.

Yellow Bluffs Circuit, Miss.

Sister TAICE was about thirty years of age. She was born and raised in Marengo county, Ala.; had been a member of the M. E. Church about eight years. She lived a quiet, happy, Christian life, and died a triumphant death on the 31st of May, 1855. Her friends weep for her. May they imitate her good example and meet her in heaven.

C. C. CALLOWAY.

Jamesborough, Ala.

DIED—In Holmes county, Fla., May 27, Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, consort of S. Williams, in the 37th year. For the last thirteen years she was a zealous member of the M. E. Church, adorned by a meek and quiet spirit. She leaves a disconsolate husband and ten children, with a large circle of friends to mourn her loss, but not as those who have no hope.

C. F. BRITTON.

DIED—On the 9th of June, THOMAS NELSON, infant son of of W. A. and M. J. Shelton, aged 11 months and 23 days.

DIED—On the 16th June, JOHN ALEXANDER, infant son of B. F. and Mary Ashley, aged 19 months and 3 days. Jesus said, "Suffer little children to come unto me."

SEPTENARY COLLEGE OF LOUISIANA.

The Septenary College of Louisiana is located in Jackson, La., 12 miles east of Bayou Sora. Its location is beautiful, retired and healthy. It has commodious buildings, a large library, a good chemical and philosophical apparatus, a well selected mineralogical and geological cabinet, and a full Board of Instructors.

The section of the Southwest is but poorly provided with academies and proprietory schools, there is connected with the College a Preparatory Department, in which all necessary instruction may be received for entering College proper.

The College is now in a highly prosperous condition, and under the management of the present Board of Visitors and Faculty it promises permanency and extensive usefulness.

FACULTY:

JOHN C. MILLER, M. A., Professor of Mental and Moral Science.

WM. H. SCALES, M. A., Professor of Mathematics, Natural Philosophy and Astronomy.

J. HOLCOMBE, A. M., Professor of the Greek Language.

J. WILEY, A. M., Professor of the Latin Language.

THOS. S. JONES, M. D., Professor of Natural Science.

Our Home Correspondence.

UNION CIRCUIT, ALA. CON.:

We are having some very excellent meetings on the Union Circuit, at different points. We have just closed a very interesting meeting at Rehoboth. It was a time of great refreshing to the Church. We had some conversions and some accessions. We are looking forward to better times.

June 20, 1855. W. H. ARDIS.

NEW IBERIA CIRCUIT, ALA. CON.:

The Lord still visits this part of his vineyard with revival showers. We have just closed a five days' meeting at New Iberia. Twelve persons professed to obtain the full assurance of their acceptance with God, and seven joined the Church. The membership were greatly blessed. They had broken up their fallow grounds, and were prepared to receive the gracious showers when the time of refreshing should come from the presence of the Lord. Brother N. A. Cravens, of Franklin, was with us all the time. His preaching was mighty, through God, to the pulling down of the strongholds of Satan and the building up of true spiritual religion.

June 6, 1855. B. F. ALEXANDER.
JESSEE JENKINS.

EAST FELICIANA CT., MISS. CON.:

God has been with us on this Circuit in power and great glory. The aged and the young, the father and the son, the mother and the daughter, the brother and the sister, have come to the altar of prayer together; they have united in the communion of the Church; and together they have taken upon themselves the badge of our holy Christianity—the outward sign of an inward work of grace in the heart. We have made one round of sacramental meetings on this Circuit, using the ordinary means of grace, preaching Saturday and Sabbath. Some have been made happy, some have joined the Church, and others have been made to weep and say, pray for me. We have had three quarterly meetings, the last of which came off at Olive Branch, on the 9th and 10th inst. This we continued six days, preaching twice every day. Sixty-five whites joined the Church, many of whom were soundly converted. Many were heads of families—valuable men and women; others were young men of promise, some of whom, I trust, will stand on the walls of Zion when we shall cease there.

Brother Lusk, the P. E., was with us every day; preached under the influence and power of the Holy Ghost to the hearts of the people. Brother J. J. Wheat, of Clinton, was with us three days and a half; preached four times, with good effect. Brother Price, from the adjoining circuit, was with us one day. Brother Higginbotham was with us until just before the meeting closed, singing, praying and talking with his usual zeal. But all were convinced that it is not by might nor power of man that the work was done, but by the Spirit. O, how much of Christ and how little of man should be seen in all our preaching! We still pray, "O Lord revive thy work."

P. E. GREEN.

DALEVILLE, LAUDERDALE CO., MISS.:

Within the last two or three weeks fine rains have fallen, as far as I have heard, east and south of this, with an occasional neighborhood excepted; but commencing one mile west of this, and exteading over several counties, with very little exception, there has been almost no rain since the 5th of April, and very little, in most places, on that day.

It may be stated as a fact, that a large amount of the cotton crop in those dry regions is not yet up, and some persons have been actually planting over and replanting as late as June. Those who planted early have generally good stands of cotton, which looks well and promises a good yield. Corn, however, has stood the drought nearly as long as it can.

We hear of great destitution all around us, and no corn for sale at any price. Some of those owning mills are deserving of the gratitude of the people and the blessing of Heaven for their noble philanthropy in withholding their corn from their stock, that they may supply the people with bread, while a few others, of whom I have heard, are withholding hundreds of bushels they might spare, for fear they will not make enough to do them next year. It gives me pleasure to say these cases are few and far between.

To make the matter worse, the oat crop is almost a total failure. Those who sowed wheat have made pretty fair crops, and should be admonished by this timely relief of sowing more grain, especially when corn is scarce.

Under the present "Mississippi Liquor Law" the retail groceries have suspended, with perhaps one, and at most two exceptions, in this county. Those who contended that more liquor would be consumed under the "gallon law" now see they were wrong. A great change for the better is the result of it. This all are bound to admit; especially when it is remembered that many opposers of the law actually give liquor free, and use all their influence to get others to drink on public days. The march of temperance is onward; and every Christian should unite in offering up the most devout and sincere prayers to God that the time may soon come when our children can be permitted to visit public places without being exposed to that alluring vice which has engulphed thousands in endless ruin. The gallon law has been tried here before, but for so short a time that its enemies, by using all their exertions to bring it into disrepute, succeeded in their object. Let it remain in force several years, and all will see the most beneficial and moralizing results.

Your readers have learned through Bro. McMeann of some revival influences upon Lauderdale Circuit, and I believe the people generally are looking and praying for a revival; which may the Lord grant, as we are needing such a result. The "great iron wheel" has not yet crushed us; and the only harm it can do will be to increase the sectarianism and bigotry of "The True Church."

June 16, 1855. JAMES B. RAMSEY.

FIGURING.—An English mathematician, named Bailey, has been for some time past engaged in weighing the earth. Here are his figures: 1,250,195,676,000,000,000,000,000—or in words, one quadrillion, two hundred and fifty-six thousand one hundred and ninety-five trillions, six hundred and seventy-five thousand billion tons avordupois.

SUMMERING.

At this pleasant season of the year, when the skies hoocme olear and cloudless, and the sun looks warmly down on green grass and growing trees; when the corn shoots up its leaves into the pure air, to be waved to and fro by every wanton breeze; when the brooks and great streams sweat in the noon-tide, and every living thing looks for shade as the highest good, those who have been for months cooped up within city bounds begin to cast about for some place of resort where they may temporarily enjoy the pleasures of country life and escape the reflected heat of bricks and mortar. Even those who are in and of the country themselves are subject to an unaccountable and oft-times uncontrollable inclination to follow the habits of the birds and change their residence with the changing season. Trunks and valises are packed for an exodus to some new region, and a few weeks of the year are taken from business and devoted to recreation.

The great question that arises on the very threshold of this determination to go, is where to go. The extended means and ambition of a few carry them across the Atlantic, but the many are content within lesser limits, and only look to such gratification as can be found in some of the one and thirty States that count up our Union. Even in this contracted space some difficulty of selection is found, and it becomes a mooted point whether the summer's journey shall tend to New England, Newport and the North; to the half-unmapped regions that lie about the head of the Father of Waters; to the sweet springs and fountains which gurgle joyously amid the hills of Kentucky and Tennessee; to the Georgian retreats, glorious as Tampa, where Naiades and Dryades seem waited for by the falling waters and waving oaks; or to the shores of the Gulf, ever washed by waves that have whitened in their long ocean journey.

There are many who think that a summer's jaunt is without the laurel, the oak or the olive, unless it extends to the Northeast and has its terminus at Newport, Saratoga or Niagara—unless it leads to some crowded spot of fashionable resort where the rustling of silk is greater than the rustling of leaves, and the noise of the piano stronger than the music of the breezes. Such may be given over to their folly and to all the inconveniences and annoyances attendant upon crowded hotels, small rooms, bad cooking, and constant dressing. The wiser emigrants fly to a purer atmosphere, and find health and enjoyment where no books of fashion nor French cookery have ever been heard of; where the great attractions are the rivers and brooks, the trees, the hills, the drives among mountains and dales, the tall grass jeweled with flowers, the breezes fresh from ocean or prairie, and all those other things belonging exclusively to country life. For the few weeks allotted them, they live a healthy and hearty life—become invigorated in body and mind, and return strengthened for another season of life in the city.

It has always seemed strange to us that this latter class, whose search is not after display and the exhibition of dress, should be able to find no haven of rest on this side of the line that Mason and Dixon long since marked out. There are in the Southern States pools as pleasant, brooks as gushing and joyous, mountains as green and umbrageous, and fields as broad and pleasant as can be found in the North or West. The scenery of Georgia is not surpassed by that of any other State in the Union; Tennessee, Kentucky and Arkansas, are seemingly made for tourists and travelers; Northern Alabama has hills and mountains, falls, prairies and cold springs in untold abundance; North and South Carolina and Virginia are rich in scenery and every needful attraction for those who wish to while away a few pleasant months, amid scenes more moist and pleasant than meet them here, where every day the long lines of sunlight are reflected back a thousand fold by every brick wall and granite pavement.

Within our own borders can be found every needed or needful gratification for our own people, without troubling the agitators and fanatics of the North. Let our citizens spend their money among those who are their friends, and not travel long leagues to enrich those who turn instantly around and denounce them. In all material matters, in all the results of nature, we are rich beyond compare. There are summer resorts and watering places, mountains and caves here at home, surpassing all that can be found in the North, from Mackinaw to Umbagog. It will only be the part of wisdom for our Southern travelers to patronize, build up and establish Southern summer retreats, which, in their day, will become more famous than Saratoga or Newport, and hereafter draw from the North as the North now draws from us.

NEW ORLEANS AND JACKSON RAILROAD.

The Jackson (Miss.) True Witness, of the 21st instant, has the following with regard to the Jackson and Great Northern Railroad, which we transfer to our columns on account of its clearness and truthfulness. If the people who reside on the line of the road are awake to their own interests, they will instantly take hold and secure the completion of a great enterprise, which will in a few years be doubly repay them for all the outlay and expense they may be called on to make. The road is already finished and working from this city to the State line. It is in actual operation elsewhere, and only needs some work done at different points to be in a condition for transporting passengers and freight from Cairo to New Orleans. The amount of capital now needed is very small, and one-fifth of the amount lost to planters during the late drouth would build the road from here to Chicago.

The True Witness says:

If there is anything which ought to interest the people living in that portion of our State which lies between New Orleans and Jackson, it is the completion of this road. To attempt to enumerate the many advantages of this road, would take more time and space than we have at present to spare. The simple question of interest alone should prompt every man to come forward and say the road shall be built. And no man living within reach of it, who is not blind to his own interest, will withhold his subscription. How can any one within ten or even twenty miles of this road hesitate, when he knows that its completion would at once double the value of his land, while it would furnish for him at all times a ready market for everything he might raise. We know lands in East Mississippi that could not be sold for 25 cents per acre before the railroad to Mobile passed through them, which cannot now be bought for $5 per acre. And this is the fact in relation to all the lands wherever railroads have been built. Let every man, then, consult merely his own pecuniary interest, and the road will be built with the least possible delay.

NEW STATUES BY HIRAM POWERS.—A correspondent of the Springfield Republican writes from Florence as follows:

"I hasteaed on my arrival to visit the studio of our countryman, Mr. Powers, the sculptor. He was not in then, but I was politely conducted about it by one of his workmen, who led me at once to the statues of America and California, on which Mr. Powers is at present engaged. The former is nearly finished, from a beautiful piece of marble, but the model of the latter is not yet out of the hands of the artist. In these statues the sentiments of pathos and simplicity of nature which, in his statue of the Greek Slave, won him so much praise, has been laid aside, and that of allegory and history, to which belong vigor and grandeur, is taked up. It remains to be seen if he succeede as well in that region of art. I understood that these statues were not yet disposed of, but that the artist makes them to indulge his fancy, expecting, however, that he can find a ready purchaser for them in America. In one room I noticed busts of several of our countrymen and women were being made—a very nice way to get a counterfeit presentment, if one can afford it."

School Literature.

[From the "Sun-Beam"—conducted by the Young Ladies of the First District High School, Second Course.]

OUR SCHOOL DAYS.

When we have become discouraged and weary with unsuccessful attempts to solve a difficult problem, how often do we exclaim, "Oh, how I do wish my school days were at an end, and I released from the thraldom of school life!" Is it right that we should entertain such thoughts? If our first attempt should prove unsuccessful, might not the second or third succeed? There are too many of us who look upon our school days as the disagreeable portion of our life, and are continually sighing for the pleasures of society. We do not consider that the most pleasant and profitable employment is in sowing the seeds of knowledge, and in watching and promoting their growth. If we would think of our school duties, not as tasks, but as useful pleasures, the time which ought to be spent in study, might not be wasted in vain wishes for the end of our school days.

THE HISTORY OF AN OAK.

I was once a small acorn, suspended on a branch of my mother. I was blown by a gust of wind to the ground, and, becoming covered with dust, I remained there for sometime. The rain fell upon me, when suddenly my little cup bursted, and my leaves began to peep through the earth. I continued to grow until I reached my present height. Many generations of human beings have passed away since I was an acorn, and many were the swings that hung upon my branches. They have all rotted, and the children that owned them have grown to be men, and now rest in the cold embrace of the grave: I still live, and wave my branches in the gentle breeze.

DUTY.

If you wish to know what duty is, ask of that noble minded youth what sustaining nature enables him to bear the scoffs and sneers of willful companions, and to pass through the trials and temptations which assail him. He will answer, duty to God. Inquire of the gentle and suffering wife what strengthens her to conceal by silence the sorrow caused by a profligate and inebriate husband, and she will answer also, "Duty to God, and to myself, gives strength and support to my aching heart." Demand of the destitute and impoverished how they can submit without a murmur to the will of God; and they again will answer, duty. Ask of the bereaved and heart-broken what renders them able to bear with patience and resignation the loss of their dear ones; and their answer will be the same—duty!

WHAT DOES HE DO FOR A LIVING?

This is a strange question, is it not? I think so; but it is by no means an uncommon one. How often and how forcibly is this question suggested to our minds in passing one of those fashionable coffee-houses, or drinking saloons: "What does he do for a living?" Most probably the billiard saloon or card table can answer it; if not, it is indeed a hard question. We often see the wreck of what might have been an honor to the human family, with bloodshot eyes, and uncertain steps, which are sure signs of nightly and frequent debauch, issue from one of these fashionable dens of iniquity, or sitting at a card table, engaged in a game of chance. How sad is the sight! And if we were to follow him home, we might find a heart-broken mother, wife, or sister, keeping their almost unceasing vigils; or perhaps the poor fellow has no one to care for him. If the latter be the case, the question "What does he do for a living," is most forcibly suggested. "What does he do for a living?" will never be answered with satisfaction until the day of judgment.

MOREDUN.—Our readers may recollect that a romance by this name, by Sir Walter Scott, has been announced by a Mr. Cahany. It has lately been published in England, and is announced as in the press here. All the English papers agree in calling it an imposition.

The Illustrated News of the 2d of June says:

"If Mr. Cabany was deceived the public has not been; the published Moredun (so the world of London letters has pronounced,) is not the work of the author of Waverly. Its author is not a "Great" but a "Little" unknown. The book is beneath criticism. There are many clever copies which have something of the spirit of the original; but this Moredun has not a grain of merit, even considered as an imitation. From the first page to the last it does not show the faintest spark of the genius of Sir Walter Scott. The style of the book is uniformly fist and vapid, and often affected and turgid, and its attempts at wit are without a vestige of Scott's genuility; in short, the publication of "Moredun" has given it its quietus. No evidence, however ingeniously got up, can stand against the intrinsic evidence of its utter worthlessness."

HONOR AMONG THIEVES.—"Reb. the house, but don't abuse the people," was the injunction of the leader of a band of burglars to his subordinates when about to start on a professional expedition. It must have been one of the best of the gang who was the hero of the following story: A young man stood indicted in a London criminal court for having stolen at night into a young lady's room, clambering over neighboring roofs, and having robbed her of certain jewels. The barrister, who found nothing upon which he might rest a decent defence of the prisoner, suggested to the jury that perhaps the young lady, a woman of irreproachable character, had made an appointment with the prisoner, had given him the jewels, and finding she would be discovered, had seen no other escape from disgrace than turning her lover into a criminal. The judge was going to stop the slandering lawyer, when the prisoner rose and cried: "Sir, that is not in your brief; what you say is not true, and I would not be acquitted at this rate." The bench assured the prisoner that his conduct should have its weight in settling the amount of punishment for his crime.

One of the most penurious of bachelors, this afternoon after attending the opera, was guilty of making a gift under circumstances somewhat original. He entered a millinery store, and accosting a very pretty attendant, inquired the price of a hat which he saw in the window. She took it out, and in order to show its beauties, placed it on her own head with just pluck enough to make it taking. The old bachelor admired it, and pulling ten dollars from his pocket book, concluded to buy it. The attendant took the money, and with pencil in hand, inquired where she should send it.

"Wear it yourself, my dear," was his blunt reply as he left the store. [Boston Gazette.

It is stated that arrangements have been made at Southampton for the accommodation of the Vanderbilt line of steamers, which hereafter will take their departure from Europe from that port instead of as heretofore from Havre. They will leave Havre and Southampton on the same day.

The Abingdon Virginian states that the recent poisoning of a wedding party in Scott county was not an accidental circumstance, but designed. A mulatto man belonging to Mr Kane, and a white man and his wife and daughter residing in the neighborhood, are suspected of having committed the deed. The persons who were poisoned have all recovered except Mr. Hilsbop, whose death has been heretofore announced.

Extensive fires in the woods, have prevailed recently in many parts of Vermont, on account of the recent drouth. In Woodbury, farm after farm was swept by fire, eight dwellings were destroyed, and forests of timber, together with about three thousand rods of fence, were utterly consumed.

LATER FROM MEXICO.

The mails by the Orizaba, and a portion of her passengers, reached the city on Tuesday morning, the vessel being still detained in quarantine. We understand that only those passengers who could show that they had been acclimated, were permitted to come to the city.

By this arrival, we have dates from Vera Cruz to the 22d, and from the city of Mexico to the 18th, but the news is neither of interest nor importance.

On the 20th of May a tremendous tempest occurred in the department of Coahuila, which destroyed an amount of property estimated at $25,000.

The General President had returned from his Mirbacca expedition, and although numerous skirmishes are spoken of in the papers, and invariably reported favorably to the Government arms, it does not appear that any decisive blow has been struck. The last news from Santa Anna and his forces received here, by a previous arrival, left him on his march from Patsouaro to Arlo, where it was said a force of 2000 insurgents had assembled. We see in the papers no account of the result of this movement, and presume it ended as do most nots of his Serene Highness, in nothing.

The cross of the Order of Guadalupe has recently been conferred upon a number of persons, among them the editor of the Trait d'Union and Don Anselmo de la Portilla, a distinguished Spanish writer.

On the 13th of June, Santa Anna issued a decree granting full amnesty and pardon to all persons who had taken part with the revolutionists, (excepting those against whom might be preferred particular charges of crime,) on condition that within thirty days they should lay down their arms.

The news of the outbreak in the northeast, and the capture of Montorey by the Revolutionists had reached the city of Mexico. What effect this information had, however, upon the minds of the people or the authorities, cannot be ascertained from the remarks of the Mexican press. El Heraldo quotes from a San Luis paper an article which states that the occurrences in northeastern Mexico were of a character entirely distinct from those of the interior, and that the Government would immediately concentrate forces at San Luis Potosi, sufficient to prevent the further progress of this new rebellion. It remains to be seen whether Santa Anna, after a futile attempt to crush the Revolution in the south—and with many of his own troops pronouncing against him, as at Victoria—can muster strength to crush the still more formidable uprising in the north. There is every indication that his Serene Highness is (or was at last accounts,) standing above a mine, whose explosion will send him and his wretched mockery of a government sky-high.

A treaty of peace and alliance has been effected with the Apache Indians. Its conditions embrace a mutual delivery of all prisoners, and the Indians are to return whatever spoils taken from the Mexicans as may be in their possession. As a compensation they are to receive sundry presents of cattle, provisions, etc.

Robbers continue their depredations upon the inhabitants and upon travelers. A diligence containing a number of persons, and among them an officer of the army, was recently stopped on the high road between Toluca and the city of Mexico by five men, who, without the least trouble, relieved the passengers of their valuables. The officer was deprived of his sword and pistols, which he had not attempted to use in his defence.

The Vera Cruz papers inform us that the Icousis were committing extensive ravages in that department.

ARKANSAS.—Recent papers from Arkansas speak favorably of crop prospects in that State. The Washington Telegraph has the following paragraphs.

The earth is no longer parched, and the crops, revived and refreshed, never looked better, nor has the prospect for many years been more promising. Corn that was planted early enough may now be considered safe, and with another seasonable rain or two, the crop in South Arkansas will be greater than it has ever been known before. Cotton has also greatly improved, and the prospect is flattering. If the crops ever were in better condition, or gave greater promise of an abundant yield, we do not recollect the time when.

The quantity of cotton yet remaining on Red River and its tributaries to be shipped, is estimated at 100000 bales. The number of bales above the raft in this cotquiation, is put down at 26000. We think it will exceed that number.

Col Fuller, of the U. S. Topographical Engineers, with a number of hands, has commenced the work of opening a navigable channel around Red River raft, through Bodley's Bayou and the lakes. Col Fuller, it will be remembered, made a thorough survey and examination of the work last fall, and is fully satisfied of its practicability. The river has a natural tendency to force its way through the channel which Col. Fuller has commenced improving.

THE LEVIATHAN STEAMSHIP.—The London correspondent of the Philadelphia North American, in his letter of the 7th inst., says:

I paid a visit a few days since to Scott Russell's establishment, to observe the progress towards completion of the leviathan steamer, building for the Northern and Eastern Steam Navigation Company. It is impossible to describe the feelings with which one surveys this monster of the deep. It puts to flight all ideas of marine vessels previously entertained. I remember looking with marvel at the Illimaiya, which was absolutely as long as one of the streets of Southampton, alongside of which she lays; but this vessel is twice the length of the Illimaiya, for her length is nearly seven hundred feet, and her depth seventy feet. Her tonnage is 24,000.

It is supposed she will be ready for her trial trip early next spring, which will be to your shores. She is expected to make the journey from England to the United States and back in fourteen days. Her first chartered voyage will be to Australia, from her port in Milford Haven, and it is calculated that she will perform the distance, 12,000 miles, in thirty-two days, just half the time taken by that splendid clipper ship James Sirines, built by Mr. McKay, of Boston, U. S. She is expected to maintain an average speed of fifteen knots per hour. She will hoist no canvas. When launched, it will be accomplished by hydraulic pressure, and broadside on.

FALLING OF THE WIRE SUSPENSION BRIDGE AT NASHVILLE.—Loss of Life—The Cholera.—We have been favored by a friend in this city with an extract from a letter dated Nashville, June 18, which gives an account of the destruction of the wire suspension bridge at that city.

On the evening of the 17th, as a loaded wagon, drawn by two horses, and accompanied by four persons, was crossing over it, the bridge fell, carrying the people, horses and wagon with it to the river. The four persons, as well as the horses, were killed by the fall, and the bridge is a total wreck. We believe this bridge stood at an elevation of from eighty to one hundred feet above low-water mark. The same extract informs us that there were many cases of cholera at Nashville, and much alarm was felt by the citizens on account of it. [Delta.

METEORIC PHENOMENON.—The Mobile Register of Tuesday says:

"A meteor of exceeding brilliancy passed across the heavens on Sunday evening. It first appeared as a bright light in the south, about the size of an ordinary Astral lamp shade—thence it shot towards the earth in a Northwesterly direction, leaving a dazzling stream of light to mark its rapid course. The noise of passing through the air was distinctly audible, and like the sound made by an ascending rocket. Every color of the rainbow could be traced distinct as in the Arc of the Covenant; and when it suddenly disappeared, all objects seemed enveloped in that entire darkness which we observe after a vivid flash of lightning, which blinds one for a moment and then leaves everything in total gloom.

The Mobile Tribune, of Sunday, has the following paragraphs:

Hope has been so long deferred in regard to the freighting business and the prospect of any thing but a temporary rise in the rivers being very uncertain, most of the large class boats, we understand, have gone or are soon going into summer quarters. The Dalmau has gone into Pearl river—one or two have gone up to the head of navigation on Pish river, and several others will follow during the week. So, the small craft will have every thing to themselves.

The telegraph brings news from Tuscaloosa that heavy rains have fallen there, and that the Warrior river had risen at that point two feet, and was rapidly rising on the 22d inst.

THE DIAMOND SNUFF BOX.—The diamond snuff box, sent by the Emperor Napoleon to an old friend and former confrere of his in this city, was yesterday sold at auction under an execution for $800. The gentleman to whom it was sent is Mr. Louis A. Depau. He is a relation-in-law of Col. Thorn, of this city, and the husband of his wife's sister is the Baron or Count de St. Pierre. Equerry to the Emperor, whose wife was one of the Empress Eugenie's first maids of honor. Mr Depau took his yacht, the Sylvia, over to Europe a year ago, and unsuccessfully contended for a prize in the British regatta. Mr Depau will take legal means to recover his valuable present, which was intercepted. He resides at New Rochelle. [Correspondence of Albany Express.

LATER FROM THE PLAINS.

A SERIOUS WAR THREATENED.

Reported Capture of Fort Laramie.

[Correspondence of the St. Louis Intelligencer.]

JEFFERSON BARRACKS, June 8, 1855.—On Saturday, a Mr. Hollibaud, a Frenchman, arrived from Scargeant's Bluffs, and states that "Four Bears," the chief of the Kittle Band of Sioux, had just come in, bringing with him thirty lodges. That they left the main body of the Sioux at Bear Creek, coming 300 miles west of Fort Laramie, twenty-five days since, and that at that time the Sioux had 150 wagons, plenty of flour and meat, twenty women and children, and among them two negro women. From this we think they must have taken a Mormon train, bound from Salt Lake to Bear Creek, where we know they intended making a settlement this spring. Nothing was said of seeing white men among them, and we have no doubt they were all killed. Four Bears is in favor of peace, has been to Washington, and knows the power of the whites, and finding his nation determined on war, has come in with his small band.

Hollibaud has for a wife, a daughter of Four Bears, and says he does not think his father-in-law would deceive him. Besides, Mr Vaviettes, and all the French here believe the report, and they have the best means of information.

The emigrants who passed from here three to four weeks since, have hardly had time to get beyond Fort Laramie, and we do not know of any trains leaving Independence or St. Joseph.

If course, we shall feel no evil effects of this war, more than any other part of the country, in a pecuniary view. It will scatter a great deal of money through Western Iowa. The country here is full of corn, cattle and horses, and Uncle Sam will soon make a great draft on them. Nothing less than 10,000 men can make successful war on the Sioux, and such a body cannot be supported in the wilderness except at an immense expense. The Florida war will be mere child's play. We will no longer see the statement of $30,000,000 surplus in the treasury.

If the war continues, and continue it must, for years—if it has commenced, it will make Western Iowa rich. War is awful, horrible, almost under any circumstances; but, if it comes, we much hope being near enough the scene of operation to supply the army with corn and cattle.

The Omahas received their annuity at Black Bird Hills a week since, and immediately came here purchasing goods and horses. They bought over seventy-five horses, paying fine prices—many of them as high as $100. It was an amusing scene to see the horse-jockey and the Indian on a trade. It is hard, however, to cheat them, as they are pretty fair judges of horse-flesh. The Omahas have become very poor, and had but few nearly all their horses—so this annuity was indeed a blessing to them. They are now tolerably well mounted, and with the Pawnees, start immediately off on their annual buffalo hunt.

P. S. It is now rumored that there were two negro women in the train of emigrants that crossed the river here in May. If so, it is probable that it was this company that was massacred on this side of Fort Laramie.

The St. Louis Republican has a letter from Whitefield, Kansas Territory, which was written on the 9th, and says:—

Mr Henry Smith had just informed us that a man stopped at his house this morning, who told him that he slept at the great Nemaha Mission last night, with an express rider, who brought startling news from the Plains. It was to the effect that Fort Laramie was in the hands of the Indians, and that Messrs Nave and Medford, of Andrew county, Mo., had been robbed at Ash Hollow, of four hundred and twenty head of cattle, sixteen horses, several wagons, twenty-three mules, and all their stores and provisions, and were left entirely destitute. The particulars of the capture of Laramie were not given. The express merely stated that the Indians had gathered there in great force, and had taken the Fort, and that as he came by Ash Hollow, on his way into the State, he saw Messrs. Nave and Medford, and their teamsters and drivers, who were without horses or food, and stated to him the fact of the robbery, and that no lives were lost. This news has occasioned great excitement here and in St. Joseph's.

If it is true, the small force of infantry that has just started out will only afford to the Indians so many scalps. They can offer no more resistance to two thousand warriors upon the plains, than could an infant to a giant.

LOUISIANA.—The Baton Rouge Comet, of Saturday, says:

Fourteen insane people of different age and sex, were landed here off the steamer Capitol on Thursday, and taken by land conveyance to Jackson; all of them from New Orleans.

The Planter's Banner, of Thursday last, published in the parish of St. Mary, has the following:

Since our last publication the prospects of the crops have much improved. On Friday we had a smart shower sufficient to lay the dust for a time. This was followed by a good, steady rain on the following day, which succeeded admirably in rendering our streets once more muddy.

Some planters, with whom we have conversed within a day or two, are in high spirits at the present prospect of their cane, which they had given up as almost worthless—not that they expect by any means an average crop, but that they expect to save themselves by making their expenses—and probably, if they have good luck the remainder of the season, a little besides. Taking all things into account, if the parish of St Mary makes this year a crop of 25,000 hogsheads, she will be doing remarkably well—much better than some even now calculate on; yet even this will be a sad falling off from last year's crop.

A letter before us, from the lower part of the parish, under date of Saturday last, says that up to date they had not rain enough to lay the dust in that vicinity since the latter part of January, the result of which is, that their corn is almost a total loss—lasting, and a great deal of it not more than knee high; while their plant cane presents a most melancholy appearance, and does not stand on the ground one-half as thick as it did a month ago! Our informant writes that the most favorable change possible will not enable the planters there to average more than half their usual sugar crop, and about one-third of a crop of corn, while, in a portion of the parish that has heretofore hardly ever failed in making a fair crop, looks alarming for the planters generally. It has learned, however, that other sections of the parish have been more favorably dealt with.

The Plaquemine Sentinel of Saturday says:

Although there has been a great change for the better in our parish, with reference to the cane and corn crops since the revivifying showers of the last eight or ten days, yet, generally speaking, the cane crops at least present a very indifferent appearance, so much so, that we have heard experienced planters say that certainly not more than half a crop of sugar will be made in the parish this year. On some few plantations, however, we hear that the cane looks remarkably well. A good crop of corn is anticipated.

THE MASSACHUSETTS SCHOOL FOR IDIOTS.—The Legislature of Massachusetts, at its late session, voted a sum in aid of the school for Idiots and Feeble Minded Youth, upon the condition that the friends of the institution would subscribe five thousand dollars for the same object within a specified time. The Boston Transcript states that the first gentleman to whom application was made in behalf of this movement contributed the very generous subscription of three thousand dollars—so that there is now no doubt whatever in regard to securing the grant from the Commonwealth upon the terms named above.

Mr. Robert Anderson, (says the Richmond Penny Post,) a very respectable and venerable citizen of Yorktown, Va., has recently erected a brick manufactory there, and associated some Northern capitalists with him in the scheme. A portion of the people about the neighborhood, objecting to the introduction of Northern men among them, repaired to the spot a few Saturday nights since, and tumbled the brick and machine into the river. An indignation meeting of the neighbors was held on the 9th instant, and it was recommended that the next county court offer a reward for the perpetrators of the deed.

The Lexington (Miss.) Advocate of the 20th says:

Crops are, needing rain very much in this locality again. With one or two good rains, splendid crops will yet be made in this county. We had a slight shower on Sunday evening last, but not enough to do much good, excepting to lay the dust for a day or two.

The Washington Union says that orders have been sent to Norfolk to detach the officers and crew of the United States steamer Princeton, and to put the ship out of commission.

ATROCIOUS VILLAINY.—On Tuesday night last a heavy piece of timber was fastened to the track of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, upon the heavy grade near the ninety mile post, between Martinsburg and Harper's Ferry. The freight train which reaches that point about 5 o'clock in the morning, but a few minutes in advance of the passenger express train, struck the timber, and the locomotive was thrown from the track and badly broken. The engineer and fireman narrowly escaped with their lives by jumping from the locomotive after having reversed it and before it struck the timber. Fortunately no one upon the train was seriously injured, and by promptly sending a messenger back to stop the express, they prevented its being run upon the first train, which must in that event have resulted in great loss of life.

New Orleans Money Market.

CRESCENT OFFICE, No. 70 Camp street,
Wednesday Evening, June 27, 1855.

General quietness prevailed in moneyed circles to-day. Some small amounts of long dated paper appeared on the street, embracing good second grade with a moderate amount of A 1. Some negotiations were attested at 12 per cent. for the first named, and 9 to 9½ for the other. The general tone of the market is easy, and where first-rate securities are offered decidedly in favor of borrowers.

It has generally been thought that our community was more involved this season than at the same time last year. We give the general condition of the several items of the banks on the 24th June last, and same of last

Agricultural.

Dog's for Fertilizing.—Farmers are in the habit of putting manure on their land in an unrotted state. Manure so applied is worse than vain. Before it can be still by plants it must be entirely decomposed. This first stage of decomposition forms a mold, which draws moisture to itself instead of furnishing it to plants. In this condition it is decomposed sufficiently to give crops nourishment, but the heat of the season for crops is over. To insure good crops, a vigorous, early start is necessary. If they are injured by any cause that retards an early start, they will never recover. They are unable to stand the intense heat and drought of midsummer unless they have a favorable start, by which their roots are spread wide and deep. If the roots reach into dry, mouldy straw or horse dung, the summer sun will penetrate to them and destroy them. To be beneficial, it should be rotted till it is suitable for roots to be set in, and not put plants in it and then wait for it to rot.—Ohio Farmer.

Rotation of Crops in the Garden.—It is the custom of many who have small vegetable gardens to plant the same crops in the same spots year after year. This may be done and good crops be obtained if the land is deeply trenched and thoroughly manured every year. But without these precautions crops will almost certainly degenerate. The turnips, very likely, will become maggoty and rot, and the peas fail to fill out well, and the cabbages show small heads. Though the soil may manure abundantly and work the soil two spits deep, we find it to great advantage to change the locality of the crops every year, with few exceptions. Asparagus cannot very well be changed, and onions seem to do better upon the same spot, year after year.—American Agriculturist.

Father Sawyer at the Home of his Childhood.—This reverend gentleman is in his hundredth year, having been born on the 9th of October, 1755. At the solicitation of friends, he was invited by ex-Gov. Peters, who is now eighty-two years old himself, to visit his native town of Hebron, Conn. On Friday, of last week, he arrived at Hebron from the State of Maine. On the evening of his arrival, being asked if he was fatigued, after a journey of some four hundred miles from Maine, he said, "As for being fatigued, if occasion required it, I feel that I could stand up and talk to the people for three-quarters of an hour."

He left Hebron when twelve years of age, and only two persons remain of those who inhabited the town when he left it. Last Sunday, before going into the pulpit in the morning, he baptized four children. He preached all day, and preached well. His text was, "Is it well with thee?" Said he, "It is now ninety-nine years since my good father and mother brought me to the meeting-house upon this green to give me up to God, in the ordinance of baptism. I have come back, after almost a hundred years, to administer the same ordinance to some of the children of the same church, and to inquire, "Is it well with you?" Father Sawyer's extreme age has put nothing out of joint. He feels and acts in perfect harmony with the present generation.

A Clerical Anecdote.—It is said that an eccentric minister of the Congregational Church in Massachusetts, who, in refusing to join the order of Know-Nothings, had resisted the efforts of the example of so many of his clerical brethren, was last Sunday preaching from the story—as it comes to us—that Saul, while searching for the lost asses of his father, found a kingdom.

Having at considerable length endeavored to enforce the idea that in the simple pursuit of every day duty we oftener found a greater good fortune than in a wandering search for it, he closed the sermon with the introduction of the following epigram:

"When Saul, the handsome son of Kish,
Was seeking for his cattle,
He found a kingdom, which he won
Without a single battle.
In Boston now the thing's reversed,
(This ego the old surnames,)
We, seeking for a government,
Find legislative asses."

The Lakelets in Michigan.—The lakelets which abound in this State are worthy the attention of the naturalist. One day last week a man by the name of Briggs, while washing sheep in one of a series of three, in the township Sale, in this county, was drowned. He had swum across it some forty rods, and on returning was probably seized with cramps, and sank near the middle. All efforts to recover the body being fruitless, Messrs. Harrington and Phillips were sent for to search with their submarine armor. Accordingly, on Thursday last, they with numerous descents at various depths, discovering most singular irregularities of bottom and curiosities of formation. In some places the plummet will strike bottom in a short distance. A few feet off, down it goes to an almost unfathomable depth. Sometimes on arriving at what seems to be the bottom, the diver's feet rests on nothing, and down he goes into impenetrable darkness and a soft mass of mingled water and sediment, until prudence warns him against further progress. Down sixty-five feet from the surface went Mr. Harrington in the vain search for solid bottom, and still his lead sank through "deep obscure." At one time the plummet will show a current which carries the line rapidly away from the perpendicular, and again it swings around, indicating a whirling eddy. This lake, or rather pond, has hitherto been little known, many old residents not even knowing of its existence. A man present among the spectators of the diving operations, said that on his first discovery of it a short time since, it abounded with the fish common to our streams, of a large size, and so little alarmed at the sight of man, that they were to be caught by the simplest means; when within reach, almost by hand. As there is no inlet by which they could have entered the lake, how came they here? At the last accounts the body of Mr. Briggs had not been discovered.—[Pallanti Sentinel.

Question and Answer.—"Why, my dear brother, will you put a thief into your head to steal away your brains?" said a temperance disciple to a person with a glass of brandy and water to his lips. "Because I have plenty to spare; but if a thief were to enter your scull for brains, he wouldn't find booty enough to pay his traveling expenses," was the rude response.

When Mr. Albert Morgan kept the Pavilion, at Gloucester, some years ago, one of his guests was an Englishman named Erskine. He was attended with the small pox, and, while all other attendants deserted him, Mr. Morgan ministered faithfully to his wants till he recovered. A day or two ago, we learn, the British Consul communicated to Mr. Morgan the intelligence that Mr. Erskine had deceased, and left him by will the sum of $125,000. This is a magnificent instance of English gratitude, and the recipient of such good fortune is quite worthy of it. We think the reward here is not set too high.

After the game recently played by Neal Dow, [illegible] it would be as well to let some one else [illegible] Boston Post.

The Philadelphia Platform.

The following is officially put forth as the "Platform and Principles of the Organization," finally decided upon by the American National Convention, lately in session in Philadelphia. We extract from the New York Express of the 16th, and presume it is literally correct. By close examination it will be seen that the telegraphic accounts heretofore published by us were incorrect in several particulars:

1. The acknowledgment of that Almighty Being who rules over the universe, who presides over the councils of nations, who conducts the affairs of men, and who, in every step by which we have advanced to the character of an independent nation, has distinguished us by some token of Providential agency.

2. The cultivation and development of a sentiment of profoundly American feeling; of passionate attachment to our country, its history and its institutions; of admiration for the purer days of our national existence; of veneration for the heroism that precipitated our revolution; and of emulation of the virtues, wisdom and patriotism that framed our Constitution and first successfully applied its provisions.

3. The maintenance of the union of these United States as the paramount political good; or, to use the language of Washington, "the primary object of patriotic desire." And hence:

First—Opposition to all attempts to weaken or subvert it.

Second—Uncompromising antagonism to every principle of policy that endangers it.

Third—The advocacy of an equitable adjustment of all political differences which threaten its integrity or perpetuity.

Fourth—The suppression of all tendencies to political division, founded on "geographical discriminations or in the belief that there is a real difference of interests and views" between the various sections of the Union.

Fifth—The full recognition of the rights of the several States, as expressed and reserved in the Constitution, and a careful avoidance by the General Government of all interference with their rights by legislative or executive action.

4. Obedience to the Constitution of these United States, as the supreme law of the land, sacredly obligatory upon all its parts and members; and steadfast resistance to the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts. Avowing that in all doubtful or disputed points it may only be legally ascertained and expounded by the judicial power of the United States.

And, as a corollary of the above:

First—A habit of reverential obedience to the laws, whether national, State or municipal, until they are either repealed or declared unconstitutional by the proper authority.

Second—A tender and sacred regard for those acts of statesmanship which are to be contra-distinguished from acts of ordinary legislation by the fact of their being of the nature of compacts and agreements, and so to be considered—a fixed and settled national policy.

5. A radical revision and modification of the laws regulating immigration and the settlement of immigrants. Offering to the honest immigrant who, from love of liberty or hatred of oppression, seeks an asylum in the United States, a friendly reception and protection. But unqualifiedly condemning the transmission to our shores of felons and paupers.

6. The essential modification of the naturalization laws.

The repeal by the Legislatures of the respective States of all State laws allowing foreigners not naturalized to vote.

The repeal, without retroactive operations, of all acts of Congress making grants of land to unnaturalized foreigners, and allowing them to vote in the Territories.

7. Hostility to corrupt means by which the leaders of party have hitherto forced upon us our rulers and our political creeds.

Implacable enmity against the present demoralizing systems of rewards for political subserviency, and of punishments for political independence.

Disgust for the wild hunt after office which characterizes the age.

These on the one hand; on the other:

Imitation of the practice of the purer days of the Republic, and admiration of the maxim that "office should seek the man, and not man the office," and of the rule that the just mode of ascertaining fitness for office is the capability, the faithfulness, and the honesty of the incumbent or candidate.

8. Resistance to the aggressive policy and corrupting tendencies of the Roman Catholic Church in our country, by the advancement to all political stations—executive, legislative, judicial or diplomatic—of those only who do not hold civil allegiance, directly or indirectly, to any foreign power, whether civil or ecclesiastical, and who are American by birth, education and training; thus fulfilling the maxim, "Americans only shall govern America."

The protection of all citizens in the legal and proper exercise of their civil and religious rights and privileges; the maintenance of the right of every man to the full, unrestricted and peaceful enjoyment of his own religious opinions and worship, and a jealous resistance of all attempts by any sect, denomination or church to obtain an ascendancy over any other in the State by means of any special privileges or exemption, by any political combination of its members, or by a division of their civil allegiance with any foreign power, potentate or ecclesiastic.

9. The reformation of the character of our national legislature, by elevating to that dignified and responsible position men of higher qualifications, purer morals, and more unselfish patriotism.

10. The restriction of Executive patronage—especially in the matter of appointments to office—so far as it may be permitted by the Constitution and consistent with the public good.

11. The education of the youth of our country in schools provided by the State; which schools shall be common to all, without distinction of creed or party, and free from any influence or direction of a denominational or partisan character.

And, inasmuch as Christianity, by the constitutions of nearly all the States, by the decisions of the most eminent judicial authorities, and by the consent of the people of America, is considered an element of our political system, and as the Holy Bible is at once the source of Christianity and the depository and fountain of all civil and religious freedom, we oppose every attempt to exclude it from the schools thus established in the States.

12. The American party having arisen upon the ruins and in spite of the opposition of the Whig and Democratic parties, cannot be held in any manner responsible for the obnoxious acts or violated pledges of either. And the systematic agitation of the slavery question by those parties having elevated sectional hostility into a positive element of political power, and brought our institutions into peril, it has therefore become the imperative duty of the American party to interpose, for the purpose of giving peace to the country and perpetuity to the Union. And as experience has shown it impossible to reconcile opinions so extreme as those which separate the disputants, and as there can be no dishonor in submitting to the laws the National Council has deemed it the best guarantee of common justice and of future peace to abide by and sustain the existing laws upon the subject of slavery, as a final and conclusive settlement of that subject, in spirit and in substance.

And regarding it the highest duty to avow their opinions upon a subject so important, in distinct and unequivocal terms, it is hereby declared as the sense of this Council that Congress possesses no power under the Constitution to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the States where it does or may exist, or to exclude any State from admission into the Union because its constitution does or does not recognize the institution of slavery as a part of its local system; and expressly permitting any expression of opinion upon the power of Congress to establish or prohibit slavery in any Territory, it is the sense of the National Council that Congress ought not to legislate upon the subject of slavery within the territory of the United States, and that any interference by Congress with slavery as it exists in the District of Columbia would be a violation of the spirit and intention of the compact by which the State of Maryland ceded the District to the United States, and a breach of the national faith.

13. The policy of the Government of the United States, in its relations with foreign Governments, is to exact justice from the strongest, and to do justice to the weakest; restraining, by all the power of the Government, all its citizens from interference with the internal concerns of nations with whom we are at peace.

14. The National Council declares that all the principles of the order shall be henceforth everywhere openly avowed, and that each member shall be at liberty make known the existence of the order, and the fact that he himself is a member; and it recommends that there be no concealment of the places of meeting of subordinate councils.

E. B. BARTLETT, of Kentucky,
President of the National Council.

Miscellaneous Items.

The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser of the 12th inst. gives the following extract from a private letter from an officer in the Crimea to a citizen of Buffalo:

A curious thing occurred yesterday. A sepoy was brought from the trenches with his jaw broken, and the doctor told me there was a piece of it sticking out an inch and a half from his face. The man said it was done by a round shot, which the doctor disbelieved, but the poor fellow insisted, and said: "Yes, and it took off the head of the man next me." This was conclusive, and the surgeon proceeded to move the bone; it came out quite easy, when the doctor said to the man, whose face appeared to preserve its form pretty well: "Can you move your jaw?" "Oh yes, sir," was the reply. The doctor then put his finger into the man's mouth, and found the teeth were there, and at length assured the soldier that it was no jaw of his that was broken, but that of his headless comrade, which had actually been driven into his face, inflicting a severe, but not dangerous wound. Upon this the man's visage, which had been rather lengthened, rounded up most beautifully.

A Monster of Cruelty.—We (Calcutta Englishman) have the following from Lucknow: "March 20.—We have read of the terrors of the Spanish Inquisition, the horrors and barbarities of the reign of terror, and the persecutions of Christian by the Roman Emperors, but the atrocities of the fiend Juggernath, if not exactly unparalleled, are of a nature so revolting and brutal as to instil loathing and disgust. The inordinate love of cruelty and refinements of torture practiced by this robber, lately elicited upon his short trial, are supremely barbarous. A little while previous to his arrest, Juggernath seized and carried off to the fortress (the pandemonium where the worst excesses were enacted) the child of a mahajun, who was reputed to be rich. He offered to ransom the boy for a sum of money so exorbitant as to be out of the father's power to pay. The robber, determined not to be outdone in his nefarious scheme of extortion, put in force a diabolical threat which he had previously communicated to the child's parents. He cut off the unfortunate lad's ears and nose, and placing them in a brass dish covered with red cloth, sent the hideous spectacle as a gift to the father, with an intimation that if, in the event of the amount demanded being not forthwith remitted, he should be greeted with a sight of the other members of his son's body. As no blood can be knocked out of a stone, and the sum was far beyond the parent's means, he earnestly implored for his son. The inexorable Juggernath was as good as his word; the fingers and toes followed next, and finally he dashed out the boy's brains against the wall of his fort. The boy's parents are the principal accusers against the inhuman criminal."

A Romance in Real Life.—A wedding took place in Bristol, England, a few weeks since, under somewhat romantic circumstances, realizing the old adage "truth is strange; stranger than fiction." It appears that a sister of Mrs. N., who resides at Montpelier, some two or three years since married a merchant, and emigrated to California soon afterward, with a view of bettering their fortunes, taking with her the likeness of an unmerried sister. The picture happened to be hung in a very conspicuous part of the house in California, and attracted the attention of a rich resident of that district, who happened to pay a visit to the house. He was enraptured with the image of the fair unknown, and exclaimed: "By Jove! I'll marry that girl if she le to be found in the world."

He was told where she resided, and he posted to her a note inclosing a present of £40 sterling, and a few days since a knock was heard at the door, and on the young lady going to open it, a good-looking, bronze-featured gentleman rushed into the house and gave a chaste salute, exclaiming that he had come from the other end of the world to find her, at the same time pulling out the likeness which first led him to seek his attraction. Of course they were married, and are to "live long and die happy," as usual.

The Augusta Constitutionalist relates the following feats of skill with fire-arms:

We learn that on Friday last Mr. William King, of this city, on a wager, undertook to break forty-five bottles out of fifty—to be thrown up at the distance of ten yards. He broke forty out of fifty-two—the latter two hit but not broken. The wager was shot in fifty-six minutes' time, washing out his gun three times in that period. He afterwards wagered to hit ten out of fifteen bottles, at the distance of twenty yards, the bottles to be thrown ten to twelve feet in the air.—He broke ten out of twelve. This was considered good shooting.

Later from Rio de Janeiro.—The brig Mary A. Forrest, Capt Gayle, arrived at Baltimore on the morning of the 19th from Rio de Janeiro, which port she left on the 6th May, bringing four days later advices. She is consigned to Mr John K. Ramsell, her owner, and brings a cargo of 2700 bags coffee to Thos. Wilson & Co.:

Flour was rather quiet at the latest dates. A sale of 500 barrels Baltimore brands, was noted at 25 milreas. The supply on hand was light, and it was believed the necessities of bakers, unless receipts materially increased, would cause them to pay higher prices.

Advices from the United States to the 16th of March, stating an advance in coffee in the country, had produced decided firmness in the article, and dealers at Rio were looking towards higher figures. No sales, however, had taken place. A cargo of superior qualities could not have been purchased under 4$0 rials to 5000 rials—Exchange 27.

Freights were dull, but had an improving tendency.

No other commercial news of importance.

Political affairs were without special moment or any very striking features.

The Chambers were to meet on the 3d June, when it was supposed the present Ministry would go out and a new Cabinet be formed, in which Torres and Soure Franac would probably hold conspicuous positions.

The present Ministry, it is asserted, shows a deficit in the finances or revenue of over five millions milreas.

There was considerable suffering from the great scarcity of labor. In the neighborhood of 1800 reas were being paid per day to Cottons for their daily services to work on public roads, to whom only 400 reas were previously given to perform similar service.

The supply of all kinds of lumber was increasing, and the market for it dull.

The health of the country was generally good.

The Helena (Ark.) Shield, of Saturday last, informs us that some of the wheat fields in that region have yielded this season as high as 60 bushels to the acre.

The Operations in the Crimea.

We trust that the last intelligence from the seat of war will satisfy that portion of the public which allowed its apprehensions to get the better of its judgment, that the expedition to the Crimea was not, after all, such a mistake or misfortune as some of our opponents made it out to be. That grievous mistakes have been committed and misfortunes endured in the execution of the plan, we readily admit, and no one has pointed out the causes of those disasters more freely then we have done ourselves; but even these trials failed to shake our confidence in the strategical correctness of the plan for invading the Crimea, and we have no doubt that, with ordinary prudence, courage and good fortune, the results of the next few weeks will justify our expectations. The expedition of last autumn was undertaken with forces capable of taking Sebastopol by a coup de main, but too weak to invest the place, and scarcely able to hold their ground during a long and rigorous winter, aggrevated by the magnitude of the seige operations. But it at once paralyzed the naval armament of Russia; it exhausted the prodigious stores of war accumulated at Sebastopol; and it drained the resources of the Russian army to an extent which now appears to have materially weakened its position in the Crimea.

Had the expedition been deferred until the spring, as some persons recommended, we should now have to encounter an enemy in full possession of his fleet, his army and his stores, instead of directing the fresh and eager troops which have now joined the Allied camps against the forlorn hope of the Russian garrison. If we may assume that the efforts and operations now in progress of execution prove successful before the termination of this campaign, then we confidently assert that the Allies will have obtained military and political results of the highest importance, and such as could have been arrived at by no other mode of warfare against Russia. The difficulties of the seige of Sebastopol have rendered it one of the greatest events in the history of modern war; the Russian Black Sea fleet has already been destroyed by its own admirals; the occupation of Kertch closes the Sea of Azoff and the whole southern portion of the Russian Empire; and the entire Circassian coast is cut off; and the contest is carried on within the contracted limits of a peninsula where the numerical strength of the enemy can not be brought to bear against us, and where it becomes every day more difficult to support a large body of troops and to secure a line of retreat. The Russians will soon, in fact, have no base of operations but the burning steppes behind the Salghir, which can not be crossed by large bodies of men in the height of summer without severe loss, and cannot in any manner be occupied or defended.

According to all experience of war, the Russian army in the interior of the Crimea must be in a position of great embarrassment, for its movements are confined within a small peninsula, having only two, or at most three, lines of road for the arrival of supplies or the withdrawal of the troops, and even the lines of road by the tongue of Arabat, and by the bridge over the Putrid Sea, will be interrupted by the Allies, if, as we hope, the steam gunboats in the Sea of Azoff succeed in forcing the passage of Genitchi, between Arabat and the mainland. Meanwhile the seige, properly so called, is proceeding with great activity, especially on the extreme left attack, where Gen. Pelissier has given a fresh impulse to the operations of the French Army. The attack made on the night of the 2d of May, carried a portion of the external Russian works, but a considerable intrenchment remained between the Central bastion and the Quarantine Fort, which was taken the successive nights of the 22d and 23d instant. Prince Gortschakoff states that the Russian forces lost 2500 men, "in driving back the enemy," but in fact, they did not drive back the French, and their losses amount to twice that number. Gen. Pelieller expressly reports that his troops are definitely established in the work, by which understand that the line of Russian was counter-approach is turned against the place, and forms part of the fourth parallel of the attack. The French are constructing and arming new breaching batteries within one hundred metres of the place.

Instead of the sorties directed by the Russians, against the lines of the besiegers, we have now, therefore, advanced into a portion of the works of the enemy, and on all points a steady progress has been made. On the following day, the 25th of May, Gen. Pellaster reports the occupation of the valley of the Tchernaya. During the whole of the winter the Allies have been intrenched on the southern side of this little stream, and defended from attack by the steep cliffs which inclose the valley. The Russians held and fortified in like manner the northern bank on which lie the ruins of old Inkermann. Their guns in position commanded the valley, and some times reached our encampment on the other side. As long as they occupied these heights in force it was impossible for the Allies to descend to the river; and, as we are informed that the river is now within our lines, it must be inferred that the forces which commanded it from the opposite side have been withdrawn. Indeed, Gen. Pelissier expressly states that "the enemy, not being in force, made very little resistance, and speedily retired to the mountains." But, if we understand this expression correctly, it would appear that no inconsiderable portion of the Russian army remains between the Tchernaya and the mouth of the Belbek, and that the Allies may consequently ere long occupy the heights north of the river, and complete the investment of the town.

The telegraphic dispatch is not quite clear on this point, but the occupation of the valley of the Tchernaya would seem to imply the possession of both sides of the valley, without which the temporary possession of the low ground would be of no utility. It must be borne in mind that the official dispatches and our own correspondence on the one hand, and the telegraphic messages on the other, compel us to follow simultaneously two distinct periods in the series of events divided by an interval of ten or twelve days. Thus, our written accounts from the army extend only to the 15th of May, while our telegraphic information goes to the 27th of May. This interval of time renders it almost impossible to explain the brief results announced by the telegraph by the facts and preparations more fully known to us. Ten days more will probably elapse before we have full particulars of the occupation of Kertch or the movement on the Tchernaya, and we trust that we shall one day learn the glorious and successful termination of the campaign long before we know by what combinations it has been brought about. [London Times, May 29.

During an interview which Mertineff, the Russian comedian and mimic, succeeded in obtaining with Prince Volkhonsky, High Steward, the late Empuror Nicholas walked into the room unexpectedly, yet with a design, as was made evident. Telling the actor that he had heard of his talents, and should like to see a specimen of them, he bade him mimic the old Minister. This feat was performed with so much gusto that the Emperor laughed immoderately; and then, to the great horror of the poor actor, desired to have himself "taken off." "'Tis physically impossible," pleaded Martineff.

"Nonsense!" said Nicholas; "I insist on its being done."

Finding himself in the horns of a dilemma, the mimic took heart of grace, and with promptitude and presence of mind, buttoned his coat over his breast, expanded his chest, threw up his head, and, assuming the Imperial port to the best of his power, strode across the room and back, then stopping opposite the Minister, he cried, in the exact tone and manner of the Czar: "Volhonsky! pay M. Martineff 1000 silver roubles."

The Emperor, for a moment, was disconcerted; but, recovering himself with a feint smile, he ordered the money to be paid.

A horse ran away with a wagon in St. Louis, on the 8th inst., and after smashing sundry articles of street furniture, knocked down an old man, who was in bad health, and killed him instantly.

Tom Thumb not Married.—The New York Evening Post has been authorized to say that there is no truth in the story of Tom's marriage. The lady to whom it was alleged that he was married, is merely employed to attend to the wardrobe of the "General," who is now on a professional tour in New York State, with Howe's menagerie and circus.

Dr. Hoofland's German Bitters, prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson, are justly reckoned among our most valuable medicines. In cases of Dyspepsia it acts like magic, strengthening the tone of the stomach stimulating the digestive powers, and giving ruddy health to the cheek, and brightness to the eye. There are thousands in this community who can testify to their virtues and thousands will hereafter add their testimony.

Payment to be made at the close of each term. Board, including lodging, washing, lights and fuel, can be procured in the village and immediate neighborhood at ten dollars per month. Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would however, respectfully urge all parents or guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the institution, to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, facilitating, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.

School books, stationary, &c., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the usual rates.

Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral deportment of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.

As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass into another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.

The government of the school is to be understood as that of authority—though parental and mild, yet decided and firm. The institution, in a religious point of view, will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.

Pupils will be required to attend church at least once on the Sabbath, and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.

The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.

The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second session commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July. At which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.

All applications for admission of pupils, &c., to be made to the president of the College.

La Grange College, at Florence, Alabama.—The Tennessee, Memphis and Alabama Conferences have removed this institution from La Grange to this place, and have appointed the undersigned Commissioners to effect this removal. We have under contract, on an eligible site, large buildings, on the plan of a distinguished Architect, which we hope to have completed during the present year.

We have purchased for the use of the President, a comfortable mansion; and have provided suitable buildings for the opening of the next session on the 21st day of February. We have ordered from Philadelphia and Boston a supply of superior apparatus.

The Dormitory system has been abolished, and ample provision has been made for the board of students in good private families, at $10 per month for board and washing, and $2 for fuel, lodging and room rent.

By an ordinance of the corporation, no Spirituous Liquors are retailed in the town, or Billiard Tables or Nine Pin Alleys allowed to be kept.

We have the pleasure of announcing the same Faculty as formerly, viz:

Griswold's Improved Cotton Gins.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by Samuel Griswold, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty, and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

Dr. John Beckwith,	William McNutt,
Hon. S. U. Posey,	H. W. Kimball,
Geo. O. Ragland,	William Watkins,
A. C. Bacon,	John W. Paterson,
D. L. Dinsmore,	Rev. Duncan Bacons,
Col. Isaac Lane,	Jerome B. Pillow,

S. Griswold & Co.

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Water Hox Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and mote well. They are convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not their durability. In short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be.

Having commenced a Commission Business in this city, to be conducted under the above style, we take the liberty of offering you our services, and respectfully soliciting your patronage.

We receive all consignments and remittances addressed to the house of A. J. Wright & Co during their temporary suspension. It is expected that the liabilities of that house will be met soon, of which with subsequent arrangements, due notice will be given.

Our charges will be such as are customary with other respectable houses.

We give you the assurance that all funds or proceeds of produce entrusted to us, shall be held strictly sacred to the object for which they are sent. As the contrary practice has been productive of great injury both to planters and merchants, there will be no deviation from the rule.

The Methodist Denomination

has long felt the need of a suitable Music Book, for Church, Conference, Social and Camp Meetings; one of suitable size, to be conveniently handled, and one which should comprise the best Hymns, familiar to the denomination, set to appropriate music. We have the pleasure of announcing that such a book has been prepared, with much labor and care, by S. Hubbard, Esq., author of "Songs of Canaan," Musical Gems, Temperance Melodist, etc., etc.; assisted by Rev. W. McDonald, of the Maine Conference, author of the Wesleyan Minstrel. The book bears the title of

The Wesleyan Sacred Harp.

The authors say in their preface: "Our object in compiling this book, is to supply a denominational want which is felt, and often expressed by our preachers and people. * * * We commit the work to God and his children, praying that all who sing from these pages on earth, may sing the new song in heaven forever."

We are pleased to know that so far as it has been examined, the Harp meets the strong approbation of the denomination, and we trust that it will soon be in general use.

Zion's Herald, Boston, speaks thus of this work: "This book is, without doubt, one of the very best of its class. We like it because its pages are not disfigured by the light doggrel which sometimes finds its way into similar works. The hymns in this volume are mostly from our own hymn book. We cheerfully recommend it to all who feel the need of such a work."

From the Western Christian Advocate, Cincinnati, Ohio: "We commend the Wesleyan Harp most cordially to the singing members of the church, especially all such as believe in praising God."

Price single, 50 cents half bound; 62½ cents full cloth. Also, per hundred, $40 half bound; $50 full cloth.

SELF-DENIAL.

all the Christian duties, there is none important than the one that heads this , and with all its importance there is perhaps, more neglected. It is a work so ank, so critical and so opposed to the flesh it requires all our efforts, assisted divine grace, to perform it properly. the danger of coming wide of the ural rule, unless every aid is put forth the accomplishment of this end. We deny others with but little effort, but self demands, it is too apt to be successful too unfrequently do we stop to consider expediency of conformation. When make demands of us, we at once set to see if such can be lawfully denied, hen self comes in, the contrary course generally pursued; for, instead of king for a lawful denial, we seek for n f-conformity, and sometimes we con- whether it be lawful or not.

y is this self-preformer? Whence this principle arise? In answer, we say, we can account for this self-pre- not only, from the fact of selfish pride, r inability to war against the flesh: entire corruption and derangement of more noble faculties, and the inharmo- action of the same on questions of right and virtue.

the second we would say, it is not n born; nor is it a principle in the doc- of Him who taught the precept, "Let esteem others better than themselves." efore, it must arise from beneath; none can be its author but he who hath filled orld with shame and woe.

-denial is a field upon which the Chris- required to spend a large portion of ily labor, and if this labor is properly med, it is a source of great reward.

-denial is one of those rare virtues that orld cannot become acquainted ith. It opposes the world, the flesh and evil; and clothes the Christian with th and power to combat successfully all these.

plies the denying of our own wills in great and small, when they run con- to the will of God; and this they are to do if left with no better guide than . In order to accomplish this end it is ary for us to be convinced of the de- ity of our own wills, their liability to eous notion, and the infinite corrootness e will of God.

er can we make a full surrender of our to God as long as we think that they ght; but is there not abundant proof that too of daily occurrence, to satisfy us point? Neither can we follow the will od until we are sure of its purity and ess. On this point, too, we have so evidence, that whithersoever we turn yes it is ever before us.

-denial is the refusing to do those things we feel naturally inclined to do, when things are contrary to the Divine will. example; our natural wills demand that tify the desires of the flesh, the desire e eye and the pride of life; whereas, law of Christ demands that herein we ourselves, and that we turn the heart these things as from the path that leads ell. Whenever we deny ourselves; (our nature which tends to evil, and that tinually,) we thereby place ourselves in a ble position to attend to the will of ; but when otherwise, we obey self, it is ible that we can obey God: we cannot two masters. Hence the importance -denial; for without it, it is impossible please God or follow him whither he has e to prepare a place in the kingdom of glory. What an honor has God confer- on man by giving him the power to w off the unreasonable and wicked de- ds of his own corrupt nature, and to put the holy nature of Christ.

rom what a degraded position did he lift up to put his spirit in him! Man was ervant of devils, incapable of counteract- eir demands: the servant of fleshy ap- ; which war against the soul already and hastening to its end, even damnation, without any to hinder or , "I will help you to be free from the s of these your enemies." Such was condition of man when God determined elp him, even at the cost of his own be- d son; and placed in his possession the er to deny these, this unholy service.

ul reader, have you availed yourself in y instance of this kind assistance, or e you striven to worst your condition by ting the grace of God so kindly tendered and being a willing servant? These gs demand your serious consideration; is not enough to know that we deny lves in the main, but in the whole. If come short of this, we come short of God's , and consequently, we are following our which is sure to lead us to eternal bedness.

How any one can live in neglect of this y and expect to be saved, is a question we not solve; and yet, how little of the Chris- tian do we find. Is this fact not alarming in the extreme.

To instance a few cases: who denies himself of uncharitable conversation; conversing sparingly, and only to profit? Who denies himself of all such pleasures as tend not to the knowledge or love of God? Who denies himself in food and sleep, taking no more of either than is necessary for his health and comfort? Who denies himself of the honors of this world, when such are thrown at his feet? Oh! who has his whole nature in godly subjection, and denies himself in every particular, small and great?

Self-denial is a duty that must not be neglected when so much is at stake. Let us think of the value of our imperishable, eternal spirits. Who will cast them into hell through neglect of self-denial?

It is a work so opposed to our natures, that we cannot of ourselves accomplish it; but God has promised his aid to all such as will make the effort. He will put his strong arm under his people and bear them up against the torrent that pours in against them. Success will attend every effort at self denial when made in the name and strength of Jesus. No one can ask with confidence in and reliance upon this Name, deserving to receive, and go away empty. Self-denial is a noble principle in that that it exalts a man, empties his heart of all evil and leaves it ready for the pouring in of the oil of salvation. It pulls down pride and seats meekness in its place. It dethrones obstinacy and lifts submission in its throne. It looks at man as poor and vile; at God as the author of all good, great in wisdom, majesty, power and glory. It turns a deaf ear to every cry but that of Him, who says, "Son give me thy heart." It shuts its eyes on everything but the Bible. It shames devils and glorifies God; fills man with the brightest prospects, and schools him for the companionship of angels in a future state. It has many wonderful excellences, but the greatest of all is, it is of God.

TELEGRAPHIC INTELLIGENCE.—The New-York papers publish the following telegraphic dispatches:

WASHINGTON, June 25, 1855.—Important dispatches have been received here by the last steamer from Mr. Mason, our Minister at Paris. He has taken strong ground against the conduct and views of the French Government in relation to the rights of neutrals in the Baltic, as illustrated in certain alleged acts of the allied blockaders. Mr. Mason had also called the French Minister of Foreign Affairs to account in reference to those late high-handed proceedings of Monsieur Dillon, the French Consul at San Francisco. Our Minister's dispatches upon this subject, so thoroughly fired up Mr. Pierce that he was for a war with France right off, but Marcy interposed and secured an armistice of one week, by which time he expects more pacific advices from Paris.

M. Soule has left us for New York. He was here a whole day en route for New Orleans. He kept aloof from Marcy, and Marcy judiciously kept aloof from him. The President, however, was favored with a call by the ex-Minister, and seized the occasion to put in a labored apology for Marcy; but from all I can learn, this conversation will not have the least visible effect on that forthcoming book. I fear that Soule has not been in the slightest degree mollified. Nous verrons.

There is a rumor about the city this evening that a change will soon be made in the Cabinet. Mr. McClelland fails to show his hand on the Know-Nothing question, and Guthrie says that every one who does not come up to the scratch will have to swing.

The Navy Department to-day received official intelligence which has produced a conviction that the U. S. brig Porpoise has been lost with all her officers and crew. It will be remembered that the Porpoise was one of the vessels detailed on the special service of the expedition to Behrings Straits, North Pacific and China Seas. The following were her officers: Acting Lieut., Wm. King Bridge, commanding; Acting Lieuts. Wm. Reily, Sylvanus J. Bliss and Wm. Von Wyck; Assistant Surgeon, James Stuart; Midshipman, George F. B. Butler.

Commander Adams has arrived, bringing hither the treaty between the United States and Japan, as ratified by the Emperor.

The Grand Jury is engaged in examining witnesses to ascertain who destroyed the stone presented by the Government of Rome to the Washington Monument.

It is said that Captain Forrest has been ordered to the command of the Washington Navy Yard.

BOSTON, Monday, June 25, 1855.—A letter from Holmes's Hole states that the revenue cutter James Campbell anchored off there on Sunday, having in charge the British brig Buffalo, from New York for Miramichi, Nova Scotia. The cutter fell in with the brig, when a number of German passengers on board appealed for protection, stating they were engaged in New York to work on railroads in Nova Scotia, but suspected they were in reality designed for British service in the Crimea, and asked to be taken out of the vessel. The captain of the cutter will detain the brig until the matter has been legally investigated.

A full meeting of the Suffolk Bar was held this forenoon in the law library, and a series of appropriate resolutions were passed in testimony of the worth and judicial services of the late Judge Wilde.

In the Municipal Court to-day, Paran Stevens, of the Revere House, was tried for violating the new liquor law. The Jury returned a verdict of not guilty.

The American Convention, called by the State Council of Massachusetts, will meet in this city next Thursday. It is said that a proposition will be urged to make the proceedings public.

The "National Native Americans" have got out a platform of principles in hand-bill shape, in which they take similar ground to that occupied by the Know-Nothing Ratification Conventions at New York and Philadelphia, and the secret principle of the Order is entirely abandoned.

The piece of sculpture, on whose account Horace Greeley was shabbily treated in Paris, is "The Shipwrecked Woman and Child attacked by a Vulture." It still remains at the Crystal Palace, New York, and it is said never had been sent for by the owner, who prosecuted Greeley solely for the purpose of obtaining money for his property.

METHODIST EPISCOPACY.

The Church, Herald and W. S. Grayson.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire—The argument upon the subject of the episcopacy, addressed by me to the editors of the Church Herald and published in that paper, has so many defects in it, that I take the liberty to request you to print it in the Advocate in an amended form. I did not feel certain it would be published, and hence wrote the argument too hastily, and condensed it too much. In the following you will find it written as I would, I think, have written it under more favorable circumstances. I adhere to the original as closely as is consistent with the correction due to it, but shall omit several points aside from the question at issue. The point involved was my consistency in advocating the divine origin and obligation of episcopacy and communing with the Methodist Church, which consistency has been by them lengthily assailed.

THE ARGUMENT.

In my judgment, the visible Christian Church is a infallible church, under the government of infallible laws. If so, it cannot lose its Christian character, if it unavoidably exhibits its fallibility. If it would be sufficient to detect the Christian character of any Church to point to errors into which she may have occasionally fallen, we would be committed to the fatal conclusion that a fallible Church could not be a Christian Church. This would be destructive of the Christian Church at a very early period. Let me call your attention to the point of departure between you and me.

I hold to the divine origin and obligation of every principle and practice concerning salvation for which there can be shown a scriptural or written warrant. Scriptural means written. I therefore discard from the category of divine everything concerning salvation not written, not scriptural. Hence I discard the succession, but not the authority for it, from the category of the divine. I draw a distinction between the authority for a practice and the visible obedience of the posterior church officers. You do not only hold, I am persuaded, to the divine origin and obligation of episcopacy because it is written, and so transmitted, but you hold to a divine authority, that was transmitted differently. You hold to a divine authority from Christ, reaching your Church by succession, and for this divine authority you rely upon uninspired human testimony, ancient and modern. This divine authority from Christ not coming to you in inspired writings, must necessarily have come by tradition. The ability of tradition to convey a voice from Christ, not written, and yet affecting salvation, is the main pillar of Romanism. I have to acknowledge, I know, that episcopacy sprang originally from a divine fountain. But by episcopacy I mean a written form of church government. Hence episcopacy has not been transmitted by bishops. It has been transmitted in writing. The written law is infallible, but it is invisible. Bishops are visible, and therefore fallible; fallible because visible; fallible because human. If, now, the written law be infallible, and bishops fallible, when I desire to inquire into their divine authority I consult the scripture, but you consult their official conduct; I regard their authority as contingently divine, you as personally divine.

With me the rule of right is a divine written rule, and everybody is wrong (including the visible Church) who departs in practice and faith from this rule. This makes me a Protestant.

With you the rule of right, with respect to the point under consideration, is not a written rule of faith and practice, but the regular conduct of the officers of the church, thus connecting human salvation with uninspired human conduct. You thus abrogate the oneness of the written law as a divine rule of faith and practice.

I am compelled to hold to the right of practical dissent in cases where the Church and the Scripture are at issue, supposing as I do that the Scripture is the infallible rule of right human conduct, whether official or lay. But I hold to the right of practical dissent only when it conforms in its faith and practice with the rule, or its faith and practice as transmitted in inspired writings. You may say this leads to trouble and disorder, but if you do, you will be only saying that the improper abuse of a principle will condemn and prohibit its proper use. You cannot say that I hold to improper dissent when I only hold to that dissent which conforms to a divine rule of right, and condemn that which does not.

You are not a Protestant at all, in Scriptural estimation, because you do not hold the right of practical dissent, when the practical dissent conforms to the practice and faith of the Scripture; for, if you did, you would judge the Methodist Church, in her faith and practice now, by the Scripture, and not by a past ministerial succession. If the Methodist Church now conforms in her faith and practice to the Scripture, you would not say that therefore she was a Christian Church. You would not measure her by the conduct of her Church officers in a past age, when you know her past officers to have been fallible men.

With respect to salvation, you are compelled to confess yourselves to be ruined if your succession includes Pope Joan. I do not consider mine jeopardied if, in the past succession of my Church, there have been a thousand women Popes. The reason that sustains me is, that with me the existing written law is a sufficient rule of faith and practice now and forever. The gospel is intrinsically vital.

The question between you and me resolves itself into this: Is the Scripture a sufficient rule of faith and practice?

I think you are compelled, logically, to deny that it is. For example, when I declare and insist that the Methodist Church is a Christian Church, (which is the point in issue,) and proceed to prove it by the faith and discipline of the written law, and by comparing the former with the latter now, to whose faith and practice do you at once refer in order to gainsay my declaration and prevent my conclusions? Do you not put the Scripture, the written rule, aside, and refer, in the place of it, to the practice of one John Wesley? How could you refer to past official conduct of Church officers in order to settle a question affecting my salvation unless you thought the written law insufficient to settle it? I desire to make the written law the arbiter between us. Are you content with it? Is it sufficient? I presume you do not doubt that the Scripture is Christ's written faith and practice, which the Church is bound to obey, and that it is unchristian to disobey that. The question is not with respect to Wesley's Church, but Christ's Church. The question is: Is the Methodist Church a Christian Church? This is a question concerning salvation. Suppose I were to cut you off from all reference to the conduct of this fallible human being, what would you go in order to find arguments to settle this salvation question—to prove the non-christian character of the Methodist Church? If you confine yourself to the written law, you are plainly restricted to its examination and comparison with the Methodist Church now. The regularity of the succession must be unnecessary if the Scripture be sufficient as a standard of right human conduct. If the succession be divinely necessary to settle salvation doctrines, then the Scripture is an insufficient rule, since it does not contain something divinely necessary to decide questions affecting human salvation.

But let me turn to another point. Remember, gentlemen, you give us a list of what you call successive officers. I propose to show you that succession of officers has no bearing on the point in debate, nor have you proof and argument relative to it. The question is, the regularity of ministerial authorizations. You undertake to prove ministerial authorizations in succession by successive officers, not connected by ordination with each other. You say that if a man be a bishop, that is proof that he was properly consecrated, because it was a rule without an exception that "the Apostles made the first bishops, the first bishops made those who succeeded them, and this has been done in regular succession to the present time." This is the way in which you prove the Christian character of your Church. Do you not see that a list of successive officers is useless? If you have a bishop now, that is all your proof and argument needs. Let us try your argument upon the supposition that Bishop Green is now a bishop. If he be now a bishop, and the rule you refer to has never been violated, then it follows he is a bishop. The conclusion is unavoidable. But do you not beg the question when you assume that the rule has been without exceptions? I admit the rule, but deny this conclusion. I want proof that it has not been violated, not an argument based upon the position that because a rule of human conduct is a divine rule, that therefore human beings have always observed it. I want divine proof, as the question relates to salvation. If there has "never been an exception to the rule in all history," as you affirm, then one bishop now is all you want. If one answers as well as a thousand, why delude us with the sound of successive bishops? Your proof does not affect their succession, and you surrender the proof of their successive ordinations, and you thus make a break in the chain void of meaning. There is nothing to break, because there is no connecting chain, and there is no chain, because the succession is not required or touched by your proof or argument.

You and I are compelled to differ about the primary end of the Church under the dispensation of Jesus Christ.

You must hold it to be "regularly to observe the ordinance of ordination." I hold it to be "to preach a gospel of salvation."

I hold that the secondary, in cases of necessity, must give way to the primary. Hence I hold that the church is secondary to the gospel. But you hold the gospel to be secondary to the church. You will not allow that the rule of succession can be secondary, under any circumstances, to the gospel.

I regard the church as a Christian agency, under the government of organic written laws, having a primary end in view. The primary law of the church is to preach the gospel to every creature. The gospel is a legacy, and every creature the legatee. Whenever the church departs from its primary end, it does so at the expense of the divine rights of Christ's legatees, and in departing loses its divine authority. In this originated the right of church reform. Protestantism, church reformation and practical dissent, when right, convey the same idea. Will you please ask yourselves what is the only ground of Church reformation? Is it not that the Scripture is more sufficient to justify an ultimate judgment upon the part of others than the officers of the erring church? If you deny this conclusion, the church must have a warrant in the divine authority to persist in errors. If the Scripture be, in its faith and practice, of universal obligation, then it is necessary to reform any church whose faith and practice differ from the written law. But why necessary, and whom does the necessity bind? Necessary, because the written law, in its faith and practice, is to be obeyed, under the penalty of the divine disapprobation; and the necessity, binds all, for all men are under moral obligations to obey the written law of Jesus Christ.

If any church have not departed from the Scripture, then, no necessity existing for dissent, dissent becomes schism, and schism sin.

Titus and Timothy, although bishops, could not have properly reformed the church at their day, as it needed none, and had they attempted it, it would have been a sinful schism and violation of Divine authority. We are under the same necessity to obey the Church of Christ that we are to obey the Scripture, for the latter requires it. But then, it must be a Christian Church truly. It would be obviously contradictory to say that there could be two opposing divine necessities. If it be necessary to reform a church, it cannot be also necessary to obey her forms and ordinances, if the latter is to defeat the former. If the latter be necessary, the former cannot be. Take the case of Luther. If it was necessary to reform the Catholic Church, the necessity bound Luther, if it be necessary to obey the written law rather than the erring church. If it was necessary for Luther practically to dissent from the Catholic Church, was it not necessary for him to disregard the authority of the Catholic Church, for she commanded him not to protest in action? He was bound to obey the one necessity or the other. In order to settle the difficulty, we have only to inquire which it is necessary for men to obey, the discipline and faith of Christ's written law, or the discipline and faith of the Christian Church? The question is almost without a difficulty.

But let me ask you this question. Does not the greater include the less? If therefore, I have a right, under any circumstances, to disregard the authority of the church, have I not, a fortiori, the right to disregard one of her ordinances, when it stands in way of my obedience of Jesus Christ, in respect to matters more important than Church ordinances? I hold that the discipline and faith of the written law is now being observed by the Methodist Church. But the Methodist Church is a reformed church springing from the bosom of the Church of England, as that church sprung from the Romish Church. Those two churches are instances of practical protests, or are dissenting churches. Now, how are we to decide the question whether they be reformed churches or were schisms?

I say, since the visible church is a fallible church, she is liable to depart from the faith and practice of the scripture. If she do depart, then a reformation means an instance of dissent, in which the dissent obeys the scripture in points where the church reformed had not obey it. A dissent is not therefore, always a reformation, but a reformation is always an obedience to Christ. By this rule are we to try the Methodist Church. Is she a reformed church? If she be, then she has the divine authority for the reformation, since a reform is always demanded and divinely demanded of our erring church.

But you cannot meet me in this inquiry and join me in the investigation, because the scripture is not your standard of authority in respect to the question of the Christian character of the Church. Were I to show you that the Church of England did not preach the gospel in the fullness of its power and unction of the Holy Ghost, you would not allow Wesley the right to reform upon this ground. Were I to show you that the practice and faith of the Methodist Church is more scriptural than that of the Church of England, from whom she dissented, you would not allow her to be therefore a more Christian, or more truly a Christian Church than the Church of England. You regard episcopacy as something that can be divinely communicated by one set of human beings to another set of human beings. I think it was "divinely communicated" but once, and that was when Christ communicated it to the apostles, to be by them, mingled with the other practices of the written law.

I have no difficulty in allowing churches under Presbyterian government to be Christian churches, because I hold that the visible Church may fall into mistakes, and yet not necessarily lose its Christian character. It only loses its Christian character when it mistakes the church for the gospel, and preaches the one for the other; for to preach the gospel is its primary duty.

The gospel, therefore, is the divine law of mercy, and the church one of its agencies. We are saved according to the gospel, and are assisted in procuring that salvation by the Christian Church and its forms and ceremonies. I now thank you and conclude.

W. S. GRAYSON.

P. S.—Such is the argument. Now this argument cannot be met by saying the Methodist Church is "not a reformation, but a division;" that "it was not reforming at all, but building de novo." To say that it is not a reformation, is only to say that the Anglican Church is more Scriptural in her faith and practice than the Methodist Church. This is the very question to which we wish to bring these gentlemen. Are they willing to meet upon this basis? If they do, it is an acknowledgment that we are not to judge Protestant Churches by succession, but by the written law. I suppose they will not deny that if we prove the Methodist Church to be right in the points of dispute between her and the Church of England, and which produced the separation, that the Methodist protest was and is a reformation. I suppose they will not deny that if the Methodist Church prove herself to be a reformation, that therefore she has the divine written authority of Christ in her favor as against the church reformed.

But it would be an abandonment of the doctrine of succession were these gentlemen to argue the question of reformation as between the Church of England and the Methodist Church, by admitting the authority of the Scripture to settle doctrines concerning salvation, because the Scripture bears no testimony to the truth of the authentic ordinations of the officers of the Church who were ordained after the death of the infallible apostles.

They seem strangely to think that because the Scripture commands a thing, that therefore the human beings commanded invariably did that thing; and that, too, in the face of the fact, to which they frequently allude, that very early in the history of the Church the Bishop of Ephesus tried apostles, who said they were such, and found them, upon trial, to be liars. As a Methodist, I am perfectly willing to change the issue from ministerial regularity to the sufficiency of the Scripture, in order to settle questions of doctrinal disagreement between them and me. I am willing to meet them upon the issue of reformation or division. But they must agree, before they meet me, to admit that if I succeed in this debate and prove the Methodist Church to be a reformation, and not a division, that I have succeeded in defending the Christian character of the Methodist Church as contrasted with that of the Church of England. And they cannot do this without surrendering the doctrine of the divine authority of the succession. Indeed, they cannot be Protestants unless they do make this surrender.

THE NEW MEXICAN MAIL.—The St. Louis Republican of the 24th, says:

Our advices by telegraph from Independence are to the evening of Friday, at which time the mail had not arrived from Santa Fe. This is remarkable, such an occurrence not having happened for a long while as the delay of the mail beyond the 20th or 21st. The impression prevails in the upper country that the mail party has been cut off by the Indians. There are rumors, not yet authenticated, of the murder of parties of emigrants on the plains by the Indians. In many of these reports, very little confidence is to be placed.

LAND WARRANTS.—The National Intelligencer, of Friday last, says:

The market is by no means glutted. Not more than 4,000 warrants have yet been issued, and these have been scattered over the whole Union, so that no one point has been overstocked. Washington seems thus far to have been the best market, the price ranging from $1 09 to $1 10 per acre, according to the size of the warrant; whilst at New York and Philadelphia $1 07 has been the prevailing price. We understand that the tendency is now downward, as there will be a large issue of eighty's on the 1st July.

The Ouachita Register of the 21st says:

Since our last issue the dust in our streets has been buried in its own tomb, and the ducks and geese have once more been afforded an opportunity of learning their young how to swim. The thirsty cisterns have drank to their utmost capacity, and the corn-cribs on the Ouachita plantations are beginning to cry out, "room, room, a kingdom for more room," in anticipation of the abundant harvest they will be called upon to provide for.

We find the following in the Bienville (La.) Times:

WEATHER AND CROPS.—June 18.—Mercury 99 in the shade; crops perishing very rapidly. June 19.—We have had a refreshing shower, to-day, but not half a season. Some of our neighbors, from appearances, must have had copious showers.

LATER FROM EUROPE.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP ASIA

Further War News.

By the latest New York papers, we have the dispatches in full received by them by the Asia. The dispatches are from Halifax, the 20th inst., and contain very interesting information.

HALIFAX, Wednesday, June 20.—The Royal Mail steamship Asia, Captain Lott, from Liverpool, at the afternoon of the 9th inst., arrived here at 1½ this morning.

The bombardment of Sebastopol was recommenced on the 6th inst., and on the day the steamer sailed a dispatch was received from Lord Raglan, dated "June 8, 0 o'clock P. M.," announcing that after a fierce bombardment, the French attacked and carried the "Mamelon" and the "White Tower"—the greatest gallantry being displayed on both sides.

The loss both to the Russians and the French was very great, but no figures are given.

This event gave great buoyancy to the public feeling, and caused a slight rise in Consols.

Horace Greeley was arrested in Paris on Saturday, June 2, and kept in Clichy, the debtor's prison, till Monday, at the instance of a French exhibitor of objets d'arts at the New York Crystal Palace, whose goods being broken and injured, he thought proper to sue for damages; the first Director who presented himself being Greely, he was arrested, after having been in Parisfortnight. The suit was heard on the 4th of June, when Greely was, of course, set at liberty. Hein frightfully wroth, and is said to be preparing a document of the most alarming sort on the subject.

The War.

The general bombardment of Sebastopol was recommenced on the 6th of June, with what result has not transpired.

The Conferences of Vienna having been formally closed at the instigation of the Western Powers, negotiations for peace are not likely to be renewed unless Russia shall apply to Austria for her good offices.

Prussian correspondence says that Austria considers herself released from all engagements to the Western Powers, the latter having refused to conclude peace on reasonable terms.

Austria, however, still professes herself the ally of France and England, but subject to article one of the treaty of December 2, which says: "The high contracting Powers reserve to themselves the right of proposing, according to circumstances, such conditions as they may judge necessary for the general interests of Europe." Of this right Austria takes advantage.

The Vienna papers advise me that although the Conferences are closed, Russian Plenipotentiaries have the Austrian propositions under consideration, and that Austria is still desirous to effect a mediation. Meanwhile the Military Commissioners of France and Great Britain have left Vienna.

The appointment of Baron Manderstrom as Special Envoy to Vienna is announced, and considered important; his supposed object being to avail himself of the present neutrality of Austria to effect an armed neutrality among the Central Powers of Europe.

The war news by this arrival consists mostly of details of previous government telegraphs. Details are to hand of the affair before Sebastopol, night of May 22, but the main facts were previously known. The details show great gallantry on the part of the French, but also show that the victory was not in reality a further success, but merely a successful attempt to destroy very dangerous works which the Russians had erected in front of their defence, and which would have outflanked the French attack. The Russian plan was to unite all their ambuscades by a line of gabions connected by a continuous covered way with their present defences; to enclose in fact, an entirely new space of ground. The French plan was to carry this new defence, and transform it into a French position, which was accomplished at an immense loss, which, says Pelissier, gave to the engagement the proportions of a battle. Pelissier's dispatch is quite interesting. Details have also been received of the Allied advance on the Tchernaya. The Allied force consisted of 20,000 men, French, Sardinians and Turks. The Russians made no opposition, but retired with their guns. The condition of the ground shows that the Russians never intended to maintain the position. New reconnoissances had been made, and a further advance was expected. The telegraphic accounts indicate that the Allies are yet on their own side of the river.

Details have been received likewise of the capture of Kertch. The invading force numbered nearly 20,000 men—namely, 10,000 French, 5,000 Turks, and 3,500 English, in numerous steamers. The expedition entered the Strait of Kertch on Thursday, the 24th, and commenced firing upon the Forts of Anbalaki—the garrisons of which speedily abandoned the place, having previously blown up the magazines. The Allied gun-boats silenced the Paulovisknya Battery, and burned some Russian boats and small craft. The garrisons of Kertch and Yenikale, variously estimated at from two to ten thousand strong, were seen to leave and fall back into the interior by the Southern road.

Meanwhile the Allies landed without opposition at Ambaalki, where they bivouacked for the night. The next morning they moved on toward Kertch. Gun-boats were all the time occupied in securing the Tamanskoi Gulf, and reducing the fort on the Sand Bank. All the inhabitants had fled. Many houses were burning, and by Friday, at 8 o'clock, the empty cities of Kertch and Yenikale were in the hands of the Allies, and a steam flotilla immediately entered the Sea of Azoff; the last winter's tempest had washed away the 40 ships sunk across the Strait by the Russians. The Allies found 17,000 tons of coal at Kertch, and 50 dismantled guns, but no powder or stores. The total number of vessels burned by the Allies is 240. The Allies propose to fortify Yenikale and garrison it by Turks, but will not hold Kertch. The steamers of light draft are cruising as near as possible to Taganrog, and gun-boats, yet lighter, are preparing. Considerable discrepancy exists in the accounts of the Allied proceedings at Geoltschi. Sidney Herbert, in Parliament on the 8th, expressly said that the press draw inferences from the successes that are not justified by the facts, for editorials speak as if Arabat and Genitschi are taken; but, although the Allies have bombarded the one and destroyed the stores at the other place, they are not yet in possession of them, and it must not therefore be thought that we are masters of the Putrid Sea.

Gortschakoff telegraphs, June 3, to St. Petersburg, that the Allies had left Genitschi, and part of the burned stores would be saved.

The Allied steamers afterwards visited Arabat and burned a number of merchant ships.

Gen. Wrangle remained at Argaintoca. The Allies have made no movement towards the interior of the peninsula of Kertch.

Cracow letters report that the insurrection in the Ukraine is not yet suppressed. The discontent of the people is chiefly directed against the priests as agents of the Government.

The Baltic.

The British and French fleets were on June 4, close to Cronstadt. Admiral Dundas had made a reconnoissance, and found that new fortifications had been erected since last year. Several vessels laden with timber had been captured by the Allies.

Americans have recently made money by running cargoes of salt to the Russian Baltic ports, but the speculation is now attended with danger.

Asia.

Gen. Pelissier telegraphs, June 8, that the Russians have evacuated Soujah Kall, destroying, before doing so, sixty guns and six mortars. Their entire force is concentrated at Anapa.

Changes have occurred in the Turkish ministry. Reschid Pacha has been dismissed; Mustapha Reschid succeeds him as Seraskier. Vely Pacha, Colonel of the Imperial Guard, has also been dismissed, and Selim Pacha appointed. The Capitan Pacha is threatened.

No answer has yet been received to the remonstrance sent home by Lord Stratford against the M. Benedetti (the French Charge) intrigues. It was Benedetti who effected the fall of Reschid Pacha, because Reschid was under English influence. Napoleon has approved of Benedetti's proceedings, and appointed him nominal Minister to Persia—a step of promotion—but does not remove him from Constantinople. Some see in this the commencement of larger differences between France and England. Meantime, Lord Stratford is laboring for Reschid's restoration to power.

New political combinations are springing up. The London Times, at present echoing the Government, is all for war—but argues that any prospect of a new invasion of the Principalities by Russia is extremely remote, as it will be long before Russia recovers strength for a great operation for offensive war—and to cross the Pruth would be to give a casus belli to Austria, and probably the rest of Germany. Hence the Times advises to unite Moldavia and Wallachia into one independent State, and in five years it would have become strong enough to resist invasion, and act as a barrier between Russia and Turkey.

Great Britain.

In Parliament, the adjourned debate on the War was resumed, and ended after a protracted discussion in Sir Francis Baring's motion being permitted to pass; nem. con namely, that this House having seen with regret that the Conference of Vienna have not led to a termination of hostilities, feel it a duty to declare that it will continue to give every support to her Majesty in the prosecution of the war until she shall, in conjunction with her Allies, obtain for the country a safe and honorable peace.

Mr. Roebuck's Committee had held a meeting to compare their reports. Messrs. Roebuck, Drummond, Packington and Lord Seymour, each submitted drafts. Lord Seymour's was taken as the basis for the report to be prepared for Parliament.

Sir Jos. Paxton proposes to Parliament a magnificent boulevard around London, eleven miles long, costing thirty-two millions sterling.

The Imperatrice steamer, belonging to the Liverpool and Brazilian line, used as a transport, had been wrecked in the Dowue after a collision.

France.

A decree extends the free importation of breadstuffs to England during the present year. The King of Sardinia will probably meet Queen Victoria in Paris, in August—perhaps the Sultan will also come. The Lord Mayor of London is visiting the perfect of the Seine. The Exposition becomes more flourishing.

Spain.

The Government represents the Carlist insurrection as entirely suppressed, but the province of Catalonia is placed in a state of siege, and troops continue to leave Madrid, leading to the inference that trouble still exists. There has been a break up in the Spanish Ministry, Medoy, Lugan, Lanzuiago, Agneera and Santa Cruz having resigned, and are succeeded by Bguli, Mortinez, Zabala, Fuente, Andrea and Escriver. A compulsory loan of $20,000,000, in anticipation of taxes, has been imposed.

Italy

Maximilian, brother of the Emperor of Austria, has had a private interview with the Pope, and the King of Naples, causing considerable speculation as to his object. Numerous political arrests have been made recently in the Roman States and Piedmont.

Germany.

The citizens of Hamburg have rejected the new constitution proposed by the Senate.

FROM THE BRAZIL SQUADRON.—Letters have been received at the Navy Department from Com. W. D. Salter, commanding the Brazil squadron off Montevideo, April 11, 1855, at which place he arrived on the 3d March, having left Rio on 18th March. He found at Montevideo the Germantown and Water Witch. The Water Witch left that place on the 10th of April for Buenos Ayres; and as soon as observations should have been obtained for the verification of the chronometers, she would leave that place for the exploration of the river Uruguay.

From recent accounts from Paraguay, the Brazilian Admiral has succeeded in the peaceable settlement of two of the questions in dispute which have for some years past agitated the two countries. Among these Paraguay has yielded to Brazil the right of the navigation of the Parhguay river; and seven of the men-of-war comprising a part of the Brazilian squadron now at the mouth of the Paraguay will ascend that river to Cuayla, the capital of Matto Grasso, a province of Brazil. Nothing had transpired relative to the right conceded to other nations to ascend the river, either through that portion of it claimed by Paraguay or that claimed by Brazil. Both the French and English squadrons have a man-of-war in the Parana river, at Corrientes, whose object is said to be to have an eye to the result of the pending negotiation. [Wash. Union.

OFF FOR THE GOLD DIGGINGS.—Three of our young men, Messrs. Delany, Bell and Biggers, started, on Saturday last, for the gold mines on the Arkansas river. From all we can learn on the subject, we shall not be surprised if the young adventurers reap a rich reward for their toils. A correspondent, writing to the Little Rock True Democrat, from Fort Smith, on the 9th inst., says: "Captains Dillard's and Aird's companies leave this day for the new gold diggings on the Red Fork of the Arkansas. Capt. Charles A. Birnie's company crossed the Arkansas river last evening."

"The late accounts from the new diggings confirm all we have herstofore heard; so you see we are sending quite a new colony out to seek the dust. Other persons in this and Crawford county are making the necessary arrangements to leave. The excitement in California in '49, compares no where with the present. These mines are so near Fort Smith that a man can travel within three days' journey of them, and sleep in a house and have good fires every night; and Major Elias Rector informs me, that when Marshal of this State, he has traveled much further alone, in the Indian country, in the direction of the gold mines, than the place where the gold is said to be found, and that, too, without ever being molested by wild Indians, or having the least fear in relation to them." [Helena (Ark.) Democrat.

DISPATCHES FROM MR. MASON.—The Paris correspondent of the New York Tribune says, that Mr. Mason, our Minister to France, has sent a dispatch to Washington, on the principle that the flag covers the cargo in respect to the British cruisers in the Baltic, as set forth also, in the recent circular by Count Nesselrode. He also intimates, that a journal published in Basle, Switzerland, that has been making violent attacks upon the Emperor of France, has been instigated thereto and sustained by the American Consul at Basle, and the Frank authorities have made urgent appeal to Mr. Mason to try and check the abuse.

On May 1st, in the south of Sweden, the navigation was open, and was being carried on with great activity; but in the gulf of Stockholm the ice was so thick that heavily ladened wagons could ply upon it. The winter in Sweden has been more rigorous than has been known in the memory of man. According to the last accounts from Helsingfors, in Finland, the ice was there more than a yard thick.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, JULY [illegible], 1855.

News of the Week

[illegible] yellow [illegible] Cemetery [illegible] we visited the Charity Hospital, and [illegible] might interest the readers of the Advocate. We were politely shown through the principal wards by Dr. Austin. In one of these wards there was a patient convalescent, who had been so far gone with yellow fever as to have black vomit. This is one of those rare cures attributable to professional skill. The clerk, Mr. Vanderlinden, courteously answered our inquiries from his books. The number in hospital, 538. Cholera has about disappeared. For the month of June there were [illegible] brought in with yellow fever, of whom [illegible] died. July, up to our visit, ten deaths of yellow fever; twenty or twenty-five under treatment. We have also learned of eight or ten cases in private practice. This, upon the whole, we regard a favorable bill of health. Many thousands are in our city, strangers or unacclimated.

On Sunday, midday, fell the heaviest rain of the season. Congregations were slow in breaking up; many persons remaining at church till 4 P. M.

The Fourth of July was spiritedly observed. Excursions on railroads and lake boats prevailed. Young America held a grand temperance festival under the Greenville Oaks, where much cold water was drank, many good speeches made. This festival was, in our estimation, the pleasantest and most hopeful feature of the day. Stores were closed. The day was as fine as could be—saving heat. A friend has expressed a wish that that "document" had been signed and declared a few months earlier.

Quarantine is kept up, and giving the merchant some dissatisfaction at the delays imposed on shipping. Capt. McGowan, of the Crescent City, broke through last Saturday and came up to the city; for which he is now before the courts.

QUIETNESS THE HEART'S TRUE POWER.

The Quakers have taught us a lesson which it would be well for us to teach ourselves, and that is, quietness. Not only is strength wasted by excitement, but an appearance of weakness given in its place. To look grave is a great wisdom, as well as a great art. A bundle of fire-crackers contains much more powder than a loaded pistol, but it operates very differently. The one starts a series of intellectual but noisy little emissions a short distance in all directions, the other shoots far deep in one. And the reason of the difference is one worth study. In the one case the barrel is of paper, in the other [illegible]. The energy of the one is scattered [illegible] shell, that of the other concentrated. We should recollect this in matters religious, as well as secular. We discredit as well as dissipate our religious character by a discomposed and restless manner. Self-compression and self-chastisement are nearly allied to humility. The man that waits at all soon learns to wait upon the Lord. And, indeed, there is something exquisitely attractive as well as comforting in our composure. It is a great deal to sit in peace while the world is rocking about, for it proves that we are steadied by a power above the world. To the Christian there is peculiar value in this. It is the only quality by which we can disarm the world, for while the world can meet him with wit and strength, and sometimes argument, it cannot meet him with peace. In the Christian's humility and peacefulness, also, is his aggressive power. In families this is greatly the case, for the [illegible] has wrought all the conversions which the little family circle knows—the eloquent tongue none. "A meek and quiet spirit" let my prayer be, "give me, O God!"

Gov. Collier.—The Tuscaloosa Observer, we are glad to see, contradicts the report of Gov. Collier's death, and says, though he has been very unwell for some time past, he is now convalescent. We trust his valuable life may long be spared.

Correspondents—Will observe that our printer is patriotic—has gone taking the Fourth; and several articles laid over till next week.

Post-Office Robberies.—There are fourteen cases of post-office robbery, and several cases of counterfeiting coin, on the criminal calender of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of New York, now in session at Canandaigua. William Gilmer and William Fowler, charged with robbing the post-office at Sodus, on the night of the 15th of May last, have been convicted before that court.

The Indiana civil war has ceased, as the Wabash and Erie Canal have compromised with the Clay County Regulators. The trustees have agreed to cut down the timber in the Reservoir to the water's edge, and when the water can be spared, to let it out, and remove all the timber, the Regulators promising in return, not to meddle with any of the work of the canal.

A Hungarian named Wiesenberger, emigrating to Minnesota, was robbed of $4,000 a few days since, at Cincinnati.

Winans' Discourses.—Stevenson & Owen, publishers, Nashville, Tenn., 1855: 8vo., pp. 389.

The discourses are seventeen, on "fundamental religious subjects." The first, on the "Divine Revelation of the Holy Scriptures," is styled preliminary, and was delivered, as a foot note informs us, in Woodville, Miss., in 1839, by request of a committee of skeptics. The volume is dedicated to the members of the Mississippi Annual Conference, to which body the author belongs, and at whose request it was enterprised. Large type, generous margin and good paper.

The two first of the series proper are on the Divine Existence, having regard to whatever is peculiar to [illegible] existence, including the Trinity in Unity. The third is the Creation; next, the Existence and Agency of the Devil; next, the Plan of Redemption—covering six discourses; Repentance and Salvation by Faith; and the General Judgment. At a glance, it appears that the subjects are not only fundamental, but the order of arrangement is favorable to fundamental treatment. The author does not close his discourses so summarily. "There is in them too much discussion, too much argument, and too little movement to admit them to that classification." He also well observes that, while there are discourses extant on all these subjects, there is no other series forming a system of related facts, and exhibiting the interdependence of the several parts. The volume therefore occupies a place of its own, and a considerable one.

Dr. Winans' style has the qualities of being satisfactory and painful. If a lawyer, he would not presume the court to know anything. Ellipsis is a figure of syntax he ignores. Parenthetical sentences abound. The ands, ifs, tos, thats and thes are never omitted. If his vocal mechanism were worked at small cost, this might be accounted for; but it is not. The hearer sees and feels this. The very leisure for preparing this volume for the press was owing to "a chronic affection of the throat," brought on, doubtless, by pulpit labors. This peculiarity, in the absence of fluent physical ease, is accounted for by an innate homage to logical and narrative accuracy, and to the integrity of ideas. His conscience would accuse him of having garbled the truth if he had not told not only all of it, but all about it; and his reason of having slighted a theme while anything remained to be said. The dusts of the balance are cared for in weighing opinions and making up his conclusions. In the region of definition and statement, and applying evidence to the exact right point of an argument, Dr. Winans is unexcelled. These powers are happily displayed in many of these discourses—the Trinity in Unity, for instance. Every word has its duty to do in filling out a thought or guarding it from misapprehension; and though attention is often painfully taxed and never relieved, it is always repaid. He grapples his subject with hooks of steel—a very different use of language from that easy, flowing and pleasant thing called "word-painting."

Dr. Winans' mental processes and powers more resemble an old divine of the seventeenth century, Dr. Isaac Barrow, than any other known to us. The severe accuracy, exhaustive discussion and thorough research are not the only points of resemblance. Barrow called his sermons treatises. They were "cast" and delivered without reference to any other parts or qualities of his hearers than brains, of which they were always presumed to have a good deal. Soon after the Restoration, on a visit to London, he was invited to preach by Dr. Wilson, "Master of Trinity." "At the time appointed," says his biographer, "he came, with an aspect pale, meagre and unpromising; slovenly and carelessly dressed, his collar unbuttoned, his hair uncombed, &c." A dispersion of the congregation occurred, of which he seemed to take no notice; named his text and preached his sermon to two or three gathered, or rather left together, of which number, as it fortunately happened, Richard Baxter was one. The small audience, with one exception, were anything but pleased, and even expostulated with Dr. W. for allowing such a person to use his pulpit. Baxter, being present and appealed to, "commended the sermon to that degree that he said he never heard a better, and could willingly have been his auditor all day long." Upon which the complainants changed their tone, and confessed they did not hear much of the sermon.

It is one of the highest compliments to the masses that Dr. Winans is a popular preacher. Herein is a marked contrast between him and the old English divine.

These discussions are a rich contribution to Christian literature, and rank above any volume of Methodist sermons produced in this country. Without affectation of originality, there is independence of thought, occasionally bringing out views at variance with standards. These occasions are few, but calculated to pique curiosity. An intimate acquaintance with the Bible appears throughout. Very directly from it has the author drawn. Reference to commentators for authority and to profane history for illustration, are scarce.

An advantage of this publication is, that "the people," who are not inclined to the study of this kind of literature, will be encouraged to undertake it from having been in communion with the author. They have heard him in the pulpit, and talked with him at the fireside, and therefore will be drawn to follow with pleasant associations and hope of success through these deeper and consecutive thinkings. This advantage does not pertain to the cloistered sermonizer and professional book-maker.

The study of these discourses (and unless the reader is willing to study he will realise but little of their benefit) will promote education, theology and devotion.

Progress, Considered with particular reference to the Methodist Church. By Rev. W. J. Sasnett, M. A. Stevenson & Owen, Nashville, 1855: pp. 318.

Professor Sasnett thinks the Church ought to be more closely identified with the forces of society, and not only enlarge her territory, but her scope. Education is one of these forces—this the Church should control. Besides this he treats of her oleomosynary, missionary, ministerial and spiritual functions. Some will join issue with him in what he lays down as the true relation of the Church to society; others as to the development of them, but all will be quickened and enlarged by his views. They are put forth in excellent style; free from the censoriousness of the fault-finder and the recklessness of the agitator. He speaks out—not recklessly, but fearlessly. The book puts into circulation ideas important to the Church and society, and will have an influence in shaping the progress of both. It would be read and digested better if the sections were sub-divided into chapters.

Speeches and Addresses—By H. W. Hilliard. Harper & Bros., New York, 1855: pp. 497.

We trust the author is not about to lay himself on the shelf (retire from public life) now that he has put this handsome and readable volume there. That would be a real loss to the country, as this is a favor.

The first of the speeches was delivered in the House of Representatives of Alabama, January, 1839, on the Sub-Treasury; most of the rest in Congress. Besides subjects of exciting political kind, we have those more agreeable to the scholar and lecturer,—Eulogies upon Clay, Webster, Harrison and American Industry and Government. Urbanity, refined sentiment and classical elegance too seldom grace the noble strife of legislative halls. It is refreshing to see them wafted into it, after the manner of Mr. Hilliard. As girls forget their pianos when they get to be wives, so do collegians forget classics when they rise to politicians. Between empty buncombites and heavy statisticians few take position. To give his "figure" or make his "pint," in the hardest-faced way, is the Hon. Dryasdust model. Such was not Burke; such is not Hilliard.

These speeches are rich in historical illustrations. An elevated moral tone pervades them; and without at all committing ourselves to their political conclusions, we freely express our liking for their graceful bearing and elevated tone, so well calculated to keep the legislative atmosphere clear of low passions, and preserve its deliberations from degenerating into mere scuffles. California Conference.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH (NORTH.)

The fourth annual session met on the 16th May, at Stockton, Bishop O. C. Baker presiding. Forty-three ministers present, and four reported absent.

H. C. Benson, elected Secretary; E. Merchant, Assistant Secretary.

Bishop O. C. Baker opened the Conference by reading the Scriptures and prayer, and administered the holy communion.

Admitted on trial: Wm. Gaffney, Richard W. Williamson, Alfred Highie, Jacob Miller, Wm. J. Maclay, Charles Northrup, Charles V. Anthony, H. E. Foster, Benj. W. Rusk, Edwin Aylworth.

It was announced that Rev. W. Oliver had surrendered his parchments and retired from the ministry. Mr. Oliver had gone into the practice of law.

Charles Bonner asked the Conference to grant him a location. Granted.

The Conference ordered a committee of five to take into consideration the propriety of securing a cemetery for the use of ministers and their families who may die in this country. The pastors of San Francisco, Marysville, Stockton and Santa Clara were appointed said committee, and instructed to report at the next session of the Conference.

Conference took up the report on slavery. The following resolutions were adopted:

"Resolved, That we do not concur in the alterations of the general rule in our Book of Discipline proposed by the Troy, North Ohio and Wisconsin Conferences. Vote, 28 to 2."

"Resolved, That we request the General Conference, at its annual session, by resolution, so to explain said rule as to make it evident that it forbids the buying and selling men, women and children as slaves. Vote, 28 to 2."

A vote of thanks was given to C. M. Wober, Esq., for his liberality and kindness in giving a lot on which to erect a German M. E. Church, for the use of Rev. Mr. Kellner, who had just come as a German Missionary.

The anniversary of the Conference Missionary Society was held in the Methodist Church. Addresses by Revs. E. Thomas, S. B. Rooney and M. C. Briggs. The collections of the evening amounted to $230.

Delegates to the General Conference, to be held next May, at Indianapolis: On the first ballot, J. D. Blain was elected; on the fifth, Isaac Owen. On motion, Revs. S. D. Simonds and W. Taylor were the alternates.

Conference held its Sunday School Anniversary. The Stockton School was present, under the direction of ex-Mayor Buffington, and the exercises were enlivened with singing by the children. Addresses were delivered by N. Reasoner and M. C. Briggs. Collection, $250.

Though not in the midst of it, or practically concerned with the "peculiar institution," this Conference, like others of the connection North, is drawn by the customary infatuation into resolutions, definitions, reports, &c., about slavery. A special committee was appointed to take it into consideration! Why did they not also appoint a committee to "take Sebastopol"—into consideration?

In their report, (two of the resolutions are published above,) the committee say:

"The Church must, therefore, throw the burden of proof (onus probandi) of the innocence of members connected with it on the persons themselves. Every slaveholder should be held, prima facie, a sinner unfit for the kingdom of God, and he should be required to show that he is not mercenary, and that emancipation is, in his case, impracticable, before he is admitted to stand fully justified before the Church of Christ?"

The remarks of Bishop Andrew on the necessity of the Southern Church are thus corroborated.

Marysville was chosen as the next place of convocation. Rev. Mr. Simonds was elected editor of the Advocate; the Publishing committee of which state that it was of the first importance to the Church to continue the paper; but that to do so would require the most vigorous efforts on the part of the ministers. This was apparent from the fact that, though upwards of $9,000 had been paid by the New York agents, still there was no surplus on hand.

Autaugaville, Ala., June 27, 1855.

We have just closed a meeting at this place of 16 days continuance; which resulted in the accession of 41 probationers. We regard this to some extent, but the continuance of the revival at this place last year. Let our predecessors on this work last year, be encouraged to sow the good seed. Our presiding Elder preached with great success twice a day for several days. Bro. Starr was with us two days. Preached with unction, and consequently marked effect. A revival influence prevails around the circuit. The New Orleans Advocate meets with favor here.

Daniel Duncan.

Allenton, Wilcox Co., Ala. June 23.

We have had a long drouth in this neighborhood, and it was thought advisable that the churches should appoint a day of fasting and prayer, which was done, and I never saw a more solemn congregation in my life. All denominations met at the Methodist Church, and bro. King preached a very appropriate sermon from 2. Corinthians fifth chapter, from the words "Therefore knowing the terror of the Lord we persuade men." After which several prayers were offered, and in answer to the prayers of the people of God, the good Lord sent us refreshing showers upon the earth, and I hope to some considerable extent. He has refreshed the church with showers of grace, and I hope the time is not far distant when we will have a pentecostal shower in this part of the vineyard. Yours very respectfully in the bonds of christian love.

J. P. Robbins.

Gordo, Pickens Co., Ala.

My circuit is getting along well. We received 244 last year, and I do not think we will lose more than one dozen of them. There is a water sprout hard after me and he is spreading himself like a green bay. He said in his preaching, that the Methodists got sprinkling pouring and infant baptism from Africa, and the Methodists are the granddaughters of the Catholics, and Methodists baptize children for original sin. He is like thunder in the north, a fuss, but neither light nor heat; but we hold him an honorable pole, considering he goes by water and we by land.

Julius N. Glover.

East Baton Rouge Circuit, Miss., Conference, June 26, 1855

Our third quarterly meeting was held at Manchac church, commencing on the 14th June, and continuing four days. It is thought that a meeting of more general interest and usefulness has never been held at this appointment. The spirit was present comforting the little flock, and promoting conviction in the hearts of sinners. Many mourners were at the altar, and I trust there was a depth of penitence manifested not to be removed but by conversion.

In the commencement of this year, the society at Manchac numbered 12, all females. Two more ladies joined sometime previous to the quarterly meeting, and the result, so far, is a society of 28 members, 8 males and 20 females. The most of these who joined are of that class, who can exert a good influence in the community.

You have published a communication from bro. Crenshaw, in reference to one of my appointments, to which I would add the same Spirit has been exhibited at Manchac in relation to a house of worship. They have pulled down their old church and built one of larger dimensions and more comfortable in its arrangements.

We shall always find that the Lord fulfils his part in the agreement he has made with his people, when the conditions of that agreement are met by them: Mal. iii. 10th verse.

We are gaining ground in this circuit. Sunday-schools prosperous, and a strong hope is entertained, with suitable efforts to accomplish the object, that before the year shall close, we shall have old Methodism exemplified at every appointment, in the faithful and profitable attendance of the membership at the class-room.

LETTER FROM A BIRD OF PASSAGE.

Northern Scenes—Weather—Labor—Taken for Missionaries—Indians.

Here, on the Hudson, resting in the shadows of the highlands, I recall my promises to write to you, and with the thought of you come grateful visions of your warm summer sky and southern breezes; so great a contrast to the chilling winds and dripping wearying rains that our mountains are now flinging down upon us. Still, there is much that is pleasant in the musical dropping and tinkling of the raindrops against the window-panes, but in this bright month of June it seems wrong to have autumn-clouds and showers. Instead of two thousand miles I feel ten thousand to be between us and the genial sun-shining land we have left. But little as the cold breezes of the North suit us, I could not but feel as we rushed through the State, that they had their own mighty influence on the habits and minds of the people.

We caught passing glimpses of great stone heaps in corners of the green fields and at the road-sides, all of which had been gathered one by one from the rich ground and piled up there, that the plough might have free access to every foot of land. They looked to me like little monuments of patience and perseverance, nor were they all that showed the energy of our northerners: in some fields large stumps were being uprooted, by what agency seemed inexplicable, and in others the newly-felled trees were lying so thick that it looked to me like herculean task ever to clear the land. The keen air seems to have imparted to man something of its own nature, strong, resolute and unconquerable, and I felt proud of my native State as I saw what her sons could and did accomplish.

But pride gave place to mirth and that to shame as we glanced, like a fast-flashing ray of light, through Syracuse, where, not very long ago, women pleaded to be men—but I will not blame them—some good they have done, and let us hope but little evil.

It is a handsome well-built town, in its quietness and primness seeming little like the spot where ultraists have so often congregated.

Did you know that we had been taken for missionaries and the youngest of our party commiserated? It is true, strange as it may seem, and many a hearty laugh have we had over it. On our boat were six missionaries, bound for the Indian Territory, and we had been confounded with them, perhaps because of the interest we felt in their party: there were three little children and four young ladies, none of whom had seen each others faces before, and now they were leaving father, mother, home and friends, to become teachers to the Choctaws and Cherokees. We asked the leader of the party if it did not give him great pain to take his little children among savages, and to so wild a land, but he only smiled at our ignorance, and said that the mission at "Good Water," whither they were bound, had been established for twenty years, that they already had a fine male boarding-school of three hundred scholars, and a female one of twenty girls. Imagine, Indians at a boarding-school! Then too, there was an advanced state of civilization, fine churches, good houses and even a state-house, and still more wonderful, no whisky.

So all my fine visions of life in a wigwam, free boundless prairies, noble untamed forests and all the many romantic adjuncts of a life among savages were cloud-visions after all, and I turned with a sigh to the stern facts of stone-walls, modern dresses and civilized laws. All the poetry of their sacrifices was gone, and there was nothing left for them to regret except the separation from home and home-friends, and in some cases these were to be re-visited in three years. I longed to go with them to have a little peep at their future mode of life, and to add another leaf to these many pictures of our beautiful land that I have already garnered up. Mr. Ulls, the leader, said we would often hear from them in the reports of the Missionary Record of the Presbyterian Board. They all left us at Napoleon, and the last glimpse we caught of them their faces were radiant with smiles, as though they were reaching the land of promise, and such it must have been to them.

While stopping at Utica, Schenectady and other towns in New York, well-dressed modest squaws came into the cars offering little bags and cushions of their own work for sale, and their retiring innocent ways and down-cast eyes spoke loudly in favor of their education and civilization. Some of these girls wore black beaver hats with plumes, such as ladies now wear on horse-back, and all were neat and clean, presenting a powerful contrast to the degraded ignorant beings we see in our Southern States, especially Louisiana.

Let us hope that the day is not far distant when those heathens in our midst may be taught the gospel, and raised to a level with their happier brethren of the North. M.

THE NATIONAL ANNIVERSARY.

One day at least out of the revolving and ever-returning three hundred and sixty-five is, in this country, sure of general observance and regard. One day, selected and sanctified from the remainder, draws the minds and memories of the people to the history of their country and to the benefits which they enjoy in it; leads them to a review of the proud advantages of the government they have inherited, and induces stronger bonds of brotherhood—firmer feelings of nationality. That day has dawned. Before the first eye has glanced over these lines—before the first copy of this morning's paper has reached its readers' hands, every State, every city and every town of the country, will resound with the announcement of its birth. Loud proclamations of welcome will be volleyed out on the Atlantic, to the Gulf, to the Pacific; along the shores of the Great Lakes, amid old forests, in the Rocky Mountains and Alleghanies, and State will answer back to State in the general jubilee of joy. Nor will the salvos that hail the great Sabbath of the nation be confined to the nation itself. In every water where the American flag floats—and where does it not?—in every port where an American vessel lies, echo will be many-tongued on the return of the day that so many years ago christened our present nationality. There will be colors flying and cannon rearing high up above Baffin's Bay and far down below Cape Horn; in the most Northern Atlantic, in the sunniest Southern seas. The inhabitants of far-away lands and strange countries that hardly know the existence of our continent will be wakened to a recollection of its being by the festivities attending this day, while, at home, from one extreme limit to the other, there will be a general display of patriotism.

It is well that this should be. We rejoice to know and feel that everywhere the great heart of the people is true and loyal to its love of country, and that, though now and then there may be influences which seem to show a decay of national feeling, it is only in appearance true. Americans have for America, for its institutions, its progress and its glory, as sincere a regard as the people of any other country for theirs. The government whose foundations were laid by the wisdom of Washington, Franklin, Jefferson and Hamilton, and which has been illustrated by the genius of many men eminent in all branches of art, literature and science; which has developed more rapidly than was ever before done, the resources of a great continent; which has pushed forward popular education and material advancement in an unparalleled manner; which has triumphantly spread itself over new States and great Territories, and given a practical refutation to the sneers and scoffings of foreign enemies, has become dear to the hearts of all its sons, and their pride, daily increasing, daily resolves more firmly that neither interference from abroad nor opposing influences at home shall prevent the Republic from realizing, in its golden and glorious future, all the highest hopes of its founders.

We trust that to-day all those sentiments of patriotism and love of country which make manhood great, may be renewed and increased, and that amid the pageantry and festivity of the occasion its real import may not be lost sight of.

"Thou, too, sail on, O ship of State!
Sail on, O Union, strong and great!
Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!
We know what Master laid thy keel,
What workmen wrought thy ribs of steel;
Who made each mast, and sail, and rope,
What anvils rang, what hammers beat,
In what a forge and what a heat
Were shaped the anchors of thy hope!
Fear not each sudden sound and shock,
'Tis of the wave and not the rock;
'Tis but the flapping of the sail,
And not a rent made by the gale!
In spite of rock and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea!
Our hearts, our hopes, are all with thee,
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee—are all with thee!"

New Orleans and Jackson Railroad.—The Jackson (Miss.) Flag of the Union, of the 20th ult., says: "We learn that the Hon. A. G. Brown will address his fellow-citizens at the Hall of the House of Representatives on Monday evening, the 9th proximo, in advocacy of aid to the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad."

We are truly glad to hear that Senator Brown has entered upon such a laudable labor. In the counties along the line of the road between the State boundary and the capital of Mississippi, there is no man living who yields so powerful and commanding an influence. The people will believe him when they would believe no one else. And if it be possible to open their hearts, and cause their pockets to discount in favor of railroad enterprises, Brown is the person to do it. If he fails, all future endeavors will be worse than useless—as futile as attempts to raise roses in the Desert of Sahara, or to make gun cotton available for ordinary purposes.

Senator Brown's course is really to be admired. While the other leading men of his State are stumping the country to accomplish purely partisan purposes, from which little practical good can flow, no matter what the result, he goes round among the people and seeks to enlist their active aid in behalf of a great work, the completion of which will do them more actual benefit than all of the elections likely to take place within the next quarter of a century. That magnificent enterprise is now languishing for want of available means. If Gov. Brown succeeds in arousing the people, who have heretofore been singularly torpid and lethargic, to a full sense of their interests and duties, he will be more entitled to the appellation of public benefactor than any politician within the limits of our sister State.

Bloody Indian Work.—A Company of Troops Killed.—A recent telegraphic dispatch from St. Louis, announces that an arrival from Mexico brings a report that the Apache Indians had attacked two companies of United States troops garrisoned in that territory, killed upwards of fifty men and all the officers of one company. No particulars are given.

A NOVELTY IN PAINTING.

During our visit to Algiers on Saturday, we paid a visit to the Opelousas Railroad Depot, in order to see for ourself what the Algerines have been talking so much about for a week or two past, viz: a lady engaged in the ornamental painting of the cars. We there found a plain, humble-looking man, engaged in the plebeian painting of a passenger car, and his wife, the lady spoken of, perched upon a board, painting a landscape on the end of the car, outside, and a handsome design of flowers and scroll-work. There is something in the process of painting that every one likes to behold; even a painter's apprentice, putting chalk letters on a door-post, will draw some admirers from the passing throng. It may therefore be imagined that a lady, engaged upon flowers and pictures in a public place as a railroad depot, would excite universal attention; and the lady in this instance has excited an interest which she could certainly never endure, but for the companionship of her husband and her desire to help him in his labors.

The painting of this lady is very fine, exceeding anything we have yet seen on wood; the flowers in particular being exquisite. She handles the pencil nimbly, too; she had put on, in five hour's time, two landscapes, each of which we should judge to be nearly a day's work—they being copied from prints before her. The scroll-work of her own design, is not to be surpassed. What struck us most forcibly, however, was the unpretending, democratic hearing of the artists, and the air of domesticity which pervaded the car. They are poor, humble people, who live in a cottage in the Third District, with a little child two years old; they have no servant; the wife, besides doing the cooking and washing, and taking care of the babe, crosses the river with her husband every morning, she carrying the little one and their dinner; and in the car we found a pail and playthings, for the repose and comfort of the baby while father and mother were busy plying the brush. There was something very "taking" in all this, which we find it hard to explain.

Mr. Leddy—for that is the painter's name—told us that his wife was the daughter of an English artist, and had learned flower-painting as an amusement; and that, being pressed by poverty since marriage, she had become willing to turn her talent to account, even if she had to go in public to do so; which she does willingly so long as he is by. Under his encouragement she has been for some time practicing portraits with a mother's fondness, using her child for a subject. On Monday we stopped at Mr. L.'s house, and inspected these efforts at portraits, which were very creditable for a novice, and satisfied us that with reasonable practice, Mrs. L. would be able to enter the lists with the regular professors. We were shown also a perfect gem of a picture, painted by her, entitled the "Nymph of the Waterfall," it being copied from a print, which print was taken from the original picture in the possession of Charles Dickens, in London.

We are strongly of opinion that the light these poor people is hid under a bushel, and that if Mrs. Leddy could receive proper encouragement, she would soon, with her brush raise herself and her loved ones from their present poverty; and we therefore take a pleasure in recommending them to the consideration of any who may wish to have a picture copied, or ornamental wood painting of any kind done. They will be found worthy of encouragement, and we are certain they are not to be excelled in their line. Mr. Leddy lives on Canal street, opposite Washington Square, the second door above Hope Hook and Ladder House.

By the arrival on Tuesday of the steamer Lonisinna, Capt Talbot, we have dates from Galveston to the 30th ult. The Galvastoe News of the 28th says:

All our accounts from the interior, in relation to the crops, continue to be every way encouraging. Seasonable and abundant rains have fallen everywhere, and, though it was previously the general opinion that a failure would extend to nearly all parts of the State, yet at this gloomy approhension is quite dissipated, and the crops of corn, cotton and sugar cane promise to be fully an average. The danger now apprehended is from too much rain for cotton in the Fall.

The same paper of the 30th gives the following account of the execution of the murderer Shultz:

Pursuant to the sentence of the District Court this callous man of crime was executed yesterday. At 12 o'clock, A. M., he was led out of the jail, and placed in the usual manner on his coffin, when the procession, consisting of about a thousand persons, moved toward the place of execution. On the way out, Shultz made several demonstrations of a determination to escape, and was only quieted upon being assured that if he persisted in these attempts, he would subject himself to the more summary execution of powder and ball. He persisted in his name was not John Shultz, and appeared to have been laboring under the hallucination that a discrepancy in the name, under which he received sentence, would finally be a means of his rescue. After the reading of the warrant by Sheriff Grove, he mounted the scaffold with a firm step, refusing all counsel or comfort from the clergy who were in attendance. While upon the scaffold, his daguerreotype was secured, after which the cowl was drawn and the man of many murders was launched into eternity.

Heavy rains have recently fallen in the neighborhood of Corpus Christi, raising all the rivers and small streams in the surrounding country.

A band of about 100 Indians recently made an incursion into the country lying between Nueces valley and Laredo. After killing a Mexican they were pursued by two companies of rifles, but they succeeded in escaping. It was supposed they were Lipans from the other side of the Rio Grande.

The San Antonio Texan of the 23th says:

On Tuesday evening last an express came into our city bringing the news that a party of Indians had, the night previous, taken away some fifteen horses belonging to E. Bradon, and some five or six from B. E. Edwards, Esq., both gentlemen of our city; and we believe that those belonging to the latter gentleman were killed. Several arrows were found and brought to our city; they were Comanche arrows, but this is no assurance of what tribe they belong to. This took place near the Medina, some twelve or fifteen miles from San Antonio, and in the vicinity of where several horses were stolen by them last week, concerning which a fight came off with those pursued, as mentioned in the Texan of last week. A party of some two young men, armed and equipped as necessity directed, left our city Tuesday night in pursuit, but they will hardly effect anything, as the Indians have a good start. We shall not be surprised at any moment at hearing of whole families murdered, or women and children carried into captivity.

We learn from the same paper that a few days previous an affray occurred near that city between two men named Lakey and Boren, in which the former was wounded and the latter killed.

The Galveston Journal of the 30th says:

We learn from a gentleman who has just arrived from Brownsville, that the Rio Grande river is higher than it has been for years, in many places overflowing its banks. It has rained incessantly, in that section, since the fourth of June. Our informant learned nothing later than what we have already published in regard to the movements of the filibusters. Their forces number over two thousand men, and are daily increasing.

Deaths.

DIED—Mrs JANE LAMB, wife of Wm. Lamb, May 23, in the triumphs of a living faith. She was born in Georgia, in 1801, and at the age of fifteen professed saving faith in Christ, and joined the M. E. Church, and lived an acceptable member. When she came to Mississippi, as soon as circumstances would permit, she joined the Church here, and lived a zealous, faithful and devoted Christian till her death. During her illness she smiled her children around her bed and gave them such advice as she thought best, and exhorted all persons present to meet her in Heaven. She often spoke of her peace in God, and with this peace developing itself in her countenance, she fell asleep in Jesus.

Mississippi.

The Vicksburg Sentinel of Saturday, has the following paragraphs:

During the last two weeks we have had copious showers of rain. The crops everywhere are promising. We heard an old citizen say, a few days ago, that more corn would be raised in Warren this year than had ever been known. One of the planters in Madison parish says he has about a hundred bushels to the acre. The yield can hardly run up so high, but it is certain that we shall have corn enough and to spare.

The steamer E. Howard, on Thursday night, delivered at our landing the first lot of railroad cars for the Canton and Jackson Railroad. The cars seem adapted to a first class road, and weigh 68 pounds to the yard. We trust the contractors will hasten the laying of the track, so that our Madison county friends may by next fall leave their homes in the morning, sell their cotton and do their shopping at Vicksburg, and return home the same evening.

The Port Gibson Herald, of the 20th ult., gives the following account of a recent murder in that vicinity:

Mr. Robert Whitemore, overseer on the plantation of Dr. W. A. Patterson, about seven miles from this place, was brutally murdered by a runaway negro, on the 28th of May. The facts, as near as we can learn, are as follows: Mr. Whitemore left his house on the evening of that day for the field, about two hundred yards distant. When he entered the field, he saw the negro eating blackberries, on the opposite side of the fence. He crossed the fence to take him, when he was met by the negro and most horribly beaten on the head with a large stick and left for dead. He was found by Dr. Patterson's ploughmen about dark, and conveyed to his house, where he died of his wounds on the morning of the 30th ult. He said the negro was about six feet high, stout built, very black, and his front teeth were out.

JAIL BROKEN OPEN.—Escape of Prisoners.—On Monday night last, two of the prisoners confined in the jail of Clark county, at Quitman, succeeded in breaking out and effecting their escape. One was Thomas Covington, convicted of murder by the Circuit Court of Wayne county, but in whose case judgment was reversed and a new trial awarded by the High Court. The other was a hog thief, of whose crimes in the State had taken charge until a jury should pass upon his guilt or innocence. He has saved them that trouble. Both have made good their escape, not having been taken or tracked up to the period of our advices.

The conduct of the three remaining prisoners was singular, if not indeed inexplicable. Brewaig and Clark had both been convicted of manslaughter—the latter in the first degree—but had obtained new trials upon mere technical informalities. Yet, they remained in the open jail, absolutely refusing the liberty so welcome to their late companions in guilty duress! A negro woman, confined in the jail, they refused to let Covington take with them, for what reason is best known to themselves. Those men must have strong faith in the merits of their cases, or have a strange fancy for the polluted atmosphere and cramped limits of a dungeon lodgment. [Pauliding Clarion.

BURNING OF MOSCOW.

FROM L'ATHENÆUM FRANÇAIS OF JANUARY 6.

Extract from the Inedited History of the Russian Campaign, by Admiral Tchitchagoff.

An article in the Athenæum Français of the 14th of October, upon Count Rostopchine, "who, we remarked, rendered himself so famous by the burning of Moscow," has brought us the following communication. We hope that the valuable manuscripts from which we here give an extract will be one day published entire:

"1813. The burning of Moscow was often the subject of conversation. The immensity of the loss, and the influence it had upon the retreat of the French, amply explain the interest with which this act was invested. As to the cause of the conflagration we did not agree. Some attributed it to the Russian Government, others to the French army, and others still to the patriotism of the Muscovites. Each of these suppositions had its partisan, and the controversy was very warm.

"I can with difficulty comprehend the opinion of those who were then persevering, and are so still perhaps, in charging upon the Russian Government the burning of Moscow, acting, as they allege, in behalf of the general defence.

"Count Rostopchine, the Governor of Moscow, whom these persons have been eager to invest with a brilliant halo of patriotism for having carried into execution this pretended idea of the Government, has always said he was wholly ignorant of it. At last, weary of the brilliant rôle which he was thus compelled to play in spite of himself, and annoyed by the work of M. de Chambray, which could not be permitted to pass unnoticed, he decided in 1823, to publish a pamphlet at Paris. In that pamphlet he established that the Government had no interest whatever in the burning of Moscow; and in it he gives the following reasons for his opinion:

"1. Moscow was not provisioned. The Russian army had exhausted its supplies, and left behind them little or nothing for the sustenance of the French.

"11. Out of the 240,000 inhabitants of Moscow 225,000 had been compelled by Rostopchine to evacuate the city, leaving behind from 12,000 to 15,000 persons, who were made up of foreigners and the lowest dregs of the city, and who would prove more embarrassing than useful to the French.

"111. The success of a plan of destruction was improbable, the houses being, with few exceptions, separated by gardens, boulevards, and broad open spaces, which would have hindered the fire from spreading. In order to extend its ravages, as it actually did, the accidental, and unforseen action of a very violent wind was necessary. And after all there remained standing a fourth part of the best houses, which were more than sufficient for the accommodation of the French army."

"Some have seen proof of an incendiary purpose in the carrying away of ninety pumps. Now, these were served and manned by a corps of 2,100 firemen. Rostopchine, while causing the civil and military authorities and almost the entire population to leave Moscow, the more completely to isolate the French, did not judge it proper to leave those firemen behind for the service of Napoleon. They naturally carried their pumps away with them.

"The Russian Government, leaving to the French only empty houses and no means of supplying themselves with provision, had no commanding interest in the destruction of Moscow. But had the Government ordered that destruction, traces of those orders would have survived; the inhabitants would have had timely warning at least to remove their more valuable effects. So far was this from the fact that Kutusow swore by his grey hairs that he would turn back the enemy and preserve the holy city.

So complete was the security of the inhabitants that, with the surprise of one waking suddenly from a dream; they fled in haste, abandoning to the French their rich libraries, their cellars filled with exquisite wines, and even their jewelry remaining in their boudoirs and on their toilets. So great was the illusion, that some even among the nobility—for example, Counts Waldimir, Orloff and Bentcurlina—escaped with great difficulty only a few hours before the entrance of the enemy. The inhabitants, thus suddenly compelled to flee, were filled with indignation at the deceit which had been practiced upon them, and insulted the Russian troops who were evacuating the city, although still very strong and numerous. In the interview that took place at the gates of Moscow, on the 13th of September, between Rostopchine and Kutusow, the latter assured the former that he intended to give battle to the French. He added that he had hopes of a victory, having been reinforced, and having beside slain at Moscow of the French troops double the number he had lost of his own. But in the evening, after holding a hasty council of war, he announced to Rostopchine that the movements of the enemy forced him to abandon Moscow. Rostopchine told me that a violent altercation took place between himself and Kutusow on the subject.

"The conflagration is, in my opinion, none the more the work of the patriotism of the people. Patriotism is too lofty a sentiment to attain its perfect stature under a despotic Government. That instinctive love of one's fireside, which we readily grant to the Russians, can by no means be likened to this enlightened patriotism of a free people.

"So the general conflagration of Moscow was the result neither of the orders of the Russian Government nor of the patriotism of the people. Its first cause is to be found in the system of tactics invariably followed during the first half of the campaign by the Russian generals. That system consisted in forming at every point magazines, in retreating, whenever attacked, and on the retreating the setting fire to every thing. In this way the conflagration began. At first it was only partial; but very soon the inevitable disorders attendant on the departure of the whole population en masse—pillage, feelings of personal vengeance, and the imprudence of the French themselves—caused it to burst forth at once at various points. A wind of extraordinary violence spread the flames throughout the whole city. The inhabitants were no longer there to render assistance, the pumps were gone, it was found impossible to arrest the flames.

"Count Rostopchine has related to me two incidents which support this theory of mine. The workmen, merchants and artizans remaining in Moscow were disposed to trade with the French. When, however, they found them sacrying away whatever suited their convenience, without offering payment, they grew indignant. Thus, some French Generals went to select carriages and other vehicles, and, without offering to pay anything, wrote their names on the panels. 'Then no one will take them,' said the coachmaker; and the following night he set fire to his warehouses.

"Similar causes must have produced other partial conflagrations. There were other particular acts of vengeance. The escaped prisoners eagerly spread the conflagration in order to plunder with greater impunity.

"The French, themselves, unintentionally contributed to the conflagration. I have, with my own eyes, seen upon the route followed by the French army, floors completely charred, in the middle of which they had lit fires to warm themselves, lacking either patience, time or the requisite skill to light the stoves of the country. Now, in Russia, the floors are composed of neither brick nor tile, but entirely of wood. The fire thus kindled, therefore, rapidly communicated itself to the houses.

"A pamphlet of a surgeon in chief, M. Larry, contains the best description of the conflagration which has been given to this day. Indeed, it is from the point of view taken by him that the facts must have presented themselves to every Frenchman.

"With the exception of his conjectures of some superior order of which he could have known nothing, and to which he merely alludes to complete the enumeration of the possible causes of the conflagration, I regard his picture as perfect.

"The burning of a city may happen without the concurrence of all the causes which existed at Moscow. Witness the great fire of London, and, in our own days, that of New York. This was, moreover, not the first time that Moscow had been burnt. In the sixteenth century, during the reign of Ivan the terrible, three incendiaries, succeeding each other at intervals of a few days, reduced to ashes the entire capital and the Kremlin. This conflagration was attributed to the sorceries of the Gliuskey, whom some wished to ruin, and who proved the victims of this accusation.

"Under Ivan IV, Moscow was burnt a second time. In the times of Godenow, the Kremlin and the quarter occupied by the nobility alone escaped from a third conflagration.

"A soldier of the enemy enters a house, and finds nobody on the premises save an invalid keeper. He puts him various questions, and finishes by demanding where the wine cellar lies. He visits it, shows evident signs of satisfaction, and goes away, saying he will return soon. And, indeed, he does return very soon, accompanied by a number of his comrades, and they all descend together into the cellar, which closes with a trap-door. The soldiers betake themselves to drinking in the cellar and become intoxicated. The keeper perceives this by their noise, and at first intends to imprison them by piling stones on the trap; but on second thought, fearing that they may escape and wreak their vengeance on him, he makes a resolution a la mode—he sets fire to the house and takes to his heels."

Seizure of a Vessel by Pirates.

In our impression of Thursday last, we briefly reported the loss of the Conference, Peters, of and from North Shields to Carthagena. The following particulars are furnished by Capt. Peters, in a letter, dated Gibraltar, May 18:

"The Conference was taken by pirates on the 2d May, off the coast of Barbary. We left the Downs on the 17th April; after a fine run down the Channel, we took our departure from the Lizard Light on the 20th, rounded Cape St. Vincent on the 18th, and on the 30th April we passed Europa Light, with a strong westerly breeze and every appearance of a prosperous voyage.

"At 6 P. M. the same day, it became calm and continued so all night, and at daylight on the 2d May we were between twenty and thirty miles to the westward of Cape Tres Fercas, and about fifteen miles off the land. I observed two boats, which I supposed might be fishermen. Shortly after, I observed three more boats put out from a creek or river; the two first lay to on their oars until the others joined company, then they came in the direction of our ship, which was still lying nearly becalmed. It never crossed me that they were armed pirates until they continued rowing so long in the same direction. On their coming near to us I observed the boats to be very large, and crowded with men—I then heartily wished for a breeze. When at about a quarter of a mile distance they opened a tremendous fire upon us, apparently with very large swivel guns. It was then thought high time to save our lives if possible; accordingly, the boat was in a few minutes launched over the side.

"The crew being all fresh and young men, with the exception of the cook, who left in the hurry and broke one of his ribs, soon gained the boat, which I steered to the northwest, keeping the ship between us and the guns. The pirates kept pulling hard towards the ship, and continued a constant fire on our boat. The headmost boat kept the chase, and when about five or six hundred yards near us he gave up pursuit, after giving us a shot which was not more than an arm's length from the boat. The shouts of the ruffians when they thought they were gaining upon us were most hideous. After getting clear of them we hove to on our oars, in order that I might observe their movements with the glass. As soon as they got on board of the Conference the helm was put up with the ship's head for the land. We watched our vessel as long as it was prudent to do so. There could not be less than two hundred men in the pirate's boats.

"We then remained exposed on the open sea, without any kind of food or water, and a not sea boating upon us. We saved nothing but a wooden steering-compass and a spy-glass. The pirates would probably take everything out of our ship that was useful to them and then scuttle her, because it being only about ninety miles from Gibraltar, they would expect a man-of-war to be despatched in pursuit; but unfortunately our long passage to that place gave them plenty of time to carry their views into effect. After we had rowed about another hour to the northeast, we got sight of a vessel hearing about north of us; the oars were immediately double manned, and all our strength put on.

"At 4 P. M. we got up with the vessel, and glad we were as we neared her, in the hopes of our being taken on board and receiving at least a small supply of bread and water, as we had made up our minds to steer for Gibraltar. When we got alongside we found no one to make their appearance, and we went on board, and found the ship abandoned by her crew. I observed a boat rowing to the north of us, and it struck me it might be the crew of the ship we had boarded. I then got the barge and hoisted it at the peak end, in order that it might be seen, and if they were the crew they might return to their ship. I lost sight of the boat shortly after; there was at the time a light air from the westward, and the ship's head going to the land. We therefore sounded the pumps and found nine inches water in the well. I then took command of her, trimmed the yards, and put the vessel's head to the northward.

"There were at the time a lark and a schooner on our lee bow, distant about eight miles. It struck me the crew might have seen our boat and mistaken us for pirates, and that they might have got on board the bark. What could be the cause of their leaving their vessel, we could not imagine; but perhaps they had seen the smoke from the pirates' craft when they were firing at us; it being then calm, the smoke from the fire arms would ascend to a great height. From the papers on board we found the vessel to be the Lively, from Stockton, James Napier, master. We arrived at Gibraltar on the 18th, with the loss of four topmast. Immediately on arrival I applied to the captain of the port to induce him to send a man-of-war to recover, if possible, the Conference; but he informed me he could not do so, for two reasons; first, he had only one war steamer, and it was impossible to spare her; and in the second place, if he had been able to comply with my request, it would be of no use, as such a length of time had elapsed since our ship fell into the hands of the pirates. I therefore may, I suppose, conclude that our ship is totally lost." [Liverpool Shipping Gazette, June 9.

THE RECENT MURDER AT HOLLY SPRINGS.—The Holly Springs (Miss.) Times, of the 21st, says:

We learn from District Attorney Whitmore that the Examining Court refused to bail young Ray, who lately killed Professor Brown in Pontotoc, and remanded him to prison. Our first information respecting the affair, given last week, was somewhat erroneous. It appears that Ray armed himself with a pistol and bowie-knife, and went to the school-house to see Brown. When they afterwards met in the public grounds, after some words between them, said to be of a kind and explanatory nature on the part of Brown, Ray struck him a blow, staggering Brown, and then they joined in a struggle. During this, or about the time they got somewhat disengaged, Brown returned Ray's blow with a small riding whip, which he carried in his pocket. Ray then drew his bowie-knife and stabbed Brown six times, killing him instantly.

SMALL LOAVES.—The high price of flour of late has caused the bakers to diminish the size of their loaves considerably, but those in New Brunswick, N. J., seem to have reached perfection in the article referred to, as the following extract from an exchange will show: "A baker of that place (Newark) in going his rounds to serve his customers, stopped at the door of one and knocked, when the lady within exclaimed: 'Who is there?' and was answered, 'the baker.' 'What do you want?' 'To leave your bread.' 'Well, well, you need not make such a fuss about it, put it through the key-hole.'"

At Dover, England, recently, a very handsome young woman landed from Calais in a very interesting situation and apparently quite ill. An English custom-house officer immediately commenced very persevering attentions to the young lady, and taking her into the custom-house, sent for a physician. She earnestly protested against this course, but after begging to get off for a quarter of an hour, as the officer had foreseen, she was safely delivered of two pelerines, fifteen scarfs, seventeen pieces of lace, six reticules, twelve pair of silk stockings, thirty-eight of cotton and forty-eight Lyons handkerchiefs.

LORD DUNDONALD'S DEVASTAVATORI.

[Copy of part of a letter from an officer engaged in Lord Dochrane's daring enterprise and victory. Basque Roads, 1809.]

Our fire ships were sent in, each conducted by a lieutenant and five men. The ships were sixteen in number, and some very heavy. When they got in the French ships cut and slipped and nine sail of the line got on shore on the Isle of Aix, and the next morning we discovered them. The fire-ships having done little good, the small craft and frigates were ordered in to attempt to destroy them. The place where they lay was like Portsmouth harbor, under the fire of two batteries, each of which had three tier of guns of twenty-nine each, all heavy metal. The navigation to get at them was very difficult, in some places there being only four fathom water. Just as we were sitting down to dinner on board the Revenge, our signal was made to go in and assist the gun and mortar vessels. Our ship was clear for action, in fifteen minutes, and in half an hour we were alongside of three sail of the line, when we opened a dreadful cannonade on them which continued for an hour and a quarter, when the Warsaw, a five-eighty-gun ship, and the Aquilon, struck to us. We were now in a very critical state ourselves, being in only five fathom water, which was ebbing very fast. The batteries on shore, having got our length, struck us almost every shot for the last quarter of an hour. Luckily, a breeze springing up, we got all into deeper water and out of reach of their guns, when we anchored again and sent our boats to take out the prisoners, and set them on fire about 7 P. M. At 9 they were all in flames, and at 2 in the morning they blew up with a tremendous explosion. The French set fire to the Tonnerre and the Impereuse to the Calcutta. Three other ships of the line are on shore very much mauled by the frigates and bomb-ships. Some of them are on their beam-ends, and but little chance of their getting off again. The captain of the Warsaw is on board our ship. He says they were bound out to relieve Martinique with troops and provisions. I went on board his ship after she struck, and the decks were strewed with dead and wounded—a most dreadful slaughter. We also lost several killed and wounded, and our ship is much cut up in sails and rigging, which makes it probable that we shall be sent in to refit.

Lord Cochrane caused about 1,500 barrels of gunpowder to be started into paniers, which were placed end upward. Upon the tops of these were placed between 300 and 400 shells, charged with fuses, and again, among and upon these were between 2,000 and 3,000 hand-granades. The paniers were fastened to each other by cables wound round them, and jammed together with wedges, and moistened sand was rammed down between the casks, so as to render the whole, from stem to stern, as solid as possible, that the resistance might render the explosion more violent.

In this immense instrument of destruction Lord Cochrane committed himself, with only one lieutenant and four seamen; and after the boom was broken, his lordship proceeded with this explosion ship towards the enemy's line. Let it be recollected that at this moment the batteries on shore were provided with furnaces to fire red-hot shot, and the hulks lordship's danger in this quiterprise may be properly conceived.

The wind blew a gale and the tide ran three knots an hour. When the blue lights of the fire-ships were discovered, one of the enemy's signal ships made the signal for fire-ships, which being also a blue light, the enemy fell into great confusion, firing upon her with injurious effect and directly cut their cables. When Lord Cochrane had conducted his explosion ship as near as possible, the enemy having taken the alarm, he ordered his brave little crew into the boat and followed them after putting fire to the fuse, which was calculated to give them fifteen minutes to get out of the reach of the explosion. However, in consequence of the wind getting very high the fuse burnt too quickly, so that with the most violent exertion against wind and tide, this intrepid little party was six minutes nearer than they calculated to be at the time when the most tremendous explosion that human art ever contrived took place, followed by the bursting at once, in air, of near 400 shells and 3,000 hand-granados, pouring down a shower of cast metal in every direction.

But fortunately our second Nelson was spared, the boat having reached by unparalleled exertion only just beyond the extent of destruction. Unhappily, this effort to escape cost the life of the brave Lieutenant, whom this noble Captain saw die in the boat, partly under fatigue and partly drowned with waves that continually broke over them. Two of the four sailors were also so nearly exhausted that their recovery is despaired of.

The repetition of his explosions was considered by the enemy that they apprehended an equal explosion in every fire-ship, and immediately crowding all sail, ran before wind and tide so fast that the fire-ships, though at first very near, could not overtake them before they were high and dry on shore, except three seventy-fours, beside the Calcutta, which were afterward engaged, taken, and burnt.

Our hero soon turned his attention to rescue the vanquished from the devouring elements, and in bringing away the people from the Ville de Vargovie, he would not allow even a dog to be abandoned, but took a crying and now neglected little favorite up into his arms and brought it away. It may be supposed that he has conveyed this fortunate little trophy into the bosom of his family, where it ought to be ever cherished as an instance of his generous care. But a still greater instance of his goodness was displayed in his humanity to a Captain of a French 74, who came to deliver his sword to Lord Cochrane, lamenting that all he had in the world was about to be destroyed by the conflagration of his ship. His lordship got into the boat with him, and pushed off to assist his prisoner in retrieving some valuable loss; but in passing by a 74, which was on fire, her loaded guns began to go off, a shot from which killed the French Captain by Lord Cochrane's side, and so damaged the boat that she filled with water, and the rest of this party were nearly drowned.

By the steamer George Law, which arrived at New York on the 25th, from Punta Arenas, we learn that when the last train was conveying the passengers across the Isthmus and was descending the grade from the summit, the coupling of one of the forward cars became disconnected, creating a space between the separated cars, and upon exhibition of the signal to stop, the forward cars brought up, and the disconnected ones came to them with great velocity and a severe crash was the result. Samuel Anderson, of Jefferson county, N. Y., was sitting on the platform, and was instantly killed.

HARVESTING IN VIRGINIA.—The farmers of Virginia have commenced harvesting their wheat. The crop is generally considered good, except in the southwest of the State, where the fly has injured it; but the large quantities of wheat were sown, it is expected that the harvest will be more abundant than usual. The drying of the straw immediately below the head, by which the ascent of sap is arrested, is said to be one of the most reliable indications of the maturity of the plant, and of the necessity of cutting and curing it.

The plague said to exist in New York turns out to be some half dozen cases of an eruptive disease called Pustule Maligne. A few cases existed last year. It is characterized by the appearance of a pimple, rapidly increasing in size to that of an ordinary boil, with symptoms resembling those of a carbuncle, great fever and very severe constitutional disturbance. One or two of the case have recovered, but they have generally been fatal in a few days. The disease is not a new disease, though unfrequent there; and it is well known not to be of a contagious character.

As great if not greater evil is likely to result in all this section of the country, says the Baltimore Sun, from the long continuance and heavy character of the rains with which we have been lately visited, as there was at one time apprehended from the spring drought.

A Poet in Russia.

Polejayev was known for his beautiful poetry while still a student at the Moscow University. Among others, he had composed a humorous poem called "Sashka," a parody of Peshkin's "Onagin." He had attacked many things in it in pleasant verse and merry mood, and the Czar was not spared. This poem circulated generally in manuscript. After Nicholas had hanged Pestel, Muravieff, and other Tricads, he celebrated his coronation in Moscow in 1826 (other people select such solemnities as an opportunity to grant amnesties and pardons: Nicholas, however, had scarcely ended his apotheosis, ere he again began to cast down the enemies of the Fatherland, as Robespierre did after the stupid Fête Dieu.

The secret police brought him Polejayev's poem.

And lo! at 3 o'clock one morning, the rector wakes Polejayev, orders him to put on his uniform, and go to the university chancellerie. There the curator was expecting him. The latter examines whether all his buttons are in order, or if there were any superfluous ones, and invites Polejayev, without any explanation, to get into a carriage with him, and drove off.

He takes him to the Minister of Public Instruction (Lievens). The Minister again carries Polejayev off in a carriage, but this time straight to the Emperor. Prince Lieven left the poet in a room, where, although it was not 6 o'clock, several courtiers and high officials were waiting, and went himself into the inner rooms. The courtiers imagined the young man had die leguished himself in some way, and immediately began talking with him. A senator requested him to give his son lessons.

Polejayev was summoned into the cabinet. The Emperor stood, leaning against a bureau, and spoke to Lievens, while holding a manuscript in his hand. He cast a searching and sarcastic glance on the new comer.

"Hast thou written these verses?" he asked.

"Yes," Polejayev replied.

"Now, Prince, I will show you," the Emperor continued, "a masterpiece of university education. I will show you what the young people learn there. Read these verses aloud," he added turning again to Polejayev, who felt in such a state of embarrassment that he was unable to read. Nicholas' glance was fixed immovably upon him. I know that glance, and I know nothing more fearful; hopeless, thou this neutral-tinted, cold, leaden eye.

"I cannot," said. Polejayev.

"Read!" the omnipotent serjeant shouted.

This shout restored Polejayev his courage. He opened the volume. "Never," he told me, "had I seen 'Sashka' so elegantly written, or on such good paper."

At first he found it difficult to read. Later, however, growing more and more excited, he read loudly and with great animation the poem to the end. At the most biting passages the Emperor made a sign to the minister with his hand. The minister covered his eyes in holy horror.

"What do you say to it?" Nicholas asked, when the reading was terminated, "I will set bounds to this moral corruption, these are the results, the remnants—I will extirpate them. What is his conduct?"

The minister did not really know how he behaved, but at this moment something stirred in him resembling a humane feeling, and he said:

"Excellent, your Majesty."

"This testimony saves thee; but thou must be punished, as a warning to others. Wilt thou enter the military service?"

Polejayev was silent.

"I give thee a means to purify thyself by entering the army. Well, then, dost thou consent?"

"I must obey," Polejayev replied.

The Emperor approached him, laid his hand on his shoulder, and saying, "Thy fate depends on thyself; if I forget thee, then canst write to me," kissed him upon the forehead.

Ten times did I make Polejayev repeat to me the story of the kiss, so incredible did it seem to me. Polejayev swore it was the truth.

Polejayev was led from the Emperor to Diebitch, who also resided in the palace. Diebitch was asleep; some one woke him. Yawning, he appeared, read the paper handed him, and asked the wing adjutant, "Is this the man?" "It is, your excellency." "Well, then, all right; you can serve for all I care. I have always been a soldier; you see I have served my way up; perhaps you may also become a field-marshal."

This uncalled-for comic jest was the salutation Diebitch gave the poet. Polejayev was taken off to the Camp as a private. Thus three years passed. Polejayev remembered the Emperor's words, and wrote him a letter; there was no answer. A few months later he wrote him a second; no reply to that either. Convinced that his letters had not reached the Czar, he deserted from the regiment to hand a petition personally to the Emperor. He was arrested in Twer, brought back to his regiment as a deserter, on foot and in chains.

The court-martial condemned him to run the gauntlet; the sentence was sent to the Czar for confirmation. Polejayev determined to commit suicide before the sentence was executed. After searching in vain through his cell for some sharp instrument, he confided in an old soldier who loved him. The soldier understood him and honored his design. As soon as the veteran learned that the answer had arrived, he brought a bayonet and said, as he handed it to him with tears, "I sharpened it myself."

The Emperor ordered that Polejayev should not be beaten. He was sent to the Caucasus, where he was promoted to the rank of a non-commissioned officer, after distinguishing himself. Years passed one after another; his melancholy condition, and the hopelessness of ever being freed from it, broke his heart. Become a police poet, and chant the virtues of Nicholas, he could not, and this was his only course to free himself from the knapsack.

Yet there was no other, and this he preferred—he yielded to intoxication to forget his woes. There is a fearful poem of his extant addressed to "Brandy." He begged to be transferred to a caralhieier regiment which was quartered at Moscow. His prayer was heard, and thus his fate was perceptibly ameliorated. But consumption was already gnawing at his breast.

At that time, in 1832, I formed his acquaintance. For four long years he thus pined away; then he died in a soldier's infirmary. When one of his friends came to beg permission to bury him, no one knew where his body could be found. The corpse are perquisites in a soldier's infirmary; they are sold to the university and the medical academy; they are converted into skeletons, and so on. At last poor Polejayev's body was found in a cellar; it had been thrown among other corpses, and the rats had already gnawed at a leg.

After his death his poems were published, and it was proposed to give his portrait in a soldier's cloak. The censorate considered this improper, and the poor martyr is depicted in officer's epaulettes; he was promoted in the infirmary. [Mr. Herzen, in Bentley's Miscellany.

SENTENCE OF DEATH REVOKED.—General Pelletier, a Frenchman by birth, and formerly Minister of War and of Foreign Affairs of the Dominican Republic,) as well as Generals Ayber, of Francisco Ruiz, Baez and Rudeciado Ramirez, were recently sentenced to death in San Domingo, for conspiracy, but were pardoned just as the soldiery were about to execute the sentence. A letter says:

Francisco Ruiz, one of the persons condemned to death, rose from his knees an idiot. His nervous system had given way under the horror of the moment, and what is still more melancholy, one of his daughters, she who was the most vehement in her imploring grace from the Vice President, lost her reason when she learned her father had, after all, been led to execution.

MURDER.—We learn, says the Monroe county (Ala.) Southerner, of Saturday last, that a youth of eighteen years of age, by the name of Thomas, killed a Mr. E. P. Smith a few days since, in the lower part of Clarke county. Thomas waylaid Smith on the road and shot him with eighteen buckshot.

The citizens of Catahoula parish, La., have increased the reward offered for the capture of the murderers of Mr. Samuel Jackson, to one thousand dollars. The names of the persons suspected are Wm. Hudson and Francis Hartgraves.

HOMEOPATHY OF NUISANCE.—We have recently heard a funny anecdote of Talma, the great tragedian—his curing a tribulation by aggravating the disease:

For several weeks, each time that he played, Talma remarked a hunchback, who always sat in the same place, one of the front stalls at the right of the theater. This little hunchback was critical, and often refused his disapproval of certain points made by the actor, in the most marked and impatient way.

This resolute annoyed Talma. Each evening he determined that he would not allow himself to be disturbed by the opinion of this gentleman, nor in notice his expressions of dissatisfaction—he would give himself up entirely to his part; but this he found was impossible; in spite of himself, his eyes were attracted to this villainous little hunchback, whose fatally magnetic gaze caused him to return to that part of the stage, and at last this evil power troubled him in that degree, that, of all the audience, he recognized but this one systematic and obstinate obstructor.

Talma, irritated, really tried by this evil influence, at length determined to break it up if possible.

He called upon the gentleman at his own house and said to him:

"Sir, I have come to beg a great favor of you. Of course, I do not wish to deprive you of the pleasure of attending the play, nor to insist that you shall find me admirable when I have the misfortune to displease you. But I entreat that you will take some other place in the house, that I may not have you directly under my eye, for I confess that you exert a strange power over me, and that your gestures, your maintien, your whole person, occupy me so entirely, that I feel scarcely able to go on with my part."

"I am sorry for it," sneeringly replied the little hunchback; "but I shall retain my old place. I do not know why I should change it in order to render you a service. No, my dear sir, I really am quite unhappy in refusing you, but I wish to study quite at my ease, and I shall return my accustomed stall."

Talma went away absolutely enraged. "Parbleu!" said he, "but I will have my revenge, you old scoundrel!"

He went to the theater, engaged the five other stalls situated beside the one occupied by his vexatious enemy, and passed the day giving them away—these choice seats—with discretion.

In the evening a gentleman came and took his place in one of these stalls.

"See!" said the habitues of the orchestra, "our friend, the hunchback, will have company this evening; his neighbor is deformed!"

The door of the next box is opened—a second gentleman enters.

"Oh, another hunchback! Why, one would swear this was expressly arranged—a rendezvous of three hunchbacks!"

A fourth person enters.

A burst of laughter welcomes the new comer. He is a fourth hunchback.

At last, the fifth (invited by Talma) makes his appearance, and is received with laughter and stamping of feet. The fifth is also a hunchback!

Upon the rising of the curtain the accustomed hunchback arrived. The audience awaited him with impatience; they were all standing. He received a complete ovation of applause. The bravos thundered around him!

Our little hunchback, pale with vexation, took his place between his brethren, who themselves laughed at the oddity of the position. During the ente-acte he made his escape, not to appear again! Talma was avenged, and homeopathy had its precedent of the cure of an evil by pitching it over, its own head, with aggravation.—[Home Journal.

TALKING AUTOMATON.—A writer in the New York Evening Post, in speaking of the walking and talking automaton now on exhibition in New York, says:

It is not, therefore, surprising that amidst the activity of the present century, an attempt to carry out his invention should be successful. So about the year 1817, (I am not sure as to the exact date,) a German mechanician named Faber exhibited for several evenings in the Musical Fund Hall, at Philadelphia, an imitation of a man's head and bust which actually did talk and sing. Faber was a man of eccentric habits, and it is said he had constructed a more perfect machine before, which, in a fit of fury, he destroyed. Encouraged by the advice and pecuniary aid of Mr. Scherr, (who has a wide reputation as a manufacturer of piano fortes of superior excellence,) a modest, kind-hearted gentleman, he set to work again, and in two or three years produced his second instrument. This was exhibited before a most intelligent assembly, among whom were present many members of the American Philosophical Society. Dr. Robert M. Patterson, (for a long time director of the U. S. Mint, and afterwards president of the American Philosophical Society,) a gentleman distinguished in both hemispheres for his science and intellect, kindly undertook to explain, first, the mechanism of the human voice, and then the imitation of it in Faber's machine.

Suspicion of imposture was out of the question. Your subscriber was one of those present. He saw the working of the machine by no air-pump, and by keys like those of a piano-forte or accordeon. It counted, in a clear, not unpleasant voice, "one, two," to "ten"—then by turns till the hundred—the last syllable of which it could not get out. It gave us the names of the States and their capitals, some more correctly than others, but all intelligibly. Such words as consisted of short syllables, particularly liquids, it uttered admirably, as A-la-ba-ma, Tus-ca-loo-sa, Caro-li-na. Its intonations were also musical and easy. The largest sentence it uttered came shortly, thus: "la-a-dees and ge-n-e-en-t-l-men, plu-e-e-a-se ex-cuse my lin-per-fect pr-r-o-nun-she-n-shun." It sang a tune very well to "la-la-la-la". The inventor claimed, however, that if his assistants had been sufficiently skilled—one working the musical and the other the verbal part—it could have sung words to the tune, but this, though attempted, was not accomplished.

The constructor, accustomed to his own language only, had given a German brogue to the machine, which was ludicrous enough; but still more ludicrous was the excuse made for it, by Fabre's good friend, that "he (the figure) had caught cold," meaning that the chill of the evening had stiffened the caoutchouc.

The machine was after wards taken to London by Fabre, but, as I have never heard of him of it since, I think that probably the unfortunate man had destroyed a second time the proof of his skill.

The accounts I have given you can be vouched for, by hundreds.

Mayor Wood, of New York, has issued a proclamation to the public in regard to the liquor law. He says he shall be guided by the opinions of the District Attorney and the Corporation Council, until the court gives a contrary decision. To the police he recommends cautious discretion, and tells them that they must not seize foreign liquors or make arrests for the sale of the same, except upon a warrant issued by a competent magistrate, upon testimony other than their own.

Baron Frederick E. M. Van Carstenan, a Captain in the British service in Canada; Count De Bougnard, formerly a General in the French service under Napoleon; Mr. Maximillian Augusta Thoman, and Lieutenant Peter Jorgansen, of the English army, were arrested in New York city a few days ago, charged with enlisting troops for the Crimea.

THE VEILED MURDERESS.—It is said Mrs. Robinson, the murderess, had an assurance of pardon from capital punishment when sentenced. This may account for her reckless behavior. It is understood that Gov Clark will commute her sentence to imprisonment for life, with the condition that she will not drink any intoxicating liquors. It will be recollected that she administered

SALT.—Salt is indispensible to man as a part of his food. It is stated that with every bushel of flour one pound of salt is used in making bread alone. Every adult consumes about two ounces of salt weekly. The omission of a proper quantity of it in our food favors the engendering of disease. We read that when the ancient laws of Holland ordained men to be kept on bread alone, unspiced with salt, as the severest punishment that could be inflicted upon them in their moist climate, the effect was horrible. The wretched criminals are said to have been devoured by worms. Mungo Park mentions that he suffered great inconvenience from the scarcity of this article: "The long use of vegetable food creates no painful longing for salt that no words can adequately describe it." Almost all graminivorous animals seem to have the same necessity for the use of salt in their food as man. An exemption from the rot is generally assigned by sheep fed on the salt marshes, or where salt is regularly mixed with their food. In the States of La Plata, in South America, the sheep and cattle, when they discover a pit of salt clay, rush to feed upon it, and in the struggle many are trodden to death. In upper Canada the cattle have an abundance of wild pasture to browse on in the woods; but once a fortnight they return to the farm of their own accord, in order to obtain a little salt; and when they have eaten it, mixed with their fodder, return again to the woods. Salt is now used extensively in England and all Europe for fattening cattle. In Spain they attribute the fineness of their wool to the quantity of salt given the sheep. In England one thousand sheep consume at the rate of a ton of salt annually.—Indiana Farmer.

DEATH OF JUDGE GUION.—The Hon. John I. Guion, long a resident of Jackson, Miss., died at Vicksburg, on Tuesday, the 20th ult., after a lingering illness. At the time of his death he filled the post of Judge of the Third Judicial District of the State of Mississippi. He was engaged in the discharge of his duties in a county distant from his home, when the disease with which he had long been afflicted, assumed a fatal form, and only recovered sufficiently to reach Vicksburg. From an article in the Whig, of Thursday last, we extract the following tribute to his services and abilities:

Judge Guion was one of several sons of Major Isaac Guion, an officer of high distinction in the regular army, and was born in this State, in the city of Natchez, in the year 1801. He chose the profession of the law, and soon after [illegible] competent knowledge of it, he moved to Holly[illegible], where first, in connection with one [illegible] name is so honorably identified with the judicial history of the State, Chief Justice Shipley, and subsequently with another who has shed lustre upon the whole State, and made for himself a national fame, the late S. S. Prentiss, he won for himself a legal reputation, and gained forensic honors not surpassed even by those of his distinguished colleagues and compeers. While he resided in Warren county he repeatedly represented it in both branches of the Legislature, and also [illegible] the highest distinction [illegible] Indeed, he was peculiarly [illegible] duties of legislation. He [illegible] ive rules, his great [illegible] nce, and his acknowledged [illegible] ha high estimate in which his [illegible] tor and integrity were held, [illegible] honor conferred upon him by the Senate of this State, in the session of 1850, of their making him, by a unanimous vote, its presiding officer.

In the year 1846, Judge Guion moved to the seat of Government, still engaged in the practice of his profession. But he was not allowed to continue its labors unmolested. The people among whom he had so recently come were no strangers to him, and once more he was called to the councils of the State. It was while Senator from Hinds that he was made President of the Senate; and as such, upon the resignation of Gen. Quitman of his office, as Governor of the State, Judge Guion succeeded to the unexpired term. Less than two years ago, he was elected by a large majority to the office which he filled at the period of his death; and during the time that the condition of his health enabled him to discharge the duties of his office, he exhibited the very highest qualifications for the place, and elicited the admiration of all who, either as lawyer or litigant, were subjected to his jurisdiction.

THE SAGUA LA GRANDE AFFAIR.—Mr. Thompson, the late American Vice Consul or Consular Agent at Sagua la Grande, Cuba, is now in this city, at Willard's. He comes, we hear, to lay his case before the Government. That is, his claim for damages to his business, property and person, committed at the hands of the Spanish authorities in the affair mentioned above. We take it for granted that they will be rated at a high figure, as it is said that he claims to have lost much, pecuniarily, by the treatment he received at the hands of the colonial authorities. One not au fait at Washington, has little idea of the number and extent of such claims, which are annually laid before the authorities of our country, to be urged by them on foreign Governments. They are generally well founded, though they rarely fail to be greatly exaggerated. Our countrymen, and even our officials abroad, are more subject to abuse by the authorities of weak Governments that respect neither the rights of their own citizens or others, when they think they may assail them safely, than are those of either France or England, because of the comparative weakness of our naval force, and also because our Government has, until very recently, been exceedingly slow to contend, abroad, for all the rights of all our citizens and representatives—a characteristic incident to our early policy of isolation, which is now, however, giving way to the necessities of our so rapidly increasing commerce in all directions. HORRIBLE ATTEMPT AT SUICIDE.—No mode of self-destruction seems too horrible for the desperate mind, and disappointed affection appears to be especially revolting in the choice of the means of suicide. On Friday an attempt was made to commit suicide, under the desperation excited by love betrayed, which surpasses any instance within our recollection. It appears that a young man named John Mesigle, residing in a small court running out of Washington avenue, in the Nineteenth Ward, was much attached to a female living in the same neighborhood, who pretended to entertain a reciprocal affection. But the lady seems to have been an adept in deceit; for on Thursday she was married to another man. When informed of the event, Mesigle was driven to desperation, and under the influence of the fearful shock, he determined to destroy himself. The mode of death chosen on Friday was the horrible one of swallowing a quantity of molten lead. The lead was actually taken into the mouth, but it was suffered to run out again, without having been swallowed. The mouth and breast were so dreadfully injured, that it was thought the result would be fatal. The sister of the young man, hearing him groan, entered the room, and found the brother in agony, and the ladle of molten lead lying near the fire. Medical aid was immediately summoned. The unfortunate young man expressed a wish that he should not recover. He lingered in the greatest agony. [Philadelphia Gazette, 25th.

OUR RELATIONS WITH THE CONTENDING POWERS.—"Ion," the speculative correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, says in a recent letter to that paper:

"It has been apprehended by our wisest and most conservative statesmen that the war in Europe could not be protracted without involving this country in its vortex. This was our experience heretofore, when we were less strong than we are now. We are now quite as much feared as hated by foreign powers, and it would be very impolitic on the part of England and France to quarrel with us. But the latest advices show that aggressions upon our commerce have been recommenced by those powers in the Baltic, and in the course of their desperate struggle it may not be long before they will commence a regular system of plunder upon our commerce, as they did under the "orders in Council," and the Berlin and Milan decrees. The United States is pledged before the world to assert their right to the freedom of the ocean, which has been grossly violated by the British Admiralty in the Baltic.

"The immediate effect of this outrage will be to confirm our people in their imputed Russian sympathies. It may be that the two great empires of the world—the Eastern and the Western—the despotic and the democratic—are to unite on common ground for the assertion of the principle of the liberum mare. Both powers have a common interest in the maintenance of that principle, and they have the strength to do it. To us it is a vital principle, and the aid of Russia in its establishment will be cordially accepted.

"To us such an alliance will supply the place, to a great extent, of a great naval force. Nothing could be more inconsistent with our political and economical system than to support a naval establishment upon the scale of the British and French navy. But Russia, confronting and engaging Western Europe, is our shield from their attacks.

"The dispatches of our minister (Mr. Mason) on this subject will be looked for with great anxiety. What has become of our Minister to Russia? From him, or of him, nothing is heard.

"The late assaults upon our commerce in the Baltic, by the British combatants, are to be made known to us, as it exists, through Mr. Mason, by Count Nesselrode—our Minister to Russia having nothing to do with the matter.

LOSS OF A STEAMER.—The Charleston Courier publishes the following extract from a letter dated Georgetown, S. C., 22d inst. The steamer alluded to was formerly the "Mears," and was, we believe, at one time employed on the St. John's river:

"The steamer Calhoun was burnt whilst laying down at the bar last night, about half-past 11 o'clock. The captain seeing a light from the cabin, ran on deck and discovered the boat on fire, and attempted to arouse the mate and engineer, and was compelled to pull them out of their berths; and the mate had so close a run that the fire burnt his hair. The tide running so strong that those on the after part of the boat were not able to reach those forward, and some hands on board of the pilot boat lying near by, discovered the fire and saved the crew on the forward part of the boat. Soon after, all hands left their bunks, a keg of powder on board exploded, blowing a considerable part of the stern off. Capt. L. cut away her hawser, so that she drifted ashore on North Island. As far as I can learn, she is a total loss.

Preserve the privacies of your house, marriage state, heart, from father, mother, sister, brother, aunt and all the world. You two, with God's help, build your own quiet world; every third or fourth one you draw into it with you will form a party, and stand between you two. That should never be. Promise this to each other. Renew the vow at each temptation. You will find your account in it. Your sons will grow, as it were, together, and at last they will become as one. Ah, if many a young pair had, on their wedding day, known this secret, how many marriages were happier than—alas!—they are

A tall woman was recently mobbed in the streets of Lowell, Massachusetts, because she wore an old-fashioned bonnet! The police had to interfere to protect her, and, conveying her home, the rabble, to the number of five hundred, surrounded her house, and tried to break in, and were dispersed only after sundry of them had been rapped over the head and kicked upon the shins. Sober Massachusetts!

DEATH OF ANOTHER INDIAN CHIEF.—Henry Two-Guns, (Ha-ja-oh-gneh) head chief of the Seneca nation of Indians, aged seventy-five years, died at the Cattaraugus Reservation, N. Y., on the 17th inst. Two Guns was a step-son of the famous orator Red Jacket, and was born within the limits of the now city of Buffalo. He was engaged in the war of 1812, espousing the cause of his great father, the President, participated in the battles of Bridgewater and Chippewa, and for a long series of years exercised a controlling influence over the nation.

A movement of some importance has been commenced in North Carolina, and is soon to be submitted to the Legislature of that State. It proposes first, to render legal the institution of marriage among slaves; second, to preserve sacred the relations between parents and their young children; and third, to repeal the laws prohibiting the education of slaves.

ESPIONAGE.—The Bangor (Me.) Journal reports that the City Marshal of that place in search of liquor, broke open the baggage of a Mrs. Dana, of New Orleans, (who is a daughter of one of the most respectable citizens of Bangor) on her arrival in that place. A box of looking-glasses belonging to Thornton McKaw, Esq., was also broken open by the same officer.

AN OUTRAGE.—A few evenings since, as our fellow-citizen, Judge Barnett, was seated in his residence conversing with some ladies, a couple of ruffians presented themselves at one of the windows, and upon the Judge desiring them to leave, they commenced a vulgar abuse of himself and family. Upon resorting to forcible means to rid his premises of the blackguards, one of them drew a pistol and presented it at his head, after which they left. We learn that the Mayor and Marshal have succeeded in arresting the two villains, and we trust they will be made to feel the consequences of their outrageous conduct. [Vicksburg Sentinel.

An extraordinary lusus naturæ has been exhibited in Cuba. It consists of a pup of large size, having its head, eyes, nose and mouth completely human. It had also an arm crossed over the breast, and the other suspended over the head. The hind legs, extremely diminutive and very neat, were placed perpendicularly, like those of a prancing horse.

A few days since a spot of land, more elevated than any in the immediate vicinity, in Walworth county, Wisconsin, suddenly sank to the extent of about forty feet in circumference, leaving a small lake or well in its stead, to which, thus far, no bottom has been found. The water has risen to within three or four feet of the surface of the earth surrounding it, and remains at that point.

IMAGINARY MONSTERS.—In order to grow wiser, perhaps we could hardly do better than recur to the little parable spoken some time since on the borders of Wales, by an itinerant preacher of the Evangelical Alliance: "I was going towards the hills," he said "early one misty morning. I saw something moving on the mountain side, so strange looking that I took it for a monster. When I came nearer, to it I found it was a man. When I came nearer to him I found he was my brother."—[Westminster Review.

SINGULAR FATALITY.—At Sharp's rifle factory, Hartford, Coun., lately, a workman named Willis North, while engaged in chipping off shavings from a bar of steel, was struck by one of the steel shavings with such force that it entered his heart, and caused his death in a short time. The wound made in his body was so small that neither he nor any of his fellow workmen, after examining it, thought it serious, but he immediately grew faint, then insensible, and so expired. The hemorrhage was internal. Only a few weeks since another workman was killed in the same factory, by an awl glancing and entering his heart.

FORT LARAMIE IN THE HANDS OF THE INDIANS.—This morning, says the Star of the 21st, letters reached Washington from Forts Laramie and Kearney, that were brought in the settlements by the express mail rider, who is reported to have brought news that Fort Laramie had fallen into the hands of the savages. The Laramie letter, therefore, sets that Rnorback completely at rest. Both are of great interest just now.

FORT LARAMIE, N. T., May 8, 1855.—About the 10th of April, four men returning from a trading expedition to the Crow Indians, were met on the head waters of Powder river, about 150 miles from this post, by a party of Nunnie Cousha-ws, and robbed of what goods they had remaining, and the clothing of the men. The men report that it was only through the earnest remonstrance of the Chief that their lives were spared. They report also, that these Indians had with them the mules and horses shortly before stolen from the mail station at the Devil's Gate, and the traders living near them.

It is reported that there are a good many Missouri Sioux on or near the Platte, between this and the mail station, who have come over to steal horses. Seventeen of the horses recently stolen by them from the traders near this station have been taken from them by the Ogallahas and returned to their owners.

FORT KEARNEY, N. T., May 27, 1855.—Second Lieut. E. G. Marshall, sixth infantry, has just returned to this post, after having escorted the United States mail as far as Chimney Rock.

Lieut. Marshall says that Clarke & Brown, drivers of cattle to California, lost most of their horses at O'Fallen's Bluffs. The Indians charged and stampeded their cattle, of which they had some seven hundred, and while the party were engaged in trying to collect them, the Indians succeeded in robbing them of their horses.

Small parties of emigrants, with women and children—the men badly armed, and many not at all—are scattered between this post and Ash Hollow, nor can I persuade them that there is danger to be apprehended.

Clerks & Brown's cattle train was the first that passed this post. I fear that the emigrants will suffer severely.

TWO STEAMBOATS LOST, THE EXPRESS AND BELLE GOLDING.—From Mr. Hazlett, of the Amazon, we learn that the Express, one of the Missouri independent packets, struck a snag on Friday, the 15th, and sunk to her cabin floor, at Spar Island, in the upper Missouri. She was bound from Council Bluffs to this city, with a fair cargo of hemp, grain, etc., including a large quantity of corn. The boat is a total loss, and the same may be said of nine-tenths of the cargo. The Amazon took off about 100 sacks of wheat, which she brought down, and also some of her rigging and furniture. The Express was an old and small sized boat, and was recently purchased by her commander, Capt. H. D. Smith, for $5,500. She was not insured.

The Belle Golding was on her way from the Ohio to this place, with a full cargo of dry goods, etc. Arrived at Devil's Island, in the Mississippi, she took the Missouri side—but finding this passage more difficult than was anticipated, was backing down stream when she struck a snag, which, as well as breaking the hull, is said to have gone right up through the cabin floor. In twenty minutes after striking, she sank up to her cabin floor, and both boat and cargo are a total loss. She was a stern-wheeler, about a year old, and worth probably $15,000. She was insured, but we have not learned for what amount. Some of her passengers came up on the W. W. Graham and some on the Northerner. [St. Louis Intelligencer 22d.

EUROPEAN NEGLECT OF AMERICANS.—Mr. Greely, of the New York Tribune, who is now in Paris, writes as follows in regard to the treatment of our Army officers by the French officials:

"Colonel Delafield, Major Mordecai and one other officer of our army, dispatched to the Crimea to study the latest improvements in the art of war, especially in artillery practice, who came out with us in the Asia some weeks since, expecting to be at the Allied head-quarters early in May, are still lingering in Paris, (or were very recently,) vainly awaiting the permission for which they have applied to the French authorities, and which being abundantly avouched and accredited, they presumed would be accorded to them without hesitation. The excuse given for this rebuff, is that all (French) precedent is against the authorization required; I suspect the truth is that the present ruler of France does not deem it desirable to favor an increase of the efficiency of American artillery or American armaments generally: if Spain had wished to send three officers of artillery to the Crimea, who believe that they would have encountered any obstacle?"

ANECDOTE OF WEBSTER.—Among the many anecdotes told of Mr. Webster, there is one which, though reflecting slightly upon his negligence of pecuniary matters is still very Websterian:

On one occasion, it is related, he was the guest of the Southern Senators and Representatives in the city of Washington, and they passed many compliments upon him, and allused frequently to his being like the Southerners in his habits and feelings, and it was all an accident that he was born in New Hampshire. At last Mr. Webster arose. "Gentlemen," said he, "it has been stated that I resemble the Southerners in many respects—and I must confess that, now it has been mentioned, I think I do. The Southerner loves a good glass of wine—so do I. This is one thing in which I resemble the Southerner. The Southerners are also good judges of beauty, and I will confess that I am in love of the beautiful. This makes two points of resemblance; but there is a third in which I more closely resemble them. The Southerners, it is said, never pay their debts, and the same has also been said of me. In these particulars, gentlemen, I feel that I am like the Southerners." Shouts of laughter followed this sally of wit and good humor.

The Newport, Ky., News gives the particulars of one of the most remarkable mistakes that it has been our disagreeable duty to chronicle for a long time. Mr. and Mrs. —— of Newport, were visited by a gentleman and lady, old friends from the country. The two gentlemen enjoyed themselves abroad during the evening, and did not return till a late hour, when all the family were in bed. The gentleman of the house, of course, went to his usual place of sleeping, (after showing his friend the bed in another room, where he supposed his wife lay,) but unfortunately the lady of the house had given up her own bed (being the best in the house) to her visiting friends. All went quietly to bed, and in the morning awoke, almost frightened out of their lives, to find themselves snugly locked in the arms of their rival companions. The ladies both fainted, but the gentlemen did not, neither did they quarrel. The parties all were doing as well as could be expected at the latest dates.

A Washington dispatch of the 21st says:

"The Russian Minister laughs heartily with his friends over what he regards the exaggerated accounts from the seat of war. He says that the people of France and England required the manufacture of victories to satisfy their clamors, and as to the reported number of vessels destroyed in the Sea of Azoff, he remarks that it far surpasses all the Russians ever had there.

Accurate and reliable accounts received here from Mexico represent that Mr. Gadsden, our Minister to Mexico, is in bed odor with the Mexican Government, which regards him as a nucleus around which gather the revolutionists of that country. It will not be surprising if Mexico shall soon refuse to have diplomatic relations with Mr. Gadsden, as complaints have been made to our State Department.

A lunatic received a severe injury on the great toe by the fall of a heavy piece of wood, so that the nail was torn away. The physician, on examining the patient, remarked that he seemed scarcely to feel this injury, ordinarily so painful. On examining the case more minutely, he found that the lunatic had completely lost cutaneous sensibility. This led him to examine all the lunatics in his establishment, and he found that out of 160 insane persons, (100 males and 60 females,) 18 (17 males and 1 female,) had complete anæsthesis of the skin; and in six others, who were males, the sensibility to pain was very much decreased.

DRIED FIGS.—The fig tree grows luxuriantly and yields abundantly in the soil and climate of these Southern States, and yet many thousands of dollars are annually sent out of the country for the dried fruit of Smyrna, Elemo and other points of export. The superior qualities of this, the most wholesome of all preserved fruits, always bring high prices and the inferior sorts are generally uneatable. Figs can be cured and dried in Alabama as easily as elsewhere, and the article, if properly dried, will equal, if not surpass, the finest imported qualities. To-day a specimen was handed us, taken from a quantity of native fruit put up in this city three years ago; they were perfectly sound, and though their flavor resembled that of foreign fruit, it was infinitely superior, more delicate and entirely without their occasional soapy taste. The gentleman who handed us the fruit, and in whose household they were prepared, has kindly furnished us the following receipt for curing them, which, though it may be familiar to many, no doubt will be suggestive and useful knowledge to others; it is as follows: Make water very sweet with brown sugar, (nut syrup,) and when it is quite hot, put in the fruit and let it boil for half an hour, or until the figs assume a swollen appearance—then take them out and place them in the sun; repeat the operation from day to day, and after the third time, when sufficiently dried, they may be packed in drums; use the different layers are placed, sugar may be sprinkled upon them, if desirable, but the fruit will be sweet enough without it.

The fig tree bears most abundantly, and from a dozen of them, of ordinary size fruit, might be procured and put up for market to the value of sundry bales of cotton. There is no other expense than the small amount of brown sugar necessary to be used. We are fully enlisted in the cause of this new branch of domestic industry and profit. Imagine the sufferings of the country for lack of its supply of figs, should the Allies close the gates of the Mediterranean upon our ships; but should our home resources in this regard be developed, we could laugh their fruitless efforts to scorn in exultant triumph, each one eating his own figs under his own vine and fig tree. [Mobile Adv.

THE UPPER RIVERS.—We clip the subjoined welcome intelligence from the Missouri Republican of the 23d:

The river at this point was at a stand yesterday—and was so reported by arrivals from Kekuk to that place. The Illinois river is still reported falling, with from four to four and a half feet in the channel to Lasalle. A heavy rise is reported by telegraph in the Missouri. A dispatch from Lexington yesterday stated that the river had risen three feet at that point and was still rising, supposed to be the mountain rise commencing. There is eight feet in the channel of the Mississippi to Cairo. A steady rain commenced last evening, which promised to continue all night. Weather warm.

The same paper has a dispatch from Lexington, dated 22d, which says: "Mountain rise coming—rose three feet here—rising fast."

THE NEW EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.—An American gentleman, who has the entree at the Court of St. Petersburg, writes in these terms to a friend in New York, largely interested in steam machinery:

Do not believe that the Emperor Alexander is of any softer material than his father Nicholas, or that he will let England and France off before he has taken the staroh out of them. He either has repented or very soon will repent plainly the offer his father made to our Government. He will give the United States the whole of Russian America (which carries with it immense whale fisheries and the unlimited control of the Pacific coast) for the privilege of buying and fitting out steamships and privateers in our ports.

As it is now known in Russia that English agents have been permitted to recruit for the Crimean army in New York, the Allies cannot complain if the Amroloen Cabinet accepts this fine offer. In case it does, thirty millions of dollars will be spent among our laborers and mechanics by the Russians, and our clipper-built ships will find a prompt market. Alexander speaks English like one born to it, and keeps the run of American papers with surprising accuracy. Soon after his accession he said to a party of Americans who were presented to him, "Our countries have at heart one interest in common—to cure England of her mania for giving the law to other nations."

FROM SOUTH AMERICA.—Dates had been received at Panama from Valparleo to May 14, and Callao to May 24. The news is not important.

CHILI.—The news is of very little general interest.

The Minister of Merine has published two important decrees with regard to microbantmen. The one is allowing to national vessels the completion of their crews with two-thirds foreigners, counting from the captain downwards, in view of the great scarcity of Chilian sailors, in proportion to the number of vessels sailing under the Chilian flag. This regulation is to remain in force until the 1st of May, 1855.

The other imposes upon every captain of a vessel the duty of giving satisfactory account, at his return, of all the Chilian sailors missing from his muster roll, under a penalty of $50 for every man, and the risk of his vessel being considered as under a foreign flag, without claim to the privileges of the most favored nations.

The U. S. frigate Independence, 60 guns, sailed for Callao on the 10th last.

PERU.—The Peruvian newspapers and public are busily discussing the question of religious toleration, to which the majority appear to be opposed.

The elections have terminated, and resulted in the triumph of the Ministerial party.

It is thought that General Castilla will be elected to the Presidency.

CENTENARY COLLEGE OF LOUISIANA.—Centenary College of Louisiana is located in Jackson, La., 12 miles east of Bayou Sara. Its location is beautiful, retired and healthy. It has commodious buildings, a large library, a good chemical and philosophical apparatus, a well selected mineralogical and geological cabinet, and a full Board of Instruction.

As this section of the Southwest is but poorly provided with academies and preparatory schools, there is connected with the College a Preparatory Department, in which all necessary instruction may be received for entering College proper.

The College is now in a highly prosperous condition, and under the management of the present Board of Trustees and Faculty it promises permanency and extensive usefulness.

Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would however, respectfully urge all parents or guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the Institution, to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, facilitating, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.

School books, stationery, &c., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the usual rates.

Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral deportment of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.

As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass into another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.

The government of the school is to be understood as that of authority—though parental and mild, yet decided and firm. The institution, in a religious point of view will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.

Pupils will be required to attend church at least once on the Sabbath, and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.

The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.

The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second session commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July. At which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.

All applications for admission of pupils, &c., to be made to the president of the College.

LAGRANGE COLLEGE, AT FLORENCE ALABAMA.—The Tennessee, Memphis and Alabama Conferences have removed this Institution from La Grange to this place, and have appointed the undersigned Commissioners to effect this removal. We have under contract, on an eligible site, large buildings, on the plan of a distinguished Architect, which we hope to have completed during the present year.

We have purchased for the use of the President, a comfortable mansion, and have provided suitable buildings for the opening of the next session on the 21st day of February. We have ordered from Philadelphia and Boston a supply of superior apparatus.

The Dormitory system has been abolished, and ample provision has been made for the board of students in good private families, at $10 per month for board and washing, and $2 for fuel, lodging and room rent.

By an ordinance of the Corporation, no Spirituous Liquors are retailed in the town, or Billiard Tables, or Nine Pin Alleys allowed to be kept.

We have the pleasure of announcing the same Faculty as formerly, viz:

Rev. R. H. RIVERS, D. D., President and Professor of Moral and Mental Philosophy and Belles Lettres.

OSCAR F. CASEY, A. M., Professor of Ancient Languages.

S. P. RICE, A. M., Professor of Pure Mathematics.

Rev. H. H. ROSS, A. M., Professor of Mixed Mathematics.

T. P. HARRIS, A. M., Professor of Natural Science.

Tuition in College per session ..... $25 00.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

DR. JOHN BECKWITH,	WILLIAM MCNUTT,
HON. S. C. POSEY,	H. W. KIMBALL,
GEO. C. HAGLAND,	WILLIAM WARING,
A. C. BARTON,	JOHN W. FEILESON,
D. L. BINNAGAR,	REV. DUNCAN BROWN,
CAPT. ISAAC LANE,	JEROME B. PILLOW,

S. GRISWOLD & CO.

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Water Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and make well. They are convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not their durability. In short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be.

W. A. BROADWELL & CO., SUCCESSORS TO A. J. WRIGHT & Co., Cotton Factors and Commission Merchants, 55 Carondolet street, New Orleans, La.

Having commenced a COMMISSION BUSINESS in this city, to be conducted under the above style, we take the liberty of offering you our services, and respectfully soliciting your patronage.

We receive all consignments and remittances addressed to the house of A. J. WRIGHT & Co during their temporary suspension. It is expected that the liabilities of that house will be met soon, of which with subsequent arrangements, due notice will be given.

Our charges will be such as are customary with other respectable houses.

We give you the assurance that all funds or proceeds of produce entrusted to us, shall be held strictly sacred to the object for which they are sent. As the contrary practice has been productive of great injury both to planters and merchants, there will be no deviation from this rule.

W. A. BRADWELL. W. A. BROADWELL & CO.

The above arrangement having been made at my request, will meet my hearty concurrence and co-operation. My services will be given to the house, and I solicit from the friends of our house a continuance of their favors.

DOCTOR HOOFLAND'S CELEBRATED GERMAN BITTERS,

Prepared by Dr C. M. RELIGIOUS TEST—CATHOLIC DISABILITY.

PENSACOLA, FA., July 2, 1855.

Dear Brother McTyeire—It is very seldom anything you write escapes me, and very seldom indeed I read otherwise than admiringly. But from your views on the Eighth Article of the American Platform, as expressed editorially in the Advocate of the 30th ult., I must dissent. As much as I concur in the spirit of your article, I cannot but think you err in supposing the Eighth Article of the platform to be contrary to it. If you will allow me, I will endeavor to show why it is altogether proper for the American party to recognize the evil of political Jesuitism in their proclamation of principles.

The Romish Church is to be viewed from two standpoints: from that which you occupy, with others of your vocation, and from that occupied by the statesman. From your point of view it is a religious question, to be met with weapons "not carnal;" from the statesman's point of view it is a political question, to be met as all other political questions are. As a corruption of the true faith, as the "mother of abominations," she is to be exposed by those who are "set for the defence of the truth"—who are commanded to "contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints." But as the cunning, wily plotter after political supremacy, the politician must note her operations and shape his course accordingly. It is very true that the apologists of the Romish Church have loudly declaimed against the "union of Church and State," have put it forth as a doctrine of their creed in this country that the two should ever be kept separate. Yet when we examine further into their doctrines relating to the subject, we find that a principle more dangerous is entertained. The Church must not be united to, but set over the State. The State is to hold the sword, but to use it in obedience to the authority of the Church; the same with the purse. This is the doctrine contended for by Brownson in his "Review," a work acknowledged as authority upon subjects of this kind in that Church. This being the doctrine of the Church, the question arises, is not every effort to strengthen it in this country an effort to place a power over the government and constitution of the country, to which they are to be but tributary and secondary? This must appear evident. Well, then, how is this effort to be met? The citizens, as such, of our free country, are to protest against it, and say to every one favoring the doctrine, "You are for putting an authority over the government of our country which we repudiate, and therefore we cannot advance you to office." I cannot for the life of me see why this is not legitimate. The American party does not place an interdict upon their religion. They may insult God by their image worship, the adoration of saints, &c., and in the exercise of all the absurd rites of their religion(!) be secured against molestation. The principles of the party do not impinge upon this point at all. You yourself acknowledge this in part to be a political question. Your own language is:

"The Pope is a king as well as a priest, having his soldiers and his jails. His cardinals are ministers of state, of war, of finance."

Granting this, I cannot comprehend why you protest against the principle involving the question in party contest. As to the policy of doing so, that is another question, and upon it I beg leave also to differ from you.

There is no subject upon which our people generally are more ignorant than that of Romanism. They are unacquainted with the dangerous and ruinous doctrines, both religious and political, of that Church. Though the Church is now, comparatively weak in this country, it is aiming at supremacy, and making every instrumentality within her reach bend to the consummation of that purpose, the attainment of that end. Shall we wait to meet the question when the arch enemy has become strong and powerful? Let agitation begin now; let it continue until through every newspaper, from the largest to the smallest, in the land—through Congressional speeches, through party proclamations and by every other means, the public are possessed with a knowledge of the facts and principles relating to and entertained by that Church, both as a spiritual and political organization.

As an evidence that our people need to be aroused upon this subject, note the number of Protestant children which are being educated at Jesuit schools, and that, too, by parents who are not lacking in ordinary intelligence. With a sagacity unequaled are the servants of the Pope prying into every crevice and corner of our political and social compact, and wherever it is possible they silently enter, get hold of the elements of influence, and wield them to the promotion of the one aim that gives unity to all their efforts, viz., the supremacy of the Pope over the bodies and souls of men.

In view of the past history of Europe it is unwise to underestimate the power of this party. In considering the subject, we must not forget that the Romish Church is, in the matter of universal supremacy, a unit. Therefore, in estimating its strength, we must not reckon simply upon its numbers in this country, but view the portion here in relation to the Church elsewhere. The Church was not strong enough at Rome to sustain itself, yet it did not lack. In the course of time an issue might arise in our country to determine which the whole Romish power might be brought to bear. Because they are not powerful now, is no reason they may not become so. What numbers there are may do great harm.

With your permission, I may pursue this subject further hereafter.

JOSEPH B. COTTRELL.

EXHORTATION AFTER PRAYER.

When ministers go two and two, or when two are providentially present at the same service, it is very desirable that each should speak a word for Christ. If one preaches, let the other not only pray, but exhort also. This is peculiarly proper at evening meetings. A writer in the Episcopal Recorder, after noting that the sermon often leaves hearers untouched, and that some stimulus is needed, urging men to the right service, adds:

"Now I should say, judging from a good deal of observation, in different parts of the country, that hearty exhortations following sermons would be found a very considerable attraction. I always feel them to be so myself. Then we are pretty sure to get something fresh, and usually said with more unction than it would be in a regular sermon. The preacher having listened to a good discourse, is himself quickened, and will usually show this in the very tones of his address. This excites attention, and he sees marks of it. Thus encouraged, he often rises above himself, to the dignity of a real Herald of the Cross.

I have observed, that ministers who were habitually tame in their sermon delivery are, under these circumstances, animated and effective speakers. Indeed, one rarely hears an exhortation that is not a sincere and fervent expression of Christian feeling, and persuasive to Christian practice.

There is something in this, too, that the testimony of two men at any point where men may differ, even though the difference may not be supposed material, is regarded with more interest than that of one. Of many things that we say in the pulpit, though people will raise no question, yet they assume that our utterance may be, in part at least, our own fancies; but to hear them directly endorsed in tones of surnestness, and their application to practice, in its highest and most awful line, clearly pointed out, puts all suspicion to flight, and the truths presented are then free to exercise full force."

THE CHURCH'S STRENGTH.

The converts of the Day of Pentecost, if doubled once in ten years, would, at the end of two centuries, have equaled the population of the globe. Yes, if Christians had continued to labor so faithfully, so humbly, and so prayerfully, and God had so blessed their labors as to make each convert the instrument of the conversion of two persons every ten years, the morning which ushered in the third century from that memorable day would have shone upon a world containing not one soul unreconciled to God. Why, then, did not Christianity go on "conquering and to conquer," until its triumphs were coextensive with the abodes of man? Alas! the fault was in her professed friends. Even before the grave had closed on the last of the apostles pride and emulation and worldliness had begun to mar the beauty and paralyze the energies of the Christian Church. And as years rolled on the scene became darker and darker still, until at length a night of gloom settled upon the world, which continued unbroken for ten centuries.

How impressive the lesson thus taught us by history. How clearly does it show that the strength of the Church is in proportion to her purity and spirituality. Let her once more cherish the pentecostal spirit, and would she not experience pentecostal success, and receive a pentecostal blessing?—American Messenger.

CHRISTIAN COURTEOUSNESS.

Courteousness has been called one of the minor manifestations of that love which is the fulfilling of the law. There are many reasons why Christians should be courteous. It is the command of God. "Be courteous," is a precept dictated by the spirit of inspiration. This is a reason in itself all sufficient. No one who has the true spirit of Christian loyalty will wait for reasons and motives to induce him to obey God. The fact that God commands is in itself a sufficient reason why we should obey.

Christians should be courteous because of the connection existing between the growth of feeling and its appropriate expression. Let a feeling existing in the soul have its appropriate expression, and it will increase in strength. Deny that feeling its appropriate expression, and it will decay. There is a mutual action and reaction between the growth and the expression of feeling. If that appropriate expression is withheld, the growth of the feeling will be impaired. There will be less love in the soul, and of course a less perfect fulfilling of the law.

PULPIT SCOLDING.

Mr. Editor—You have published several articles lately designed, I suppose, by the authors to set the preachers right in certain matters pertaining to ministerial conduct. No doubt can be entertained of the necessity sometimes existing of using this medium to bring back the erring to the good and right way; but too often it is to be regretted that there is an indefiniteness in these productions which gives the individuals for whom they are designed an opportunity for screening themselves behind some plea perfectly consistent with Scriptural authority; and he who has Scriptural authority, cares very little for what may appear, and very plausibly, too, are the unfounded complaints of faultfinders.

The article on "Scolding in the Pulpit" in your issue of April 14th, signed by Mary, may fall under the imputation above named, from the fact that no minister who reads it can find sufficient to force conviction of having acted wrong. The indefiniteness, in some measure, results from the incongruity in the several parts, while the quotation from Cowper seems to be unsuited to the subject complained of.

Cowper speaks of one "gratifying the malignity of his own heart, and charitably supposing his hearers destitute of all grace that he may shine the more in his own eyes by the comparison."

Mary speaks of one described as a good pastor, praying with the families, "leaving an odor of peace, purity and heavenly mindedness; "agreeable in company;" in his sermons a comforter of God's people and a good delineator of sin; "excellent minister;" "good man;" "no superior in the Conference; and besides all he is represented as feeling so much under the influence of compassion for sinners that the moistened eye expresses the fullness of heart. And yet he scolds sometimes, and Cowper is brought forward to show how and wherein he scolds. Will that preacher be able to discover himself reflected in that mirror? More especially if he be a modest man, and disclaims all pretensions to the prominent rank in which he is placed by the "opinion of good judges."

In reading Mary's description, one would be inclined to think that there is some mistake about the scolding. He who reads Cowper's finds one abhorrent in every respect as a minister. The word scolding used by the former must be a misnomer for something else, very likely in keeping with the strictness of ministerial obligation. The latter case meets with no commiseration, and both saint and sinner would say to him, "Go learn of Jesus to preach the gospel;" so that instead of vituperation there should be constraining love of Christ—

"To seek the wandering souls of men
With cries, entreaties, tears to save
To snatch them from the gaping grave."

There is an indefiniteness about the term scolding, itself, well calculated to mislead the judgment we may pass on the person supposed to be guilty. And this may be found to arise from the varied sensibilities of different persons, or the views which different persons entertain with regard to the limits and mode in which severe language may be used in the pulpit. I have known an eminent minister to be accused of the fault in question for speaking, when interrupted in a discourse, of the great impropriety in permitting both minister and people to be disturbed by crying children. Some persons are so very refined that if the terrors of the law are denounced even in the exact language of Scripture, the preacher must bear the epithet of harsh, disagreeable or vulgar; and if pointed enough to say, "Thou art the man," he is a scold.

It may be considered of doubtful expediency by some to use measure publicly for the correction of faults in conduct or indulgence in vices; but it must be kept in mind that mere expediency is not the governing principle in Christianity, and that it is certainly contrary to one of the great designs in propagating religious truth to speak of vice or error in such a way as to leave no mark, no conviction in the minds of the hearers. The preacher finds his exemplars in the prophets, in Jesus and his apostles. Their plainness and pointedness, their direct appeal to facts, exposure of crime and denunciation of God's displeasure, give us no room to doubt the course which must be pursued, and that a great and important object is to be gained by that course.

But what is scolding? "The uttering of rude, clamorous language by way of rebuke or railing."—Webster. He who would rebuke our faults or sins with unmingled harshness, is a scold. The tone of voice and the language used indicate this. He bears for us no fraternal love, no commiseration—has none of that unutterable feeling expressed in the poet's soliloquy:

"Arise, my tenderest thoughts, arise;
To torrents melt my streaming eyes;
And thou, my heart, with anguish feel
Those wrongs which thou canst not heal."

The indulgence in such a spirit would disqualify an angel for the performance of ministerial duties. So, that so far from being a comfortor, he would destroy the religious enjoyment of his flock. Instead of occupying a place of prominence, he would obscure his talent. His eloquence would become a sounding brass, and the moistened eye would serve to detect his hypocrisy.

It has never been the misfortune of the writer to listen to any demonstration of the scolding propensity in this form; while he has often heard what might in appearance pass for scolding, which, on closer examination, exhibited the honest, Bible approved determination not to "heal the hurt of the daughter of God's people slightly, saying peace, peace, when there is no peace."

East Baton Rouge. CRITIC.

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY.

"The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strongholds, and all reasoning, and every high thing exalted against the knowledge of God, surprising every thought into the obedience of Christ, and easily revenging all disobedience."—2 Cor., x., 4-6. What minister or clergyman, that either understood his high calling or sought not to erect a secular or carnal tyranny over spiritual things, would neglect this ample and sublime power conferred upon him, and come a begging to a weak hand of magistracy for that kind of aid which the magistrate hath no commission to afford him, and, in the way he seeks it, hath always been found helpless and unprofitable. Neither is it unknown, or by the wisest men unobserved, that the church began then most apparently to degenerate and to go to ruin when she borrowed of the civil power more than fair encouragement and protection, more than Christ himself or his apostles ever required. The civil sword always proves against objects that are spiritual, a ridiculous weapon.

Two things there be which have ever been found working much mischief to the Church of God and the advancement of truth: force, on the one hand, restraining, and hire, on the other, corrupting the teachers thereof.

For belief or practice in religion according to his conscientious conviction, no man ought to be punished or molested by any outward force on earth whatsoever.

Church discipline is exercised on them only who have joined themselves in that covenant of union, and proceeds only to a separation from the rest, proceeds never to any corporal enforcement or forfeiture of money, which, in all spiritual things, are the two arms of Anti-christ, not of the true Church.—Milton.

THE MOMENT AFTER DEATH.—What a moment this must be! How vast its consequences! How overwhelming its revelation! Let us try, by illustration, to realize it. There dies a saint of God. The summons was sudden, but his house was in order, and with a smile on his face he bids a glad adieu to the scence of friendship on earth. Coldness passes from point to point in his system; his vision grows dim; his tongue faltering; but in strong faith he commends his all to the Conqueror of death, and passes away shouting an everlasting victory! The spirit soars, and angels attend it; the gates of the city are open to receive it; the King is seen in his beauty; and now Heaven is enjoyed in all its bliss and glory! Waking up from the life dream, the first sight is Jesus as he is; no flight through immensity, no pilgrimage of the spheres, for the everlasting arms are the resting place of the disembodied soul; it will be in the bosom of Immanuel that the emancipated spirit will enquire, "Where am I?" and read in the face of Jesus the answer, "Forever with the Lord."

COLD COMFORT FOR HIGH CHURCHMEN.—Rev. Mr. Blaikie, the Scotch minister of Boston, in his recent work on the philosophy of sectarianism, asserts that the only apostle who had a successor was Judas. Matthias was chosen to succeed him in the apostleship, but he had no successor, so that the succession stopped with him. Paul was afterwards added to the apostolic college, but not as a successor to any of those who had vacated the office. Matthias was ordained to be a witness, with the other apostles, of the resurrection of Christ, and as Paul had not seen Christ until after the resurrection, he appeared to him expressly to fit him for becoming an apostle. Hence the apostle always styled himself "one born out of due time," and he appealed to the fact that he had seen Christ as an evidence of his apostleship. The apostles had successors in their ministerial office, but not in the apostleship—except Judas.

THE JESUITS.—In whose eyes thought is a forbidden thing, reading an offence, writing a crime, and printing an outrage. Everywhere disguised, and yet everywhere revealed.

We have heretofore alluded to the missionary zeal of the Moravian Church. The following article, which we take from the Macedonian, will illustrate this forcibly:

THE MISSION SHIP.

The labors of the Moravian missionaries were commenced in the year 1731, with one station and two missionaries in Greenland, and one station and two missionaries in St. Thomas, West Indies. According to the last report, the brethren have at present sixty-nine missionary stations, in thirteen different countries. At these stations there are 297 missionaries, male and female, and more than 70,000 persons, either converts from among the Heathen or receiving Christian instruction. Their stations and laborers are distributed as follows:

COUNTRIES.	Stations	Laborers	Hearers.
Greenland	4	24	2.101
Labrador	4	20	1.330
North America	5	15	491
Danish India	8	27	10.224
Jamaica	13	34	12.800
Antigua	7	22	8.008
St. Kitts	4	10	3.733
Barbadoes	4	10	3.620
Tobago	2	6	2.128
Mesquito Coast	1	6	53
Surinam	8	55	19.519
South Africa	8	54	6.595
Mongolia	2	2	.....

These stations were founded successively from 1733 to 1853, a period of 120 years. During this period the Moravian Church has never suffered the missionary spirit to abate within her. The last station was established among the Chinese in Mongolia, in 1853. Two missionaries set apart for this work are now staying on the Himalaya Mountains, with others of their brethren, so as to learn the language of the country. A large proportion of these sixty-nine stations are self-supporting, their expenses being defrayed by the missionaries themselves or by the contributions of the new churches. Hence this immense machinery is kept in motion at an expenditure of less than 9,000 thalers (a little short of $7,000 of our currency.) It is not the riches of this world that accomplishes these labors, but the love of Jesus Christ suffices to inspire them.

At Hermannsburg, a large village in the county of Luneberg, in Hanover, dwells a pastor, Mr. Harms, who, having through grace been made the means of the conversion of the greater part of the parish, made that parish a veritable missionary society, and his parishioners an army of missionaries. He built a house, in which he undertook the preparation of young men who had devoted themselves to the missionary work, and that without help from any society, and entirely by the contributions of his own people, rich and poor. This being done, he selected a mission field in Africa, and said to himself, "Now we must have a vessel to convey these messengers of the gospel." But it would require a capital which all the revenues of Hermannsburg could not pay for many years. How should it be done? A lady left her little fortune 3,000 thalers for the ship. Carpenters and other workmen offer their labor gratuitously, and pious merchants of Hamburg furnished the outfit of the vessel. On the 27th of September last a religious festival, unique in its kind, attracted a large company of Christians to Harburg, on the Elbe, near Hamburg. Their errand was to launch upon the water the mission ship which was then finished, a monument of faith and love to souls. The ship is named the Candace, for it will carry its first missionaries to the country of that African queen whose minister was converted by the agency of Philip (Acts, viii., 27-39.) A figure representing this royal lady is on the prow of the ship, a crown of gold upon her head, bracelets of glittering gold on her arms, a massive necklace of coral encircling her neck and falling upon her bosom—a prophetic image of Africa yet to be conquered by the gospel, and to bring her gold and pearls as an offering to Jesus Christ. All the ships in the port hoisted their colors, as a mark of brotherhood to the missionary ship, which was now to take its place among them. A pulpit was erected at the stern of the vessel, the assembly sung a hymn in German, and then the pastor, Mr. Harms, addressed the audience from the passage, Matt. viii., 23-27, applying the passage to the vessel of which Jesus Christ should be the first pilot and the first captain.

On the 20th of October, a more solemn festival called together the people of Hermansburg. They were then summoned to assign to the missionaries their charge, and to bid them farewell. The ceremony took place at the church and occupied three hours. Sixteen young men, all pupils of pastor Harms, took their seats in the choir of the church. After singing and invocation of the Holy Spirit, 2 Cor., v. 14, was expounded, "For the love of Christ constraineth us," and then all publicly and solemnly engaged to consecrate their lives to the service of the Lord who had called them. Eight of the number set out as missionaries, and eight as emigrants. One of the number is designated as pastor of the little community, some as magistrates, and one as treasurer. Their destination is Mombaza, an English settlement at Zanzibar, on the coast of Africa. The ship sailed October 28, the missionaries on the deck, in a beautiful hymn, bidding adieu to the shores of their native land.

BENEVOLENCE.—A very good and a very wise man said, that although he believed he would die to-morrow, he would plant a tree to-day. He lived not for himself; he did not exist for the moment; he looked forward to the future.

FURTHER PARTICULARS OF THE BALTIC'S NEWS.

From the New York papers of the 28th ult. we extract the following details of the foreign news brought by the steamship Baltic:

The War.

In order to form a correct notion of the operations of the Allies on the 7th of June, against the Russian works at Sebastopol, it is desirable to refer to the description of these works. Every one is aware that the ground before Sebastopol is intersected by ravines descending to the sea, three ravines being divided from each other by ridges, upon which both the Russian works and the principal batteries of the besieging armies are erected. The ravine farthest to the northwest, and on the extreme right of the allied position, in front of what is now called the Inkermann attack, is that descending to the careening harbor. It was at one time intended by the Allies to take possession of the whole of the north ridge down to the careening harbor, but the Russians crossed the ravine with great determination and established two works on a lower slope of it—one at 800 yards, and the other at 400 yards from the second parallel. These redoubts have probably ere this fallen into the hands of the Allies, for Pelissier's dispatch of June 8th says, "the enemy have completely abandoned the right shore of the careening bay."

This is an important position, commanding the ships in port; and almost intercepting the entrance to the town. The next ridge is that on which the Malakoff tower stands, and opposite to it, at a distance of about a mile and a half, the Victoria redoubt has been erected by the Allies. The Victoria attack carried on by the French, is directed from this point against the tower and adjoining works. Descending nearer to the town, and about 500 yards in front of it, is the Mamelon, which is described as commanding the lower itself. The conquest and occupation of the hill by the French is the result of the contest of June 7th. The Malakoff tower itself, being one of the few works in masonry on the land side of Sebastopol, was long since reduced to ruins, but it is now enclosed by a very high semi-circular parapet of earth, pierced with twelve embrasures and surrounded by a ditch. From the tower to the careening bay there runs a long line of parapet, broken at a half-way by a battery of 16 guns on two faces, and thus flanking the curtain between this point and the tower. Another of 12 guns on the hill above careening bay is connected with this work by a further parapet, which extends to the sea. We apprehend that the works taken on the 7th June are outside the line. The Redan is separated from the Malakoff tower by what is termed the Middle Ravine, and stands upon the ridge between the Woronzoff ravine and this middle ravine.

On this ridge also stands the Allied Crown battery, fronting the apex of the Redan, which was further defended by an abattis, and by a strong party of riflemen lodged in a stone quarry in front of the work, and which quarry was carried by the British on the 7th June. Sebastopol, it is to be remembered, is not a fortress, but a town defended by a chain of forts and field fortifications. From this description it will be noticed that the several attacks of the besieging armies are advancing part passu on parallel lines, and that the recent operations of the French and English, although distinct, assist each other, and are essential to the success of the common enterprise—the plan of the Allies being to enclose the Russian line of fortifications within another line which shall gradually advance until the besieged are driven into the sea.

The following dispatches from Gen. Pelissier were not included among those we published yesterday:

June 8.—Last evening we took possession of 62 guns in the captured redoubts. Thirteen officers were taken prisoners. Our loss, which has not been accurately ascertained, is considerable, as might have been expected from so great a result.

June 9.—The situation is the same as yesterday. All the demonstrations of the enemy against the captured works have been fruitless. They have abandoned the so-called battery of the 2d of May; they have also completely abandoned to us the right shore of Careening Bay. The vessels in port have sought refuge in Artillery Bay, where our large mortars can reach them. We are watching them attentively.

Later accounts state that the British loss was eleven officers killed, namely: Col. Shearman; Majors Bayley and Dickson; Captains Muller, Forster, Corbett, Wray; Lieutenants Lawrence, Sims, Machell, Lowrey; 150 private men killed, 510 wounded and 15 missing. It is singular that Lord Raglan omits to mention how the British were engaged, or if they were engaged at all. Gen. Pelissier's dispatch informs us that the English Allies carried the rifle work in the quarry.

Heights of the Tchernaya.

The French lines are now so far advanced that the Allied cavalry water their horses in the Tchernaya without molestation. The Russians do not show in force. They have constructed two batteries, one towards the bridge, and the other on one of the spurs running out from the ridge of Inkermann. On the Allied side a work has been constructed for the defence of the bridge. Access to the river certainly secures water, but the position is described in correspondence from the camp, as "mere advantageous in a moral than a strategical point of view."

Sea of Azoff.

Admiral Bruat sends a dispatch to his Government which relates that explosive machines were sunk by the Russians in the Straits, but were not fired.

Redschid Pacha's dispatches contain nothing additional.

Other dispatches are to hand from the officers commanding the various ships that took part in the actions. And in a letter from Admiral Lyons, the following important passage occurs: "Sir George Brown confidently expects that, by the 7th instant, Yenikale will be in such a state of defence as fully to justify his leaving it in charge of the Ottoman troops now there under the command of Hadji Rexhid Pacha, and that the English and French forces will be at liberty to proceed to the attack of Anapa and Soudjuk Kaleh, in order to drive the enemy out of his last hold on the coast of Circassia."

[Telegraphic accounts state that the Russians have already abandoned Anapa, and are supposed to have crossed the Kouban. This requires confirmation.]

Correspondence gives account of the miserable state of Eupatoria. War and "Allied occupation" have despoiled the inhabitants of everything they possessed. For some time past the citizens have been subsisting on a scanty allowance of flour, given them by the British. Forty or fifty deaths from exhaustion and low fever take place daily, and around the town new ground has been broken for cemeteries. The houses are mostly in ruins, and the air putrid.

Seventeen hundred Turks have been sent to Gen. Vivian, as the first instalment of the Turkish contingent with English officers.

An Imperial manifesto, dated St. Petersburg, June 2d, ordains that in case of the death of the present Emperor Alexander, the Grand Duke Constantine shall be Regent during the minority of the Crown Prince; the Regency to continue during the minority of the second son, should the eldest die. The Empress is to be guardian.

Letters from Trebizonde of May 23d, mention that the Russian General Bassilief, with numerous suit, had arrived at Tabriz to notify the Shah of Persia of the accession of Alexander II., and to persuade the Shah to keep steady to his neutral policy.

The Vienna Conference.

A further paper containing the final protocol of the Vienna Conference, and the close of that negotiation, had been laid before the English Parliament, and puts us in possession of the closing scene. Count Buol having requested the Plenipotentiaries to assemble at his office on the 4th of June, proceeded to state that, as a last resource, Austria was prepared to make another proposition to settle, by way of compromise, the disputed point of the limitation of the Russian naval force in the Black Sea.

In the eleventh conference, held on the 19th of April, M. Drouyn de L'huys had suggested, that as Russia peremptorily objected to treat with the other great powers on the limitation of her own naval force, an expedient might be found to meet this difficulty by bringing about a direct arrangement between Russia and the Porte to adjust the balance of their respective forces, which arrangement should have the same validity and effect as the general acts of the conference.

To this was added Lord John Russell's remark of March 15th, that the most admissible terms of peace would be those which should combine the honor of Russia with the security of Europe. Upon these hints the Austrian Cabinet constructed its final scheme, namely: 1stly, that the great powers should bind themselves to respect the independence and territorial integrity of the Ottoman Empire, and should bind themselves to consider every act or event of a nature to infringe upon it as a question of European interest.

2dly. That the Plenipotentiaries of Russia and Turkey should propose by common agreement to the conference the equal amount of the effective naval forces to be kept up by them in the Black Sea, such amount not to exceed the number of Russian ships now afloat in that sea; and that the agreement should form an integral part of the general treaty—the Straits to remain closed, but each of the other powers to be authorized by firman to station two frigates in the Black Sea, and in case of hostilities the Sultan to open the passage to all the naval forces of his Allies.

The Russian envoys, on their part, were willing to refer the question to the consideration of the cabinet of St. Petersburg, they themselves not being authorized to assent to such a proposition without further instructions.

The French and English Plenipotentiaries merely repeated that their instructions were already exhausted; that they considered the Conference at an end, and that they saw no reason to enter upon the discussion of a proposition which embodied in new shape the very same principle which Russia had formally rejected at the previous meetings of the Conference. Upon this the assembly broke up, and the negotiations were terminated.

The Brussels Independance Belge intimates that, connected with the recent successes of the Allies in the Crimea, the Conferences will be reopened at Paris. The British press contradicts this, but the Independance has many times given the first intimation of diplomatic probabilities.

Britain.

The principal business in Parliament has been the discussion of Mr. Brown's motion in favor of decimal coinage, and on Mr. Layard's, in favor of administrative reform.

Arthur Cunningham, supercargo of the American ship Samuel Appleton, denies in a card to the papers that the ship carried arms to Russia.

The fortifications at Milford Haven and elsewhere along the coast are being armed with 68 pounders.

A new ship-of-war, to be called the Howe, is being built, of 130 guns, and another is to be laid down of 150.

In the shipping list, this week, we notice the movements of the following American ships, employed in the transport service: Edgar P. Stringer, Equity, Alps (s. s.,) Emma Jane, Anders (s. s.,) T. B. Martin, Guerilla, Queen of Clippers, Great Republic. There is quite a large fleet of American craft engaged in the war carrying trade.

Carlos C. Dick is recognised as vice-consul at Glasgow, for the Republic of Uruguay.

France.

A magnificent fete was given on the evening of the 11th, at the Hotel de Ville, by the Prefect of the Seine, to the King of Portugal, Queen Christina, the Princess Mathilde, the Lord Mayor of London, and six thousand other persons were present.

The most interesting intelligence refer to Her Majesty the Empress. Dr. Locock, the celebrated accoucheur (who has had considerable experience in Queen Victoria's nursery,) was summoned by telegraph to Paris, where, after consultation with Drs. Dubois and Conneau, it was formally announced that the Empress is enciente.

The park of siege artillery is at length shipped in the American clippers Great Republic, Queen of Clippers, Gauntlet and Alleghansan. The Great Republic is shipping 400 cavalry horses. Captain d'Audigne, of the French staff, accidentally fell into the hold and fractured a limb. Two hundred dock laborers have been shipped from Marseilles to the Crimea. Not fewer than 80,000 horses have left France since the war began.

Spain.

Notwithstanding the Government assertions that the Carlist insurrection is put down, there are indications to the contrary.

A dispatch sent to Paris, June 13th, gave notice that a band of 70 men left Pampeluna, on the 11th, and took the direction of the French frontier to procure arms. A movement in Catalonia was feared. The French mail which left Paris on the 9th, and the mails which left Madrid on the 10th, were burned by the insurgents in Castile.

The cortes have rejected a proposition tending to censure the ministry.

By Telegraph.

DANTZIC, Saturday, June 15.—The Vultura has arrived with dispatches. She left the fleet on the 11th, anchored off Cronstadt; on the 6th the Russians fired on a boat of the Cossack, while bearing a flag of truce and landing 7 Finlanders, and 21 English sailors and 3 officers were killed.

On the 8th inst., the Magecienne fired for an hour with great effect upon a body of horse artillery, receiving but little damage.

On the 9th, the Meraln and Firefly were slightly injured by running upon some infernal machines. There had been no alteration in the position of the fleet.

CRACOW, June 14.—The Emperor of Austria arrived here from Vienna.

The Crimea.

The correspondence is down to the 4th. The Guards had lost 65 men from cholera. The 31st regiment had also lost many men. The weather was excessively hot. The army had received about 6000 drafts since May 1st. It was thought the force under Sir George Brown would return and land six miles east of Balaklava, and form a junction with the force on the Tchernaya.

All accounts agree that there is a vast amount of disease and despondency in the garrison of Sebastopol.

A TESTIMONIAL.—Professor Alex. Dimitry, formerly of Louisiana, but now a resident of this city, has concluded before the students of Georgetown College a course of twelve lectures on the subject of the "Civilization of Ancient Greece." Of the character of the literary production, it does not become me to pronounce an opinion; but the fact of its highly interesting character is sufficiently expressed by the act of the students themselves, who, several days ago, in appreciation of his classical efforts, presented him with a silver pitcher, elegantly and elaborately chased, bearing a suitable inscription. The testimonial took him by surprise. The presentation, as well as the acceptance speech, was chaste and eloquent. [Wash. Star, 13th.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, JULY 14, 1855.

Bishop Andrew arrived by the steamship Prometheus, which was detained at quarantine from Friday evening last to Sabbath morning. We are glad to see the Bishop and Mrs. A. in such good health. On Sunday evening he preached in Carondelet street Church, and left on Monday for his home in Summerfield, Ala. This episcopal visitation has been of great benefit to the Church on the Pacific.

Capt. McGowan appeared in court for violating quarantine, and was acquitted by a jury. Ground of acquittal, that the construction of the law by which it was attempted to detain him was excessively rigid.

The First Case Under the New Law. Two likely looking mulatto girls were emancipated last Saturday by a jury of slaveholders, on the application of their owner, who was also a mulatto; they were also allowed to remain in the State and enjoy their liberty, upon the master giving bond and security that they should never become a burthen to the commonwealth. This is the first case under the law which was passed by the last Legislature. Hitherto the Legislature alone had the power of emancipation.

Wesleyan Institute.—The examination of pupils of the Jackson Wesleyan Female Institute, says the Mississippian, 4th inst., commenced on Wednesday last and closed yesterday evening, at the Methodist Church, before a very large audience. From the commencement to the end it was a scene of much interest. The young ladies acquitted themselves in a style that gave evidence of assiduous study, and which reflected great credit upon their teachers.

The next session of the institute commences on the first Monday of October next.

The Location.—We learn, says the Montgomery Journal, of Saturday last, that the commissioners of the Alabama Methodist Conference, in relation to the location of a college, met on Wednesday, July 4, in Summerfield, in Dallas county, and determined to locate two institutions, one at Greensboro', Greene county, and one at Auburn, Macon county. Over $100,000 have been subscribed for that purpose at both points. This has been amicably compromised a matter which has caused much feeling at both localities.

Annual Collections.—"In every Conference the present is the period which should be improved in attending to these collections. Every preacher should feel it his duty to give special attention to this subject. Collectors should be appointed, and collections taken in every congregation. Missionary sermons should be preached in all the societies, when practicable, and the subject be properly brought before the whole Church."

So writes the Missionary Secretary—Dr. Scheu. Verily there is need of it. The treasury needs all the funds that belong to it; and if any collector or preacher have any in hand, he is urged to remit them at once to the Treasurer or his Assistants.

Gospel for Sailors.—The labors of the seamen's chaplain, at Mobile, have been blessed of God to the conversion of several sailors during the winter; ten have been united with the Bethel Church on the profession of their faith in Christ, and others have found the Saviour precious, who had to leave the port for the "rolling billow" before they could be received to church privileges; but removed in the spirit of their minds, they have a hope sure and steadfast, entering in to that within the vail, and purpose to unite with their friends in churches at the North.

The Converts.—The Roman Catholic papers publish a list of prominent converts to Romanism in England during the last six years. The catalogue contains the names of one duchess, one marchioness, two countesses, twelve right honorable ladies, ten right honorable gentlemen, and a large number of the gentry whose titles are simply honorable, sir, or lady. The clerical list has the names of two archdeacons and eighty clergymen of the Church of England. The Rev. Edward Beard is the only dissenting minister in the long array.

It has been said that men carry on a kind of coasting trade with religion. In the voyage of life they profess to be in search of Heaven, but take care not to venture so far in their approximations to it as entirely to lose sight of the earth; and should their frail vessel be in danger of shipwreck, they will gladly throw their darling views overboard, as other mariners their treasures, only to fish them up again when the storm is over.

We are sure to be losers when we quarrel with ourselves. It is a civil war; and in all such contentious triumphs are defeats.

No man can avoid his own company. So he had better make it as good as possible.

The Standard—Our Position.

The Catholic Standard, 8th inst., prefaces a quotation from the Advocate, 30th ult., in this blarneying and sniffling way:

"We have seen several numbers, and as yet, read none of that abuse of "Popery" in its columns which characterises the papers under the charge of Presbyterian deacons. However, as Catholics, we would not speak too favorably of any religious paper of the sects; for, no matter what may be their views and course in relation to the Catholic Church, they are still, in rejecting her, in error, and need the light of truth. The Advocate repudiates Know-Nothingism in the following able remarks."

Then follows a single paragraph from our editorial on "Religious Tests and Catholic Disability." This injustice has been done us (perhaps unintentionally) by several other papers. We have especially to thank those—as the Jackson Mississippian, Montgomery Advertiser, Charleston Mercury and others—that in allnding to our remarks published them entire. In that shape the article commits us to no more than we committed ourselves to.

The Standard, when writing "repudiates," should have added, quoad hoc. We distinctly declined discussion on any other feature of the Platform than that which we construed as impinging upon religious liberty.

Our Catholic neighbor very well avoids speaking "too favorably" of us. If he has seen no "abuse of Popery" in our columns, it is because we judge other weapons more effective, and have no lack of them—facts, history, reason. Our "views" in relation to the Catholic Church are, that it is a system of doctrinal error and practical corruption. Our "course" has been and will be to throw on it the "light of truth," which is only needed for the people to see it as it is, and abhor it.

Our devotion to religious liberty is shown in claiming it not only for ourselves, but our enemies. Will the Standard and kindred organs do the same for us in countries where Catholics predominate as Protestants do here? They durst not! They fear the light, and cannot risk the contest between truth and error. They lack the charity of soul and the loyalty to right. This is a generous advantage over them.

A correspondent, on the first page, presents a terse, honest and manly statement from his standpoint. Do we hear him say:

"Let agitation begin now; let it continue until through every newspaper, from the largest to the smallest, in the land—through Congressional speeches, through party proclamations, and by every other means, the public are possessed with a knowledge of the facts and principles relating to and entertained by that Church, both as a spiritual and political organization."

That would be an agitation, indeed. The most powerful element, without control, introduced into politics—moral visions, blurred—the controversy complicated and its end put out of sight! The Catholics would take it as a godsend, a reward for the late absurdity of the Immaculate Conception. It is just what they want to build them up. It affords that sort of alliance they must have or decrease in power and importance.

We suggest to our brother C., and all who think with him, that it is highly necessary to the character and success of the controversy between us and the Catholics that it be guarded from all political complication. We know what we say as to its practical effects.

Since our article appeared several facts have transpired corroborating its construction of the first part of the Eighth Article, and justifying our strictures; moreover, indoing the belief that they were not without their influence.

Albert Pike, Esq., writes to the Picayune, 11th inst.:

"The Committee on the Platform, of which I was a member, reported the Eighth Article without the words, (with which it now commences:) 'Resistance to the aggressive policy and corrupting tendencies of the Roman Catholic Church in our country.' As reported, it commanced thus: 'The advancement to all political stations,' &c."

He goes on to show how the invidious words were foisted in, and why they were not got out, and adds:

"I adhered to the order, notwithstanding my objections to that single feature, and for the purpose of aiding in changing it; and I felt certain that it would be changed at the next annual session. I do feel certain of that."

At the great ratification meeting on Lafayette Square last Wednesday night, Mr. Pike is reported in the Delta as saying:

"What is there to offend the most sensitive Catholics, except the first sentence of the eighth section, which I repeat I do not and cannot like?"

The American Convention of Louisiana, which met in New Orleans, last week, formally lays down:

"While we approve of the platform adopted by the late National Council of the American party, at Philadelphia, we reject the application of the principles of the eighth article to American Catholics, as unjust, unfounded, and entirely unworthy of our country. We shall forever continue to protest against any abridgement of religious liberty, holding it as a cardinal maxim that religious faith is a question between each individual and his God. We utterly condemn any attempt to make religious belief a test for political office, and can never affiliate with any party which holds sentiments not in accordance with these."

Those who, with our correspondent, "concur in the spirit of our article, but think we erred in supposing the Eighth Article of the Platform to be contrary to it," will see that we did not err, if a chief framer of that instrument be a judge, and a very large and intelligent State Convention.

May like action obtain everywhere, and the subject be thus disembarrassed. We could not look on in silence while it was being involved and prejudiced. Let our position be understood; and strong and just as is the anti-Catholic feeling in the country, we believe it will be accepted.

Meantime, we were fighting the Roman Catholics before the K. N.'s arose, and expect to continue at it. Pope and Pagan must both die. Let all Christians unite in that.

Church and Pulpit Desecration.

A scene took place on the 26th ult., between two candidates for the Governorship, not becoming a church. One of the parties was in the pulpit.

The words "liar!" "infamous liar!" were passed, and a pistol drawn! The account proceeds:

"By this time the whole house was thrown into confusion. A large crowd surrounded the combatants, and a general fight was prevented. Rev. Mr. P. then interfered, and, with the assistance of others brought the gentlemen to a mutual understanding, and proper explanations were made."

And this was in a church!

For the sake of both the honorable gentlemen concerned, and the parties they represent, we trust the affair was not so bad as described. Such scenes have a very demoralizing effect upon the public.

But to one point we ask attention: How long will those having custody of the houses God permit them to be appropriated to such abuses?

We deem it not superstitious to attach some respect to the place where God's name dwells, where the Bible is expounded, the sacraments administered, and the Church convened.

There is a power in association which not only weak consciences and weak minds feel, but strong ones. It is a principle of our nature, and should be observed to devotion.

Enter that church where the "general fight" was hardly prevented, the next Sabbath. The minister of God is in the pulpit. And from the same place is sent forth sweet water and bitter—blessing and cursing! "My brethren, these things ought not so to be"—James, iii, 10.

Take a hearer who also was a witness of the late scene. What is his frame of mind, his association of thought? Not the most favorable to communion with God. The minister, too, would likely be sensible of not the most desirable circumstances in spreading out the broken body and shed blood there, and calling his flock of both parties around the communion table.

Be it much or little, reasonable or not, this local mingling of holy and profane is unfriendly to the finer sympathies of the soul, to a correct religious sentiment, and to those natural forces which should rather be invoked than violated, even in religion.

It sometimes happens (as it was not in this case) that the church is appropriated to one party and to one side of the discussion. We have known an instance in which a person of the contrary was so much hurt at this as to refuse to worship there till his feelings had abated.

An outside influence presses hard upon those who have the keeping of the house of God. It is even said to be good policy thus to accommodate the public—conciliates—makes the church popular—people will get in the way of going there, and go on Sundays. But politicians, like republics, are ungrateful, and forget these shrewd saints. When Sabbath comes, and one seeks a refuge from worldly scenes and cares, a place to worship God and hear his Word with reverence, he will pass by those churches that have been turned into thoroughfares and market places, and vulgar stamping grounds—the walls yet echoing with "words which man's wisdom teaches," if nothing worse, and the floors reeking with tobacco spit. He will pass by them for one more mindful of its proprieties. There, also, if he have a family, will he prefer to take them.

Centenary College, La.

The Commencement exercises of this institution, as advertised in another column, present a rare treat, and all who can attend there will find their account in doing so. Though the village is small, it is big in hospitality. It has a habit of annual expansion in midsummer, to meet the demands of Commencement. See the standing advertisement on fourth page.

This college was taken under the patronage of the M. E. Church, South, in 1845, and has been constantly growing in importance. It is located in the village of Jackson, about twelve miles from Bayou Sara, in a grove of pine, magnolia, oak and beach, unsurpassed in beauty and magnificence. The location is not only remarkable for its beautiful woodlands, its bland and delightful atmosphere, its pure water and its unrivaled healthfulness, but for the refinement and morality of the inhabitants. The buildings are large commodious and substantial, affording ample room for a large number of students. A new and neat catalogue has just been issued, presenting the following summary:

Juniors	24
Sophomores	39
Freshmen	40
Number in College proper	126
In the Preparatory Department	103
Total	229

The alumni number 98, among whom are some of the most promising men, in every honorable profession, in the South.

A desire of happiness is natural; a desire of holiness is supernatural.

The Creoles of Louisiana.

Rev. B. F. Alexander, writing July 5, orders a supply of Bibles, Testaments and Tracts in the French language, for distribution in the Attakapas portion of the Conference. It is gratifying to see signs of religious life in this field. It is a large and interesting, but hitherto an unyielding one. There, a generation ago, McMahon, and Axley, and other holy men labored, and there Nolley died. Brother Alexander says:

"Prospects are flattering for the conversion of a large number of our Creole population. Some who were baptized by Catholic priests in infancy have joined our Church, and having stood their probation, and proven themselves to be good and true, wish to be received into full connection, but desire baptism at my hands. What is the practice in such cases?"

As to the "practice in such cases," we believe it customary and well founded to respect the previous baptism. Divers irregularities and difficulties would arise from the opposite practice, though we have known it pursued in some exceptional cases without censure. The zeal of new converts, however sincere and generally intelligent, would hardly be the safest guide in such cases.

The Gallic element in the Creole character secures such deference toward all ministers, and polite attention to the religious services even of heretics,(?) that it has often been mistaken by strangers for religious interest, and hopes have been entertained disproportioned to results.

But in this case there has been an actual "probation." They are coming into the Church, as good and true members, and the pastor is using the means to increase and conserve the gracious movement—Bibles in their own tongue and religious tracts. Our Tract Society could do a useful work here. A French preacher could be well employed in the Louisiana Conference. Let every Christian pray for the salvation of these descendants of our ancient population.

LETTER FROM REV. O. FISHER.

San Francisco, California, June 15, 1855.

Dear Brother—You have learned by others of our safe arrival here, and my appointment to this city for this conference year. I have been here nearly two months, have spent a good deal of money, and accomplished but little, for want of a house to preach in. Sometimes I have preached in one place, sometimes in another. Lately I have begun to preach in the State Marine Hospital, to a good congregation, (principally the inmates,) and with some apparent good effect. Many of them, however, are foreigners, and understand not what I say. Some seem very anxious to understand, while others manifest cold indifference. I have found a few Christians here of our own people, and some others penitent; one, an Englishman, in great distress of soul on account of his sins. There are besides these some twenty-five or thirty Southern Methodists in this city—scattered and cold, and yet disposed to hold to the old landmarks. But for want of a house we are doing but little. In this matter we, as a Church, have been singularly unfortunate. We have had two churches, but now have none; and I fear it will be a good while before we get another. I need not tell you the process by which we arrived at this sad state of things. It is so, and we cannot help it. Still we will not distrust Him who is possessor of Heaven and earth, nor limit the Holy One of Israel. We look forward to the time, when we shall have a house, and it filled.

The Church is prospering in the country, and things are brightening a little even in this city.

This will be handed you by Bishop Andrew, who leaves with his wife on the steamship Sierra Nevada for New Orleans, via Nicaragua, to-morrow. The Bishop has traveled extensively over the country, has preached and labored much for a man of his years, and doubtless has been the means of doing a great deal of good. Would that he could remain longer. I have regretted much that he could not preach more for us in this city, for the reason above stated. He will give you the general state of the work in this country.

Please send me the Advocate to this place, and let us have a place in your prayers.

Your brother in Christ,

O. Fisher.

Teach us to Pray.—I was sitting by Coleridge's bedside when he said, "I do not reckon the most solemn faith in God as a real object, the most arduous act of the reason and will. Oh, no! it is to pray as God would have us; this is what at times makes me turn cold to my soul. Believe me, to pray with all your heart and strength, with the reason and the will, to believe vividly that God will listen to your voice, through Christ, and verily do the thing he pleaseth thereupon, this is the last, the greatest achievement of the Christian warfare upon earth: 'Teach us to pray, O Lord!'" And then he burst into a flood of tears and asked me to pray for him. Oh! what a sight was there!

Reunion.—There is something noble in the conduct of the old Heathen who strengthened himself for the conflict with death by the thought of meeting in the Elysian Fields with Homer and Hesiod, and the worthies of his race that had preceded him.

New Publications.

Through J. C. Morgan, an extensive bookseller and stationer, adjoining the Post Office, we have from the publishers, J. P. Jewett & Co., Boston, the following.

Scenes in the Life of Christ—By D. W. Clark.

A parlor volume, of simple yet rich and tasteful appearance. Life scenes are described, with illustrations.

The Sunbeam:

A book for a very neat little girl. Good reading in it.

Ladies' Almanac:

The latest fashion—an almanac, in pincushion or hook shape, in which, besides days of the month, are some queer and pretty fancies.

Missionary Reports.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South.

Prairie Bluff Mission, Ala. Conf.:

This is a new mission; none of the appointments, except one, have ever been served by a missionary.

We number 8 appointments, 135 Church members, including probationers; over 200 children catechised. One has died and four been baptized. Several have made a profession of religion, and others are seeking the pardon of sin. My labor is hard, having to preach four times on the Sabbath twice a month, besides catechizing, meeting class, and riding several miles to reach the appointments. Eleven plantations are served, belonging to gentlemen and ladies of wealth, possessing Christian hearts, who intend to have their negroes instructed in the saving truths of the Bible, and who are able to pay their money for this noble object. This last is not a very unimportant matter, as this new and untried mission did not come in for any appropriation, and as nothing in the way of eatables can he had except at the highest prices. Twenty dollars was kindly handed to us by one of the patrons, being all that has been received up to this time.

We hope to be able at the close of the year to make a good report on all points essential to a good mission. T. Burpo.

Rehoboth, June 20, 1855.

Rev. Smith Cotton.—We notice in the Southern Christian Advocate the death of the venerable Smith Cotton, formerly a resident of this county, but for a number of years residing in Hartford, where he recently died, at the advanced age of eighty-nine years. We suppose him to have been the original owner of the tract of land where the camp ground now stands, as the old meeting-house, long since extinct, was known by the name of Cotton Meeting-House. He was a local preacher of the Methodist Church. We have great veneration for those aged sires who connect the past with the present century.—Georgia Press.

A pious gentleman, who had accumulated much property in successful business, was asked by a clergyman if he had not amassed enough for his family, so that he might retire from business. "O," he replied, "I have not yet made enough to give each of my children a single leaf of the Catechism." "Why," inquired the minister, "how large is your family?" "About six hundred millions," was the reply.

Rapid Rise and Fall of Water in Chicago River.—The Chicago Tribune, of the 28th ult., says: A severe rain storm visited this city yesterday morning, attended with much thunder and lightning. The rain commenced to pour about 7 o'clock, and immediately after it ceased a remarkable fall was observed in Chicago river. At 11 A. M., the fall was 3 feet, 2 10 below medium height; and at 11:20 there was a rise of 5 feet 10 inches; it then alternately fell and rose about 10 inches within the space of 45 minutes. At 12:40 there was another rise, until by the guage the water was 6 feet, 5 10 inches above ordinary or medium stage; and in 20 minutes it fell once more to its usual level. Before 12 the wind was very light from Southwest, and shifted around gradually to South and Southeast. During the continuance of the alternations from high to low, a heavy sea was rolling from the eastward, breaking over the Illinois Central Railroad Company's breakwater, as if a heavy northeaster were blowing. These are the facts; now who will give us an explanation of the phenomena? Do these freaks depend upon some unexplained condition of the atmosphere, upon a water-spout or tornado on the lake, or to some volcanic action not here otherwise observed? Who is ready with an answer? In 1849, we are told by one who was here at the time, a similar rise took place, the greatest effect of which was felt at the mouth of the Calumet, some ten miles south. Then the rise was said to be 9 feet, and the fall very sudden. Several persons who were out on the low grounds in the vicinity, had to run for dear life, so instantaneous was the flood. Only a few days ago (June 16th) we noticed a lesser rise, the water then coming up only 2 feet 6 inches. Who will explain the antics of our frisky Lake Michigan?

The "Oldest Inhabitant."—The editor of the Annapolis Republican has had a visit from one of the oldest men, perhaps, in Maryland, Mr. Richard Crandell, who was born in Anne Arundel county on the 16th of July, 1747, and therefore will be 108 years of age the 16th of this month. He has not the appearance of a man of over 80, and even last fall he sowed nearly all the grain on his farm. He is in enjoyment of most excellent health and spirits; and at one hundred, he says, he had not a grey hair in his head. He served as a privateer during the Revolution, and relates many interesting facts connected with the struggle for American Independence.

Mysterious.—A large elm tree, which began to show symptoms of decay, was chopped down a few days ago, on the farm of Mr. Cozens, in the southern part of Campbell county, Ky., when the skeleton of a woman, with a little dried, shrivelled flesh adhering to the bones, was found in the cleft of the tree, about 20 feet from the ground. The discovery caused a great sensation throughout the neighborhood, but no one remembered of any person having been missed or disappearing from there for many years.

Reception of an Honest Statesman.

We do not consider the reception of an ex-President of the United States, at any foreign court, a matter of unusual consequence, or as affording themes in reference to which American editors should expend any extraordinary amount of writing fluid. Our Presidents have been immeasurably superior in intellect, character, patriotism, and all the elements which constitute the statesman, to the sovereigns of the Old World, who presumptuously arrogate to themselves supreme authority by "right divine." And, when they exercised authority, they did so with a clearer title and a prouder ordonnement than any which ever accompanied the edicts of hereditary law-makers to their millions of enslaved serfs.

What man is there upon any throne in Europe equal to any of our ex-Presidents? Not one. Nicholas, of Russia, was a great man, but he is no more, and the world knows too little of his son to make up an accurate opinion. Louis Napoleon is a man of undoubted intellect, of a certain sort, but has yet to prove himself a statesman. Queen Victoria is an exemplary mother and irreproachable lady, and when that is said, all is said. She is a good woman, but not Elizabath. Glorious old England, stronger and wealthier on land and sea than she ever was, is languishing, being disgraced, defeated and losing her prestige among the nations, simply because there is a deplorable lack of brains among her rulers. She is as a giant, expending her strength in stupid struggles, when one well directed effort would accomplish a thousand times more. But, "there is life in the Old Land yet," and if Victoria does not find a statesman capable of conducting public affairs, the nation will find one for her, and that right speedily. Those who think the grand "Old Land" is going to lose her position among the nations without the most awful struggle the earth has ever known in any period of its history, know little about the unquenchable loyalty and unfailing determination of the English character. As for the other potentates of Europe, we know of no one who has the smallest claim to the appellation of statesmen. There may be great men among them, and if so, the next few months or years will demonstrate the fact.

But there are circumstances connected with receptions at foreign courts, which, if not of any great importance in themselves, possess a more than ordinary significance, showing, as they do, the striking change going on across the water, together with the marked respect which is being everywhere displayed towards true republican greatness and honesty, and real American republicanism. The reception of Millard Fillmore at the Court of St. James is a practical exemplification of these observations. In regard to this, the London Court Journal, of the 15th ult., has the following:

"The presence of an ex-President of the United States at our court is an event which deserves a passing note. Mr. Fillmore looks even a younger man than Mr. Buchanan, the American minister; his hair is not so white, nor is there any appearance of baldness; he seems apparently about fifty-eight; is smaller in stature than the minister, but with as handsome and intellectual a countenance. It is amusing to see the sang froid with which the former chief of this powerful government is treated by the officers of one of his successors. The republican principle in this matter is no fiction, and the ex-President is really and actually become nothing more than an American citizen. Mr. Fillmore has, however, been received with much consideration at court, and with great distinction by the ministers. At the brilliant assemblies of Viscountess Palmerston and the Countess of Clarendon there is no doubt the ex-President will be the personage of the day.

"When presented to her Majesty, Mr. Fillmore wore a plain full dress suit. Abbott Lawrence, Jr., and wife, and Henry E. Davies, of New York, were also presented to the Queen.

"The London Globe denies a rumor that a congress of United States ministers is to be held in London, and says that Mr. Fillmore is simply there en voyageur."

A few years since receptions at foreign courts were exceedingly difficult to obtain; and even our Ministers, Chargés, Consuls, etc., were compelled to present themselves in costumes which were but a poor improvement upon the dress of stage coarous riders. Without they were bespangled, bedizzened and covered over with lace and embroidery, presentation was out of the question. Now, however, all are presentable in plain dress, and are respected correspondingly with their position and deportment.

It will be seen, from the Court Journal, that Mr. Fillmore, when presented, "wore a plain, full dress suit." This was becoming and proper.

The Gold Mines on the Upper Arkansas. The St. Louis Intelligencer, of the 4th inst., says:

A letter to the Warsaw Democrat, from Richard Jones, at Empire Hill, Ouachita Mountains, the locality of the newly discovered gold mines west of Arkansas, speaks favorably of the quantity of yellow metal there. The gold is said to be confined to the Ouachita Mountains. Richard Jones has averaged from eight to sixteen dollars per day at surface digging, no deep and thorough work having yet been done. The emigration is increasing, and no attack from the Indians has taken place, though constantly apprehended.

Singular Death.—A son of Samual Whittaker, of this town, aged six or seven years, while in the woods hunting with his playfellows, a few days since, was gazing up into a tree, when some substance, probably a poisonous insect, fell in his mouth and lodged somewhere in the throat. The boy immediately complained of pain and sickness, yet nothing was thought of it by his parents, until a day or two afterwards symptoms of very serious inflammation of the throat exhibited themselves, when a physician was sent for. The child expired on Saturday morning last. A post-mortem examination was made, which revealed extensive inflammation and suppuration, which they attributed to some species of poison lodging in the larnyx.—Medina (N. Y.) Whig.

The Dillon Case.—We have satisfied ourself that the pother with newspapers over the condition of the questions arising out of the Dillon affair, between our Minister in Paris and the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, is all gammon. That is, the correspondence between the two Governments on the subject has so far been of the most friendly character, and that there exists no likelihood whatever of the least misunderstanding to grow out of it. All stories or rumors to the contrary, whether emanating from Paris or Washington, are unworthy of credit. This may be relied on, as it embodies the firm belief in the premises of all the representatives of foreign governments here. [Wash. Star.

There is now a continuous line of railway from St. Louis to Baltimore. The whole route through from Baltimore to St. Louis by this route is but 968 miles long, and may be traveled over in some forty-two hours' running time, while the distance to Philadelphia is sixty-three miles greater, and to New York of course is still eighty-seven miles further, while the old route, via Chicago and the lake roads, from St. Louis to New York imposes one hundred and thirty-one miles more of travel than the new one. This, then, it would appear, is the shortest approach from St. Louis to the Atlantic.

An Interesting Plea.—The New York Knickerbocker Magazine tells the following: "Speaking of "little folks," we have them at our house, Frank three years old, and Ada, one. They have a very kind and indulgent mother, and persuasions and rewards, in the shape of bons-bons, frequently take the place of the more severe discipline that once was considered indispensable. Ada was a "little out of sorts" one day, and crying lustily; her mother, handing her a cake said, "Take this, and stop your crying." Frank, who had been playing merrily a moment before, suddenly burst into a terrible fit of grief: "Mamma, give me a piece of cake to stop my crying!"

Peace Guarantees.

The London Times, not long since, in course of an elaborate article, gave utterance to the following, which is remarkable for amount of wholesome truth and sound philosophy it contains within a very brief compass:

"When we see a flake of cotton from Alabama, a piece of Manchester, we can perfectly comprehend that France and the United States had better avoid hostilities."

An important admission, for the time make, when speaking of this country. years since, and quite a different tone have been held. The "Thunderer of the would have seen little significance in "a flake of wine from Bordeaux," and none at all in have pointed to the "piece of chintz from Manchester," as the only article of the moment in the catalogue. But circumstances have changed, times have altered, and with alteration of the times, the Times has discovered that there are, at this time, other nations and governments upon earth besides Britain upon the products of which and the commerce with which, her strength, wealth and power will materially depend for all coming time. Hence the remarkable change that has come over the Times.

Probably the Times, by its overweening presumptuous arrogance, its scornful haughtiness, when alluding to the United States, has done more to enlist whatever sympathy there may be in the country for the cause of Russia in the present war, than all of the journals of Great Britain combined. The position of the Times as the head of the newspaper press; the prestige of the mighty influence it has exercised, and the exercise, over the ruling classes of Europe, have caused it to be regarded as a reliable exponent of the Government and the people. Consequently, the derision and disdain too often manifested by this powerful journal towards this Union and its institutions, have sometimes embittered feelings among thousands, who, withstanding the oppressions and insults practiced upon us in our infancy, could not, without a heartfelt pang, the star of "the nursing mother" pale and disappear from the galaxy of nations.

But, as the Times is evidently improving in taste and good manners, and these generally superinduce friendship, we think we ought not to scold or rail at the "old mother" for her past short-comings, at least not now, when she has fully as much on her hands as she can attend to. In the first place, it would not be fair; the second, it would savor of treason to our country. And in the third, if the grand "Old Land" is to be whipped at all, the United States is the only country that has a right, or knows how, to "put her through" that interesting operation in a proper manner.

The extract of the Times tacitly advocating the proposition, for introducing which we have more than once ridiculed by those whose intelligence should have taught them better, who were, nevertheless, totally ignorant of realities—practicabilities would be a better word—of the present. The proposition was, and we propose to illustrate it by the very extract from the London Times, given above. That England could not be driven to a war with the United States without the last disgrace about being inflicted on her character as a nation. She could get along without "a sample of wine from Bordeaux," without "a faring material inconvenience, but that "a piece of chintz from Manchester" would have to be seen the light of day but for the "flakes of cotton" from the bounteous fields of the South. United States! These "flakes of cotton" are more valuable to her than everything else; could not get along without them. They constitute the substratum of her strength; the life blood of her manufacturing system, in all its departments, and give vitality, prosperity and advantage to all of her sources of wealth and power, industrial, agricultural, commercial, financial and marine. What would England were her supply of cotton cut off for a single year? What would become of her financial, commercial enpremacy? of her vast manufacturing interests? of her manufacturers and merchants? and, above all, how could she support the hundreds of thousands, aye, millions of laboring operatives, male and female, who draw their subsistance, directly and indirectly, from the manufacture of cotton? We need not attempt to illustrate the consequences. They are obvious to every intelligent mind. Why, England would sooner undertake the capture of a dozen Sebastopols than be without cotton six months!

So far as this country is concerned, we can progress without much real damage if we could see a "sample of wine from Bourdeaux," and a "piece of chintz from Manchester." We have first-rate wine ourselves, and manufacture as good chintz as our transatlantic neighbors. And put us upon our mettle, and we would soon surpass all competitors in the production of both. Therefore, the fiat being accepted, the argument is legitimate that, if we could get along, after a fashion, without England and France, England and France could not get along without us under any circumstances. The enumerated products of the Times demonstrates that our great neighbor has the water stand more in need of peace with us than we do with them.

Therefore we conclude that "peace guarantees" are sufficiently ample and binding to warrant the expression of opinion that the day is far distant when the stars and stripes, the cross of St. George and the lillies of France, will defiance at each other either on land or sea.

The Leaning Tower at Pisa.—The Leaning Tower was still there, and it certainly is more, or at least more appreciably, than pictures represent. This curiosity of architecture is, perhaps, better known than any to persons who have never traveled, not one out of a hundred, to whom the Tower of Pisa is familiar by name, can tell what purpose it was built. It is nothing in the world but the belfry of the Cathedral, by its side it stands, and from which it is separated by a road. The ancient system was to make separate constructions of the church and bell-tower. The moderns have improved on this plan, by clapping the spire on the top of the edifice to which it belongs. The whole mass of the tall Campanile of Pisa is accomplished when a couple of ropes are carried up by the chime, which swings at the summit. The entirely hollow and cylindrical, the walls being just thick enough to admit of a winding staircase. The top is, as dangerous a place as ever one remember to have seen, and I doubt whether a person of any disposition to giddiness could get safely round the exterior edge, unprotected as it is by railing or balustrade.

The St. Mary's Ship Canal.—The Canal, connecting the Lower Lakes with Lake Superior, is now in the full tide of success. It is reported to be one of the best constructed and most magnificent public structures ever erected in this or any other country. It has opened to the Eastern States a region of territory whose undeveloped resources must be estimated by millions. It is to the Superior country what the opening of the Erie Canal was to the Empire State country. The greatest enthusiasm prevails along the shore with reference to it, and the people feel themselves several days nearer to each than they have ever done before.

Marriages.

On 19th June, by Rev. John G. Rush, Rev. Francis Walker, of the Alahama Conference, to Miss Eliza Ann Simison, of Mount Vernon, Ala.

Deaths.

Died—In Bossier parish, La., June 9, Rev. John H. Bussy, in the sixty-first year of his life.

He was born in Fairfield District, S. C., in 1794, lived in Alahama and Mississippi respectively, and removed from the latter State to Louisiana in 1851.

Though in early life he was destitute of religious training, he was nevertheless the subject of pungent conviction. In his 28th year he professed religion at Hopewell camp ground, Miss. The evidence was to him indubitable, and so marked and palpable the change, that it appeared he never doubted it. He was often heard to express himself with such assurance, testifying that he was sealed with the Spirit of promise, the earnest of his acceptance.

He soon felt himself constrained to "testify the gospel of the grace of God" to sinners, and he preached the Word with signs following, God hearing testimony to the word of his grace.

It appears that he labored with zeal and success both in Alahama and Mississippi, and surely his labore have not fallen to the ground in this State.

What may have been his distinguishing merit in former life as a minister, from no acquaintance, we cannot say; but for the time that we have heard him, we are bound in accord to him the predominant character istic of a burning zeal and a fervid charity. We do do not claim for him an unsullied or immaculate life, but we think that his peccadilloes sprung not from the malevolence of heart, but from a strong and heated temperament. But let this be as it may, we can with pleasure and confidence proclaim for him a happy end.

With pleasurable emotions we remember the time of his visit to church at Cross-roads. There was a strange coincidence between his case and the text. He was invited to close the exercises. Pending the delivery of the sermon, he was the most of the time upon his knees in the pulpit. Feeling himself superior to his pain, he delivered a warm and his last exhortation. He manifested himself, in the language of the text, to be fully able to go over and possess the land. As to the time the camp might be struck was a matter of trifling indifference to him, whether in two or six weeks, so that he might be found ready and watching.

So great and overpowering were his transports that he could not conveniently drive himself home. He immediately took to his bed, and from it never recovered. He manifested much patience and acquiescence in his infirmities. Visiting him four weeks afterwards, in company with Dr. Young, he deliberately talked of his anticipated change until after prayer, when the was brought upon the wings of his love. He was carried above all pain and temptation and pain. He suffered and triumphed for the next two weeks, when he came enough, at the consummation of his prescribed time, the camp was struck, the pillar of fire with his priest moved in front, and he passed over Jordan dryshod. He had left his house in order, designated the place of burial, the person to preach his funeral, paid the quarterage, and thus calmly awaited the time. His physicians complained that he would kill himself shouting; but as long as he had breath he would praise and cry in death, "Behold the Lamb!"

Thus he died as sets the morning star,
Which goes not down behind the darkened west,
Nor hits obscure in the tempest of the sky,
But melts and dies away in the light of Heaven.

B. J. Hamilton.

Died—In Greene county, (near Clinton,) Ala., June 20, Eliza M. Waan, wife of John W. Richardson. She was a native of North Carolina, though for some ten years she had lived in Alabama. A modest, unassuming deportment, an affectionate and gentle disposition, and an uniform desire to promote the comfort and happiness of her friends, endeared her more especially to those who best knew her many estimable qualities.

For more than twenty years she was a consistent member of the M. E. Church, and her adherence to its doctrines, forms and tenets, was strict and unwavering. Hers was an unaffected, constant piety, a religion of principle, a firm and steadfast faith. In her daily walk and conversation she ever, in an eminent degree, exemplified that spirit of genuine Christianity which commends itself to the credence of the world, and her life was one of decided usefulness, both in the domestic circle and the Church.

Many ministers of the gospel, when they read this brief notice of one whose kindly sympathy and cordial hospitality they have often shared, will regret that one so lovely in character and useful to the world should have been thus early removed.

At the commencement of her illness she was often heard agonizing in prayer for entire resignation to the divine will, and for supporting grace in the last dread conflict; and that prayer was answered, for though life was sweet to her, and her affections lingered with him to whom she had but a few months before united her destiny, she was enabled to say, "Thy will be done." To the friend who pens this article, one who had for years sympathized in her spiritual joys and sorrows but had not lately enjoyed her society, till the last hour of her life, she said, in reply to the remark, "You are almost home," "Yes, a bruised reed he will not break. My Father does all well; not a cloud rests on my mind, all is bright;" and thus, while gleams of rapture irradiated that pallid face, she continued to bear witness to the truth so beautifully expressed by the psalmist, "Though I walk through the valley and shadow of death, thy rod and thy staff they comfort me," till her spirit passed without a struggle into the realms of bliss. For some moments a solemn stillness rested upon those at her bedside, as if listening to catch the welcoming voices, that were greeting her in the spirit land, for how could we then weep for one who had so peacefully entered "The bowers that are green and fair,

In the light of that summer shore
And we know that the friends we have lost are there,
They are there, and they weep no more."

J. B. C.

Mrs. Margaret Clement, daughter of John and Rosa Montgomery, was born Nov. 8, 1779, in the State of Pennsylvania, and died in Greene county, Ala., June 13, 1855, aged nearly 76 years.

In early life, with her parents, she moved to Spartanburg District, S. C., where she was principally raised. December 22, 1800, she was united in marriage to Capt. Edward Clement, whom she survived about fifteen years. September 5, 1805, they both joined the M. E. Church. In 1818 she emigrated with her husband and family to Alahama, and settled in Bibb county. From thence, in 1820, to Greensboro' Greene county, Ala., where her house (there being no church in the village) was used for divine worship. She was one of the few who composed the first class organized in that place. Many have been the ministers of the gospel who have shared the hospitalities of her house, and whose names were indelibly written upon her memory's page. Always glad was she when an opportunity afforded itself of entertaining those messengers of peace and salvation.

In her general disposition quiet and retired, in her religious feelings sedate and unobtrusive, a great lover of Methodism and its usages.

In the latter part of her life, for several years, from feeble health, she had been almost entirely debarred the privilege of attending the sanctuary. But these things never caused her to complain. She could and did regret, but complain, never.

Thus it was she lived, and thus she silently, sweetly, and without a struggle or a groan, fell asleep in Jesus, after having been nearly half a century in the service of her Master.

Mother, fare thee well! Thy children beyond the flood have already hailed thee blessed on the other shore—those thou hast left behind "sorrow not as those who have no hope." For as we stood around thy cold and lifeless corpse, we thought of thy religious life and the hope set before us in the gospel that in the resurrection morn we shall meet again. May it be to all thy family one to everlasting life.

J. A. C.

Died—On the 20th June, near the town of Bastrop, La., Mrs. Sallie J. Hall, daughter of Nathan and Lucinda Mansfield, and wife of Dixon Hall, Jr.

She was born in Yazoo county, Mississippi, on the 27th of October, 1836. She joined the M. E. Church the last of October, 1854. From that time she seemed fixed in her purpose to be a Christian, though she had not made a public profession of religion up to her last illness.

When informed by her physician that she must die, she seemed to lose sight of the things of earth, and spent the remainder of her existence in exhorting her husband and friends to meet her in Heaven.

She day before she died she said to her sister-in-law, "Fannie, it seems to me that angels are here." The last expression I had from her was, that "all is well."

General Intelligence.

Later from Texas.

By the arrival on Saturday last of the steamship Chas. Morgan, Capt. Place, we have received dates from Galveston to the 4th, and files of papers from interior Texas. We find very little news. The proprietors of the Galveston Journal and Texas Times have joined their offices and commenced the publication of a paper called "The Confederate," in place of the two former. It will advocate the principles of the American party.

The Galveston Civilian says:

Before his execution, Shultz made a full confession to Lewis M. H. Washington, Esq., who designs publishing it, with two accurate likenesses of the murderer, one taken in the prison and the other on the gallows, in New York this summer. He confessed to having killed Col. Teal, of Texana, in 1837, Green, in Gonzales county, in 1841, Bateman and Lott, (for which he was hung,) and divers others in other States. He gave his real name as Jesse Hamilton Shultz, and Indiana as his native State. Mr. Washington will portray his dreadful career in all its details.

The senior editor of the Houston Telegraph returned home on the 28th ultimo, from a visit to the country in behalf of the Houston Railroad. He brings assurances of getting up stock to the amount of $200,000—enough to enable the Company to proceed at once with the next section of the road. He raised between $80,000 and $40,000, in two neighborhoods, in neither of which the canvass is completed.

The grading on the Houston Railroad is nearly completed on the first section of 25 miles, the ties are being delivered, and the work generally is in a state of forwardness that will enable the contractor to complete it before the time required by his contract. Messrs. Jas. W. Burke & Co. have about 175 hands employed on the earth work, bridges and culverts, and in getting out ties, etc. There are besides several subcontractors for timber, on which between 50 and 100 hands are employed. The work of laying down the iron will commence in a few days.

Up to the 27th ult., there had been 39,555 bales of cotton received in the warehouses of Houston, since the first of September last. In addition to the above, the receipts on the wharf have been from 3,000 to 5,000 bales. The amount received at that place last year was less than 20,000 bales. The crop of last year now coming forward, says the Telegraph, was fully one-third short of an average yield; and had it been an average one, the total receipts of this year by the first of September, would not have been less than 75,000 bales. The crop from the upper counties is just coming forward, and the receipts are fully as heavy now, in the beginning of July, as they were in April last. The total receipts for the year ending September next, instead of stopping at 40,000 bales, as estimated by us some weeks since, will overrun 56,000 bales.

The Austin State Times says:

It is reported that the Indians stole horses from a ranch near Castroville, and also from the town, in the early part of the present week. Accounts of depredations are quite frequent on the frontier west of the Colorado.

An expedition was fitted out by citizens living on the Blanco and Guadalupe rivers. It is the intention of the party to follow the trail of the next band of savages who make a descent upon them, until they find them. Edward Burleson will accompany the expedition, provided it is well armed, mounted and provisioned for thirty days. He is an experienced Indian fighter. Something must be done to protect the frontier from the incursions of the Indians, else the settlements on the upper Blanco and Guadalupe will be broken up. The citizens must look to themselves for protection. The disposition of the U. S. troops prevents intelligence from reaching them in time to strike a blow at a party of marauders upon those streams.

Weather and Crops.—The Calcasieu Press of the 30th says:

Since our last issue we have been favored with several copious showers of rain, but we are sorry to learn that our friends in some parts of the parish have not participated with us in these aqueous luxuries. The crops notwithstanding are said to be quite promising, more especially those in our immediate vicinity, which under any thing like favorable circumstances for the remainder of the season, must turn out a greater yield than we have had for either of the two preceding years.

We are pleased to see that our village friends have such quantities of vegetables in their gardens. We notice also that their little foresia of orange trees have resumed their pristine vigor of color, and are now spreading forth their branches with genuine down-easter verdancy.

The Opelousas Patriot, of the 30th, says:

It rains now almost daily, and vegetation is springing forth like magic. Soon we expect to hear Enough—hold, hold! Should the rains continue, our ponds and coulees will soon be filled up, and the country once more assume a natural appearance. The health of our town, as also that of the other towns and villages in the parish, and the country generally, is remarkably good.

Russian Literature, Antiquities, etc.—The Smithsonian Institution has just received, in exchange for its own publications, a magnificent donation from the Russian Imperial Public Library of St. Petersburg, consisting of five large folio volumes of plates and one of text, illustrating the manners, customs, habits and antiquities of the Russians. The plates are elegantly illuminated, and the whole work is finished in the highest style of art. There are portraits of the Czars, together with minute representations of the royal apparel, equipage, armor, etc.; the thrones of gold, silver and ivory; coats of mail, instruments of war, style of dress in different countries, fac similes of inscriptions on ancient monuments, etc. The text is in Russian, and the curious will be interested in examining this rare and valuable work. There are also two large folio volumes of the Musee de Tzarskoe selo ou collection d'armes de sa majeste L'Empereur de toutes les Russies, with one hundred and eighty plates. These contain representations of the oriental arms in possession of Russia, and the collection in this museum is said to be unequalled. There are more than five hundred Arabian, Turkish and Persian inscriptions, translated by the ablest Russian scholars. [Washington Star.

The Mammoth Floating Dock in New York. The new dock took up the Bay State steamer on Saturday, and can be now seen in operation at Greenpoint, opposite the Tenth street ferry. This great structure is 100 feet in width, 325 feet in length without gates, so as to take in vessels of still greater length, and 45 feet in height. It has about 80 cross-wire trusses, forming at their apexes, about nine feet of depth of solid oak, with some six or eight heavy kelsons, two gigantic trusses 38 feet high, extending the whole length of the dock, and tied together by nearly 100 diagonal bolts each over two inches in diameter, some 45 feet long—and in addition, a complete and large system of diagonal iron tracing on each side, composed of about 300 straps, each 4½ inches wide, and nearly 40 long, bolted and riveted at the crossings. The trial has abundantly proved the strength and stiffness of this vast structure, its capacity to lift immense weights, and its entire and safe manageability. [Express.

An election in Cincinnati, for a Justice, has resulted in the choice of the American candidate. The whole city voted, and there were four candidates in the field. Clark, the American candidate, polled 2740 votes against 2040 for all others. At the same time a vote was taken on a proposition for a loan of $50,000 to the city Water Works, which was carried by a large majority.

A very heavy fall of rain, says the Mobile Register, accompanied by a hard wind, passed over our city and vicinity on Friday night—or rather, Saturday morning, about three o'clock. We understand it has done a good deal of injury to the crops of corn, by blowing down and breaking off stocks—and has damaged gardens and fields, which were at all rolling, by washing them into gullies and carrying off the soil.

Later from the Plains—Fort Laramie not Attacked.—A letter to the St. Louis Republican, dated Whitehead, Kansas Territory, June 28, says:

I am happy to inform you that the report I wrote you about the condition of things upon the Plains, and which was brought in by a man claiming to be an express, was entirely untrue. He proved to be a fellow named Haines, a miserable arrant coward, who became alarmed at a point near Laramie, by the approach of some Sioux hunters, and left his party and fled back to the States—his fears lending him speed, and raising before his imagination visions of bloody and hurling in his ears savage yells. When he reached Ash Hollow, Messrs. Nave and McCord had just had a stampede of their cattle, which they wished him to assist them to recover; but no—insisting that the Indians had stolen them, and would soon take the scalps of all the party, he hurried away and reported that a large band of Indians had taken Laramie and robbed Nave & McCord, and were in a state of open and desperate warfare.

Messrs. Kinkead & Co. have arrived from Salt Lake and bring information that Laramie has not even been attacked, and that Nave & McCord had, with the assistance of the Indians, recovered their cattle, and that Mr. John Kerr, of St. Joseph, Mo., and other travelers and traders, for whom their friends felt keen anxieties, were getting along well. The Indians are not only peaceable but kind; so that all the hubbub that has been raised about the war upon the Plains was the result of distempered brains which gave birth to distorted and exaggerated reports. There is nothing of it, nor will there be, unless there are superlunching causes which we cannot now anticipate. The Indians are anxious for peace and desire our friendship.

Fierce Conflict.—The Ashville (Va.) Spectator states that the late visit of Bailey & Co.'s Circus to that place, was attended with something of a speck of war. A difficulty arose between the heads of the Company and some countrymen from Madison, which resulted finally in a general skirmish, some sixty persons being engaged. One man had an arm broken, another was shot through the head, a number were seriously bruised with rocks, and it is said one man was entirely missing at the last accounts. After a long and bloody affray, peace was at last restored. But the Madisonians, it seems, were not content with the termination of affairs. So, early in the morning, they proceeded in force up the river some three miles, where they took a strong position on the opposite bank commanding the road, and patiently awaited the approach of the enemy. He soon appears, his advanced guard consisting of the elephant and his keeper. A brisk fire is opened upon it, the keeper is slightly wounded, and his horse (a very valuable one) is killed. Sixteen shots were fired upon the different wagons as they passed—several horses were wounded, but fortunately nobody was killed. A legal investigation before magistrates of this place, resulted in a dismissal of the showman upon the payment of all costs and damages, which were not inconsiderable.

Our Institutions.—A friend who was in Baltimore on Wednesday night last, described an occurrence at Barnum's, which goes so far towards illustrating the true character of our institutions that we cannot help repeating it here. It will be recollected that the President left this city on that afternoon with his wife, who is an invalid, for Cape May. Resting in Baltimore that night, and having arrived there without previous announcement and unattended, he was seen around the hotel conducting himself in all respects as quietly and unobtrusively as though he were some Western merchant just arrived per railroad. Our friend, who had fallen into conversation with a travelling foreign gentleman, recently arrived in the United States, incidentally took occasion to point out, the unassuming fellow-traveler, who was asking at the office for a sheet of writing paper, as the President of the United States. The foreigner stared and turned pale with astonishment, and after contemplating the President so engaged, and quietly taking his turn to be attended to among half a dozen guests of the house who were standing near him—exclaimed: "Mine God! mine God! I see it all—I see it all;" meaning, evidently, that the sight before his eyes had enlightened him instantly, as it were, upon the philosophy of the institutions of the United States. Capturing a Sonosier.—It is related in the English papers received by the Atlantic, that a Yorkshire nightingale, having located itself in the quiet valley to the right of Beresford Hill, it soon became known around the neighborhood, and hundreds of persons, especially from Barnsley, went nightly to hear its song, which was so fine that numbers walked the footpaths and fields the whole of the night, and as early as three o'clock in the morning warm beds were forsaken by hundreds of married and single, old maids and bachelors, to go to hear the nightingale. At last the visitors became so numerous, and the damage so great to the crops and fences, by being trampled and broken down, that it was found necessary to snare the bird.

A Cave Adventure.—A correspondent of the Bedford Standard relates the adventures of a party who went on an expedition into Hammer's Cave, near Mitchell, Ind. The bottom of the cave is covered with water, in some places very deep. The party entered in a boat, and when about three-quarters of a mile from the entrance, they found their boat sinking, and in the confusion they lost their candles. In perfect darkness, the boat rapidly going down, and the sides of the cave being of perpendicular rock, the party were in anything but an enviable position. After standing in the cold water up to their chins for some time, some persons in another boat came to their relief and rescued them.

The Postmaster General has announced that enclosed circulars, or other printed matter in envelopes upon which is printed, impressed or written, the name, etc., of the person or persons issuing such circular, not only subjects the package to letter postage, but that it must also be prepaid, in the failure to do which, it will go to the dead letter office. This is a most grateful regulation to newspaper publishers, who are continually receiving some humbugging advertisements with the privilege of paying a cent for the receipt of it.

Use Copperas.—The papers are every where urging the free use of copperas as a disinfecting agent. It is a cheap article, costing only three cents per pound, and can be found at the druggists and many of the larger grocery stores. A couple of pounds may be dissolved in ten quarts of water, and the solution poured into sinks, gutters, cesspools and all other filthy places, with good effect. We advise all housekeepers to purchase five, ten, or fifteen pounds, and make a free use of it as above recommended. Cholera or no cholera, their dwelling and out-buildings will contain a purer atmosphere after the use of copperas.

We learn from the Indianapolis Journal, that a locomotive descending the inclined plane near Madison, Indiana, a few days ago, in consequence of the dampness of the track, got beyond control of the brakes and went down the plane with fearful velocity. When within a hundred yards of a freight train which was standing on the track, the engineer, Samuel Idler, and the fireman, Thomas Bizetto, took a desperate leap for life from the flying engine. Mr. Idler was dashed against a switch-signal and instantly killed. Mr. Bizetto struck the ground and instantly expired. Mr. E. J. Robinson, a clerk of the Company, who was on the engine, clung to it, and by the collision with the freight train, was shockingly mangled, though yet living.

On the 30th ult., a tremendous storm of wind, rain and hail, occurred at Evansville, Indiana, blowing down two large new brick stores, which crushed and destroyed two other buildings in their fall. Two men who were at work in the third story of one of the stores were taken out of the ruins, badly hurt. Several houses were unroofed and otherwise injured in different parts of the city.

LATER FROM CALIFORNIA
— And from the Isthmus.

OPERATIONS OF WALKER

The Kinney Expedition heard from.

We understand that on application to the Governor Hebert an order was obtained releasing the Prometheus from quarantine detention for the present, and she reached the city Sunday afternoon. We are indebted to her gentlemanly purser, Dr. Russell, for the following memoranda:

The steamship Prometheus, Capt. Henry Churchill, left New Orleans June 22d, and arrived at San Juan del Norte on the 28th.

Sunday, July 1st, receiving California passengers from the Sierra Nevada. She left the harbor at night and arrived at the Belize in four days and twelve hours from San Juan.

The Northern Light, for New York, had 400 passengers and $823,000 on freight.

Walker's Band had arrived at San Juan del Sur, and is reported to have possession of Rivas on the Lake, and to have made considerable accession to his command. The hostile parties in the interior at the last accounts were still in action. The English mail steamer Clyde, H. M. ship of war Buzzard, Com. Dobbs, schooner Paneme and Italian brig Guiseppe were the only vessels in port when the Prometheus sailed.

The crew of a Coru Island fruit vessel assert that they saw Col. Kinney's party a few days since, and supplied them with fruit.

At 8 A. M July 3d, in lat. 16 45 north, and lon 82, 25 west, saw the steamship El Dorado steering for Cape Catoche.

The news by this arrival reaches to the 16th from San Francisco, sixteen days later than previously received.

We find the following summary of events in the San Francisco Citizen:

The news from the interior, as expressed by correspondents and exchanges, indicates the increasing strength of the American party, far beyond all expectation. The so called "Freedom's Platform" here, it is said, disbanded their forces, and will act with the remnant of the Democratic party in opposition to Americans. The large counties, El Dorado, Yuba, Placer, Nevada, Tuolumne, Calaveras, Santa Clara, Sierra, Sacramento, and other counties which have elected Know-Nothing Supervisors, promise large majorities for our ticket.

The coming State election excites considerable attention throughout the country, and each party seems sanguine of success. The Democratic Convention meets on the 27th inst. Elections for delegates are to be holden on the 16th (to-day.) Their candidates for governor are R. B. Washington and John Bigler. The papers heretofore classed as anti-Broderick, are hemming away at Bigler, while Col. Washington is trav rsing the state electioneering for himself. "It is a pretty quarrel as it stands."

Auburn has been destroyed by fire a second time. The total loss is estimated at $40,000. The origin of the conflagration is not known. About one hundred buildings were burned; one life was lost.

The Supreme Court on the 11th, heard an argument on an appeal in relation to the transfer of cases involving the settlement of Adam's & Co.'s affairs, from executory courts to San Francisco District. No decision has yet been given.

The mining news is favorable. Several new leads have been struck, and operations generally have resulted successfully. We have published in our columns many valuable statistics of quarts mills, and will soon present our readers with a compendium of the labor and product of the various quarts mills throughout the State. The northern mines continue as rich as ever. We have no news from the Kern river district, which is now considered a base humbug.

A party of troops have been dispatched from Fort Miller in pursuit of some troublesome Indians on the Fresno. A difficulty had occurred between them and the whites, caused by the hanging of an Indian for shooting a Mexican. There was a report that a Mr. Head, wife and two children, had been murdered by them. A guessed out break is expected.

A man named Geo. Fairbanks, of Indiana, was seriously, and it is feared, mortally injured by falling off the bank in Cedar Ravine, Jolaby Placerville. Another miner was killed in Todd's valley under similar circumstances.

A law prohibiting Sunday amusements, and suppressing gambling throughout the State, has taken effect, and is everywhere observed as conducive to public morals. In the principal cities all the gambling shops have been closed, and the buildings converted into more respectable places.

The Common Council of Sacramento having passed an ordinance prohibiting newsboys from selling Atlantic papers without paying a heavy license, a troop of these were arrested, their papers taken away and discharged. The papers condemn the move in severe terms.

A tunnel on Michigan Flat caved in on the 1st inst., and horribly crushed Messrs. Hill, of Illinois, and Tingley, of Ohio, in a shocking manner. A Mr. Cardwell, when dug out, was found dead.

The wheat crop in the southern portion of the State has proved a failure. It has been ruined by the rust and grasshoppers. Other grains have turned out well. The Mormon settlement at San Bernardino, has suffered severely from this result, over 4000 acres having been destroyed or rendered useless.

The Los Angeles papers say the notorious Brown and a party of horse thieves, of which he is supposed to be the head, had been hung by the people of Tejon. They had stolen some horses, and were pursued and captured.

Robert H. Hutchison, a pioneer resident of this State, and sheriff of Yuba county for several years, is dead.

The effects of Adams & Co., in Shasta county, have been sold by order of the County Court.

A man named Menga was murdered near Monte Diablo, on the 7th inst., by Miguel Gallosa. The murderer has not been arrested.

Great excitement has been caused among a large class of citizens by the consummation of what is known as the Bolton and Barron claim, embracing a valuable tract of land already settled upon, three square leagues in extent. Several meetings of the settlers have been held, and resolutions adopted to appeal from the decision of the Land Commission on grounds of the unconstitutionality of the Commission itself. Measures have been taken to form a Settler's League throughout the State, with a view of exercising a controlling influence at the coming State election. A memorial has been circulated for signatures, requesting President Pierce to remove Commissioners Farwell and Thompson. The excitement continues.

A four-murder was committed at the Mission Dolores. Two suspicious characters were suspected of a burglary committed on the night of the 21 inst. The next day Mr. Joseph B. West, in company with two friends, approached the house, and the two men (Joseph Marion and John Brace) raised a rifle and revolver and fired at West, killing him almost instantly. They then fled, while West's friends saw him safe on the way to the city, pursued his murderers. The next day it was discovered the villains had crossed the bay. The same morning Marion was overtaken, and committed suicide by shooting himself. Brace escaped in a wheat field and has not been found.

The returns of the recent elections have been canvassed by the Board of Aldermen, and do not alter the result first announced. The majorities given, (though frauds in the Sixth Ward,) are as follows: Mayor, 55; Comptroller, 111; Marshal—(K. N.) 15; Tax Collector, (K. N.) 414; Street Commissioner, 310; Harbor Master, 142; Attorney, (K. N.) 67; Treasurer, 83; Clerk Superior Court, (K. N.) 213. The Common Council is equally divided. Two sets of returns were presented from the Fourth Ward, but did not change the result.

A cargo of rails, cars, locomotives, etc., for the Sacramento Valley railroad, arrived on the Winged Racer on the 4th inst. A shipment has been made to Sacramento.

Three persons have been convicted of illegal voting and perjury on the 28th ult. Their names are James Mafferty, Peter McKinney and James Vehle. Each was punished to the utmost extent of the law, but the cases have been appealed.

A destructive fire occurred on the morning of the 13th. It broke out in a house on Jackson street, occupied by a Mexican woman named Eleanora, and burned nearly a whole block. Two brick buildings were nearly destroyed. The center of the block bounded by Jackson, Dupont, Stout's Alley and Washington street, was burned. The houses were generally occupied by Mexicans, Chinese and French prostitutes. Loss about $40 000. An accident occurred to the Pennsylvania and Monumental engines, by which two men, named Illnes and Garwin were badly hurt.

A Danish sailor, named Schmidt, fell from the topmast of the bark Yankee, on the 3d inst., and was killed.

A lady in a millinery store on Stockton street, was severely burned on the 8th inst., by the explosion of a camphene lamp.

The 2d anniversary of the Sunday School Union took place on the 30th. The report of the Secretary shows thirteen schools in operation, with a total average attendance of 832 scholars, and 109 teachers. Addresses were made by Dr. Scott and others. Officers were elected for the ensuing year.

Way-Mail Matter.—The notice served on the New Orleans and Mobile mail line of steamers with regard to carrying way letters, will be found below. From it will be seen that all the odium for this most extraordinary order should rest upon the Post-office Department and not upon the mail line, as they are not at fault in the premises. It affords us pleasure to make this statement, as we think the mail line here actual, one enough to answer for, without being held responsible for the sins of others:

Post-Office, Mobile, Ala., June 21.

To the Agent of New Orleans and Mobile Line Steamers:

Sir: I am instructed by the Postmaster General to give you notice to discontinue the practice of keeping in your office a mail way bag or of carrying letters otherwise than in the mail from and instructed to cease paying you for the delivery of letters by the way bag as heretofore, and to report any refusal or neglect on your part to comply with this notice. Respectfully, your obedient servant. T. L. TOULMIN, P. M.

An immense mass meeting of anti-liquor-prohibitionists was held in the Park at New York on the evening of the 2d instant. The demonstration was a tremendous one, not less than ten thousand persons being present and many spirited speeches were made and many spirited resolutions passed.

Two horses were ridden into the current above the Genessee Falls on the 29th, and both were carried over the cataract, which is 92 feet high. Their riders escaped by means of the bridge. One of the horses was instantly killed; the other—strange to say—received no other injury than two or three slight flesh bruises.

Willand county, Canada West, was recently visited by a terrible rain storm, which swept away all the bridges on the Welland and Oswego creeks, and destroyed eight or ten mill dams. The crops of oats and corn on the flats were entirely destroyed. Damages heavy.

THE HERO'S GRAVE.

BY WM. LOMAX VINCENT.

Fitzen Cemetery.—Ewell.

A wordless tomb, a nameless grave,
Yet there a gallant hero sleeps;
Sad winds around it moan and rave,
And grieving flowers upon it weeps.

But, oh! how cold those tears of rain—
To think they'll reach his noble form!
Yet colder even's, who warmer feign,
And kinder winter's freezing storm.

He was a hero, though his name
Was never writ with blood in story—
Not on red fields he rose to fame,
Nor in red battles gained his glory.

But on the battle-field of life—
That field that's daily in our view—
He blameless braved the fameless strife,
And fought the foes to save the true.

He fought through many a bitter year—
Oft wounded fell, in grievous pain—
Oft rose up, deeming victory near,
And braved the battle field again.

At last Death, fearing Time would never
Twixt Truth and Falsehood end the strife,
Unloosed an arrow from his quiver
And, shooting, struck the Hero's life—

Struck through and through his gallant heart,
And sank he then to rise no more;
Yet well he played that noble part
The bad admire, the good adore.

A noble life, a gallant death—
Unblenched though soul and body riven—
He hit surrendered up his breath
To gain it back more pure in Heaven.

Ah! many on that battle field,
Discouraged sink without a blow—
Yes, there have spirits daily yield,
Who never feared an armed foe.

They daily fell, they daily die,
Unknown to any save the few—
The few who hut a moment sigh
For those who lived and died so true.

And then, forgotten in the grave,
No monument preserves their fame—
Wild weeds that o'er them spring and wave,
Conceal from view their very name.

As his who yonder braved the storm,
Till Death, impatient, threw his dart—
God never made a nobler form,
Nor in it placed a nobler heart.

New Orleans, 1855.

New Orleans Money Market.

Wednesday Evening, July 11, 1855.

For the season of the year, there is a fair amount of business in progress. Of course we do not have to report sales of 10,000 bales of cotton or 10,000 barrels of flour in one operation, nor the negotiation of exchange to the amount of ten or twenty thousand pounds sterling; but there is sufficient animation to show that if there is any thing to be transacted, there are a sufficient number of our commercial community, who stay with us the year in and the year out, prepared to extend the same facilities and avail themselves of the same opportunities which offer at the most brisk part of the year.

We have no change to note in the general feature of the Money market. The offerings in bank are beyond their daily income, and about one-fourth, on an average, (occasionally more) have to receive the money in "no 1" though at this season of the year, when several evenings of raising money on call are closed, much more paper is offered than is expected to be favored.

Exchange was quiet to-day—not more so than could be expected from the season of the year. The banks are firm for checks on New York at ¼ per cent.; outside drawers readily obtain our rates. Sixty days on New York were placed at 1 per cent. discount. Some sterling, with bills of lading, were passed yesterday at 9%. The operations in cotton will cause some further sums to appear on the market; and on the price of the staple has declined so as to leave some margin, taking last Liverpool advices as a standard, cotton bills are regarded with higher favor than three or four weeks since. We quote this evening—

Sixty days on London, clear bills	9¾@10¾ ₱ cent. prem
Sixty days on London, with Bills Lading	9¼@9¾ ₱ cent. prem
Sixty days on Paris, gold	5.16¼@5.15 ₱ dollar
Sixty days on New York, first class	¼ @ ½% ₱ cent. dis
Sixty days on New York, produce bills	¼ @ ½ ₱ cent. do
Checks on New York, On the spot	¼ @ ½ ₱ cent. do
Sight drafts do outside	¼ @ ½ ₱ cent. premium
Three days Sight, do	¼ @ ½ ₱ cent. prem
Ten days Sight, do	¼ @ ½ ₱ cent. prem
On Western cities exchange	¼ @ ½ ₱ cent. prem

We have to note the sale of 50 shares Union Bank, ex. dividend, at 96. Some movements in other stocks were in progress, and may reach a negotiation in the course of to-morrow.

We are gratified to learn that the New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad continues to be well encouraged, particularly in the way of freights, although there is a falling off in the receipts for passengers for the last month compared with the month previous. The receipts for freight show an increase, which shows, as a medium of transportation, that the road is working its way into the confidence of the people. The decrease in the receipts of passengers we account for from its being a season of the year that country residents do not visit the city so freely as at other periods.

Earnings of the New Orleans and Jackson Railroad for the months of May and June, 1855.

	May.	June.
Passengers	$5,917 99	$5,805 49
Freight	7,451 53	7,569 18
	13,369 52	13,374 67

Our dates to-day from New York are to the 9th inst. We gather the following items regarding money matters:

Foreign exchange was quoted with a moderate enquiry on London, 109¾ to 110; Paris, 5 12½ to 5 15; Hamburg, 36¼ to 36¾; Amsterdam, 41½ to 42; Bremen, 79¾ to 79¾.

The market was well supplied with money; loans on call made at 5 to 6 per cent.; the banks discounting all the legitimate paper offering, and bankers buying Mercantile paper freely—a few favorite names taken at 5½ per cent. per annum, prime sixty-day bills at 6 per cent., three to six months best names 6 to 6½, and good two names 6 months at 6½ to 7 per cent. per annum. A large amount of business was transacted at the Stock Exchange.

We are all interested in taxes—men, women and children. To provide a revenue for the State of Louisiana, the Legislature at its last session passed an act taxing every thing and all things—what we eat and what we drink, and what we do not eat and what we do not drink. Holders of bonds issued by the State may rest contented that ample measures are provided for the payment of interest, and undoubtedly the principal will be provided for. To commence with, on the first of this month the State Treasurer had to his credit in the State depositary, Baton Rouge, the branch of the Louisiana State Bank, $257,000—a quarter of a million on hand will answer very well to commence the year with.

Thursday Evening, July 12, 1855.

The arrival of several steamboats from the West to-day revived the drooping appearance of business, which for three days past was creeping over the energies of our community. At about noon the announcement of the arrival of the Collins steamer

Agricultural.

CULTIVATING THE SOIL.—Ex Tacrene.—Agriculture is a dignified employment. It occupied man in his primitive state, and it still is his favorite work. When weary of mercantile life, or he fails in an eager pursuit of other business, he returns, child-like, to the culture of his mother earth. Never in the history of this country have so many given up other avocations and taken to Agriculture. Trade of every kind is precarious. The merchant, the manufacturer, the mechanic and the banker have all to contend with the peculiar hazards which grow out of these various kinds of pursuit. It is almost inevitable that they sooner or later fail. Such a word is scarcely known in the vocabulary of the farmer. Such a contingency may befall a single crop, but it is rare to find it involving a way the entire products of a season.

The business of agriculture has been improving within the last half-century. Not merely in the kind of crops produced, but in the quantity. Science has come in to aid in the selection of soil and its adaptation to crops. Chemistry is aiding the profession of the farmer to a large extent, while the introduction of labor-saving apparatus, both in sowing grain, in pulverizing the soil and in gathering the crops have nearly revolutionized the business. It has consequently become attractive to the man of business, the professional man, and the one who has tried other pursuits, but found they were inadequate to furnish him bread. Discouraged in other callings, he falls back upon this primitive but delightful employment, and acquires plenty.

There is a moral influence connected with agriculture which perhaps few people estimate sufficiently high. Honest industry, coupled with a fruitful soil, brings forth most gratifying results. The yield does not come from overreaching, craft, usurous gains, or the misrepresentations of trade. The farmer deals more directly with his Maker, than with man. Duplicity will not fertilize the soil; extraordinary sagacity or forecast does not ripen his crops. He has no occasion to practice any artifices in his business or exercise any double dealing about it. His mind has to do with nature and its beautiful productions. Hence the searing process must be a hard one that converts the farmer into a knave. His productive soil is the source of national prosperity. The exchange is influenced by the crops, and the markets rise and fall with the sunshine and the rain. All commercial operations are predicated on the agricultural prosperity of the nation, and hence the elevated and ennobling position of the American farmer.—Davenport Courier.

JAPAN PEA.—We received, the other day, at the hands of Bishop Pierce, a few Japan peas, which he obtained in a recent trip to Virginia, from an old lady who the last season planted fifteen, which she received from the Patent Office. She stated that she realized two bushels as the product. Just think of that—two bushels from fifteen peas! That is certainly the most prolific pea in the world. We planted ten on the 25th ult., and are looking for a bushel and a peck as the result. We will report in time.—Ga. Proh.

WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.—Not long since we witnessed the result of a series of experiments made by Dr. Taylor, the celebrated clairvoyant physician of this city—the actual production of a brilliant light, and of course an intense heat, by the decomposition of water. The apparatus for producing this astonishing effect is very simple, and has, as he alleges, been constructed entirely under spiritual direction. It is imperfectly made, and yet serves to demonstrate the fact, and the principle involved in the process. The light is exceedingly brilliant, equal to the best quality of gas, and superior in color, it being slightly of an orange tint, and producing not the least smoke. A caveat for the discovery has been filed in the Patent Office in Washington by a gentleman of this city, who compared the apparatus with that of Paine, and the two are entirely unlike. Distinguished chemists who have examined this invention pronounce it a triumph. We do not feel competent to decide any questions that may happen to arise among scientific men, but the result we have actually seen, and really believe that no deception has been resorted to in producing it.

The expense of this light, aside from the apparatus, will be next to nothing, as it is upon a self-acting principle. The discovery, for aught we can see, can be applied to all the purposes for which light and heat are now used, and will mark a new era in human affairs. It is a severe tax upon the imagination to conceive of the changes which will be wrought by the discovery of a process by which water and other simple elements of nature can be rendered subservient to the comfort and convenience of mankind. Dr. Taylor and his friends are soon going east to procure an apparatus on an extended scale, and of perfect workmanship. On his return, as he assures us, he will give the public a chance to see and judge for themselves. [Cleveland Plaindealer.

THE ARCHED ROCK OF LAKE SUPERIOR.—The Arched Rock of Lake Superior is a cavern hollowed by the action of the water in the sandstone rock, resting on a belt of conglomerate. The opening faces the lake to the North, and presents an arch of singular regularity and beauty, with abutments, more or less perfect, on either side. This arch does not spring immediately from the water, but stands upon a wall slightly battered from a vertical line. The interior presents a magnificent saloon. It is a natural cavern for reverberation of sound, both from without and within. The cave is large enough to hold and hide completely a brig with all her sails set. By measurement, the width at the water line is 144 feet, its depth 210 feet. Its length appears to be equal to its width, but writers, who ought to be reliable, have made it somewhat less.

A YOUNG VETERAN.—The Hamburg News contains a letter from St. Petersburg, which says: "Captain Veralow made his appearance in the drawing-rooms of the capital, and has excited no attention from the fact that, although he is only 22 years of age, he has 24 years of service. 1st. He has been eight years in the army. 2d. He has served six months at Sebastopol, and as, according to an order of the Czar, first of the Emperor Nicholas, each month's service there is to count as a year, his six months are counted as years, which gives 14 years in all. 3d. He wears the order of St. Anne and of Wladimir, the cross of the Order of St. George, and a sabre of honor, which reckon for 10 years more; and in that way he makes up the 24 years. Strange to say, that although this officer has been in twelve battles, he has never received a wound."

FOURTH OF JULY DECLARATION.

NEW ORLEANS, July 4, 1855.

The AMERICAN CONVENTION FOR THE STATE OF LOUISIANA convened in this city on Monday, the 2d July inst., and proceeded to organize. On Tuesday, the 3d, after receiving and acting upon credentials, and appointing a Committee on Platform and Address, the Convention adjourned until the 4th. On the Fourth July the Committee reported the following ADDRESS, PLATFORM and STATE POLICY, which were unanimously adopted:

ADDRESS.

The American Party of Louisiana having completed its organization, as is demonstrated by the assembling in the city of New Orleans of delegates from the various local councils organized throughout the State, and believing that the principles which bind its members together are a unison with the sentiment of a large class of our fellow-citizens who are not affiliated with us as members, deems it proper at this period to make such an authentic declaration of principles as will do justice to the pure and patriotic motives which have actuated its members, and by securing the public approbation, will enable it to direct the administration of the State Government into a course more consonant with the Native sentiment of the country.

The American party of Louisiana, in having covered its proceedings up to this time with the veil of secrecy, has been influenced by considerations of the greatest importance, to secure the successful attainment of its object. That secrecy in its elementary organization is now approved by its deliberate judgment as having been perfectly proper and just, and the success of the rapid organization of the party, is the best proof of its policy. In all governments and at all times, all party organizations have been more or less secret in their action, and particularly so in their sources whence they derive their counsels. The country was already divided with two powerful political parties, whose leaders had been employed for years in drilling the masses into the belief that its prosperity depended upon the success of their several measures, or rather of placing them in power to carry these measures into effect. Who does not see how eagerly the leaders, both great and small, of the old parties, would have combined to crush out the life during the struggling moments of patriotism, even in its early growth, of an element so adverse to their party existence, and so certain to deprive them of the "spoils of office?" Who that understands the influence of party in restraining the impetuous, angles forward the timid, and controling the masses with the old slogan cries of Democracy and Whiggery, does not see that it would not have required an infant Hercules to have destroyed the American party, if it had exposed its first efforts at youth to the assault of such a combination, its formation and its existence would have been an impossibility. Deeply impressed with this belief, we met in secret, like the early patriots, and, doing as they did, knew that we expected to be the object of our opponents, for whom this secrecy afforded an argument of defamation, when they did not dare oppose our principles, and we knew also that we estranged from us many who were friendly to our object, but who were unwilling to promote it by secret organization. Conscious, however, of the rectitude of our motives, and our purpose being the welfare of our country, we did not hesitate to incur the censure and defamation of our opponents, and the partial estrangement of our too timid friends. But our party having now attained the vigor of manhood, and being prepared to do battle for our values, through the press and on the hustings, now publish these our principles, and by them we are prepared to stand or fall.

PLATFORM OF THE AMERICAN PARTY OF LOUISIANA.

1. We advocate an amendment of the Naturalization Laws, with proper safeguards to preserve the purity of the elective franchise.

2. We advocate the passage of such laws as will prevent the immigration of paupers and criminals to this country.

3. We oppose any interference in the vested rights of all persons, whether they be of native or foreign birth.

4. We are in favor of non-intervention with slavery by the Federal Government, except for the protection of our constitutional rights.

5. We advocate a high National Policy, such as will afford stern and unwavering protection to the American name abroad, and will follow and guard the American citizen wherever he moves.

6. We believe that America should be governed by Americans, effecting the same through the ballot-box alone, the only legitimate instrument of reform in this country.

7. We believe that the office should seek the man, and not the man the office, and shall oppose the distribution of office among office-seekers, or as a reward for partisan services.

8. We will maintain and defend the Constitution of the United States, the Union as it now exists, and the rights of the States without diminution, insisting upon a faithful performance on the part of the General Government of all the duties enjoined upon it by the Constitution.

9. While we approve of the platform adopted by the late National Council of the American party, at Philadelphia, we reject the application of the principles of the eighth article to American Catholics, as unjust, unfounded and entirely unworthy of our country. We shall forever continue to protest against any abridgement of religious liberty, holding it as a cardinal maxim that religious faith is a question between each individual and his God. We utterly condemn any attempt to make religious belief a test for political office, and can never affiliate with any party which holds sentiments not in accordance with these.

10. We war with no party as such, but shall oppose all who oppose us in the advocacy of these great American principles.

STATE POLICY.

Reform of abuses and retrenchment in our State expenditures.

Education of the youth of the country in schools established by the State.

A constitutional organization of the Swamp Land Commissioners.

A more efficient administration of the Internal Improvement Department, with a view of improving our inland navigation.

The Convention then proceeded to the nomination of Candidates for the various State Offices, which resulted as follows:

NAVAL NEWS.—The United States ship Vincennes, Commander John Rodgers, was at Hong-Kong on the 3d of April; would meet United States steamer John Hancock and United States schooner Fennimore Cooper at Lew-Choo, and, after completing certain surveys, would rendezvous at San Francisco in October next.

Visit to Wanchow and Kelung—Discovery of Coal.—Extract of a letter from an officer on board the United States steamer John Hancock, dated February 13th:

"We left Wanchow on the first, and reached Kelung on the next afternoon, finding the Fennimore Cooper there. Our commander called on the Mandarin residing at the town, and informed him of our object in visiting the island. During the conversation he learned that the Chinese claimed Sovau bay, which was the only anchorage on the East coast. He could get no information from him in regard to the coal mines, and when he applied for permission to visit them, and a guide, the Mandarin was evidently much troubled. After some talk, he evaded the whole matter by some trumpery excuse. Our commander then took the whole matter into his own hands, hired a guide, (promising to bring him away leet he should be punished when we left,) and visited the mines, which are situated immediately on the coast. We went into one shaft, some 100 to 150 feet above the sea level, and found the vein about three feet thick at the entrance, dipping to the south-east, and about four or five feet thick inside, where it had been dug out some sixty feet deep. A small quantity was purchased at the rate of four dollars per ton, and proved to be excellent soft coal, free from sulphur and clinker."

AN IRISH WIDOW IN CLOVER.—Seedy Mahomed, soon after his elevation to the throne of Morocco, about the middle of the last century, was desirous to complete the defences of Fez, and knowing the superiority of the English in engineering, he applied to the British Government for the aid of some person skilled in the art. The request was acceded to, and an experienced sergeant of the Sappers and Miners having been selected as a fit person, was placed at the disposal of his Majesty. Seedy Mahomed received him with much kindness, and allotted a suitable house for his reception. The sergeant continued in the service of the Sultan for some time after he had completed the work at Fez, and at length died, leaving his widow without issue. After his interment, the widow, who was a pretty Irish woman, sought an interview with the Sultan, in order to obtain a pension and the means of returning to her country. His Majesty was much struck by her fair and comely appearance, and treated her with condescension and benevolence. That interview resulted in the poor Irish widow becoming the Sultana of Morocco. Explosion of the Steamboat Lexington.

The Louisville Democrat, in an extra, gives the following account of this terrible affair, which has already been announced by telegraph:

LOUISVILLE, Saturday Night, }
June 30, 1855, 10 o'clock. }

By the J. C. Fremont, just arrived in port, we learn the terrible and harrowing particulars of the explosion of the steamer Lexington, on her way from St. Louis to this port.

The accident occurred at about 3 or 4 o'clock this morning, about five miles above Stephensport. Her entire works forward of the wheel were blown away; the boat then took fire and burned to the water's edge, and then turned bottom up. Skiffs and flatboats put off from the shore as soon as possible, and succeeded in saving considerable numbers.

The D. A. Given was coming up, a short distance behind her, and came in sight in time to see the burning wreck, and saved all she could pick up. She then went back to Stephensport to bring a doctor up for the wounded that were on shore. The J. C. Fremont came up behind the Given, and rendered all the assistance that could possibly be given. The D. A. Given succeeded in saving the baggege, to a great extent.

The Fremont brought up eight of the passengers, all badly wounded—among them Mr. John Bernard of this city, who is very badly hurt; it is supposed that one of his ribs is broken, if other and more serious injuries have not been sustained. Mr. Jno. R. Hall, from Liberty, Mo., who was on his way to Lexington, Ky., to purchase some negroes and stock for his farm, and who had with him some two thousand dollars in money, was also brought up on the Fremont, and is very much hurt; one of his arms is broken, and perhaps one rib; he states that the first thing he knew of the explosion, he felt that he was going up in the air in his night clothing. When he fell he struck upon the wreck, or he would have been drowned. His money is all gone to the last cent, and he lies in a critical condition.

Mr. W. G. Herkins, of Madison, Indiana, also came up. He is badly hurt—his feet being terribly mangled. A striker on the Lexington was also among the cabin passengers of the Fremont—his hurts are rather slight. He cannot give any account of the engineers, or what became of them, and it is supposed they were lost. Three white men came up on deck—two of them very badly hurt. A colored man, fireman, is very badly scalded, and his back terribly cut up.

The chief clerk of the Lexington was saved, but the books and papers were all lost. No news could be had of Captain Throop, and it is feared that he was killed. The steward was also among the saved, as well as all the ladies on board.

How many were killed is not known—the number of passengers not having been ascertained, nor how many of them and of the crew were saved. But it is supposed that several were killed, either by the explosion or in the flames, or by drowning.

The officers and passengers on the Fremont did all in the power of human beings to alleviate the sufferings of those they brought up, as well as to save all they could find on or about the wreck. The few who had been taken ashore by the flats and skiffs were cared for by the Given and Fremont, and the people on shore.

The explosion, ocenrring as it did before day, and no one being up about the boat except the pilot, the watchman, and the engineer, with two or three firemen—the engineer being lost, or supposed to be, and the pilot too—there was no one to give information of the cause of the disaster.

The Journal, of the 3d inst. states that Capt. Throop fell from the hurricane deck, but was naught by the second mate standing on the forecastle before he reached the deck; otherwise he would have been killed instantly. The mate, though immediately forward of the boilers, sustained no injury. The clerk found himself in the river, with his desk close beside him.

A passenger expressed the opinion that not less than 25 lives were lost, but the following list of the sufferers contains all the names known at present:

Killed.—Henry Lewis, Samuel Lowry, (colored), two brothers, (name not known) got on board at Smithland, supposed to be from Georgia, one killed and the other missing.

Missing.—James Miller, (2d clerk, Nashville, Tenn.,) Willis, (2d engineer,) Mr. Fairchild, Haines, (carpenter,) Phillips, (Liberty, Mo.,) John Taylor, (colored,) Baldwin, (colored, New Albany,) Harrisen, (New Albany,) one of the Georgians above mentioned.

Wounded.—Col. Bayles, Louisville, slightly; Thos. Payne, Cincinnati, do.; Thos. F. Gibsen, first mate, Switzerland; do.; E. G. Davidson, Nashville, do.; J. B. Johnsen, first engineer, do.; M. Twigg, do.; S. W. Andersmith, assistant engineer, do.; D. Harris, Cincinnati, do.; Harry, New Albany, badly scalded; J. M. Gardner, King's landing, Ky., severely burned; P. Flinn, Auburn, N. Y., slightly wounded; J. H. Freeman, (colored) New Albany, do.; L. B. Johnson, St. Louis; A. Badger, pilot, St. Louis, badly scalded; W. P. Jobeson, Madison, leg broken and badly bruised; T. Ryan, St. Louis, slightly wounded; Capt. Thos. White, Louisville, badly hurt; Capt. J. Throop, very badly scalded; Mr. McElroy, Lebanon, Ky., slightly scalded; J. Hall, Liberty, Mo., badly wounded; Charles Squires, badly wounded.

EXCITING ADVENTURE WITH A BEAR.—An encounter of an exciting and dangerous character with a bear, occurred on the 10th inst., near Wellsville, in Allegheny county. Mr. Francis Smith, a young man residing in that vicinity, being in the woods with his gun, shot a fawn. After loading his piece, he proceeded a few rods, till, on climbing over a large log in a windfall, he chanced to rouse a large bear which had been quietly sleeping on the other side. Bruin being thus unceremoniously disturbed, sprang upon Mr. S. and caught him around the waist. The embrace thus given was considerably more strenuous than welcome. The enraged brute would doubtless have made short work with Mr. S., who is a person of small size, weighing only one hundred and five pounds, but for the promptitude and presence of mind which he was able to command. Placing his foot beneath the breach of his gun, he contrived to raise it so that with his hands, which were fortunately free, he turned the muzzle downwards upon the bear and fired. The charge took effect and the formidable animal fell dead. Mr. S. doubtless felt that he had narrowly escaped a deadly peril. The bear was found to weigh 300 pounds. [Rochester American.

THE CALIFORNIA NUGGET OF GOLD.—A few days ago we announced the arrival at Havre, by the Ariel, of a nugget of native gold, of the value of about 200,000 francs, which was in the hands of two miners, and was to be exhibited at the Universal Exhibition in Paris. We learn to-day from Paris that the nugget, instead of being lent to the Exhibition, was presented to the Bank of France, in view of obtaining an advance on its consignment. The Bank having assayed it, found that it was a piece of lead covered with gold, upon which the roughness and unevenness of the native gold had been ingeniously imitated. An investigation has been commenced, to discover if the fraud had been committed at the diggings or during the voyage. [Journal du Hevre, June 11.

A TRAGEDY IN THE CRIMEA.—Lieut. Driant, of the grenadier company, had occasion to check a soldier, who, being partly intoxicated, was marching very irregularly. Scarcely had the reprimand been given, when the man replied, "Lieuteuant, you've punished me often enough—you shall not punish me any more;" and on the instant levelling his musket, he fired and shot him through the body. The general-in-commend of the trenches was in the ravine close by, and after a brief consultation between him and the commandant of the relief, a council was held and the man condemned to be shot. He was taken out, and twelve bullets sent through his body. It was with difficulty the soldiers were prevented from lynching him. Lieut. D. was very popular among the men. The murderer had been eighteen years in the service, and was noted for his bravery. He was intoxicated when he committed the deed.

A CANDID LAWYER.—"Do you think I'll get justice done me?" said a culprit to his counsel. "I don't think you will," replied the other, "for I see two men on the jury who are opposed to hanging."

Percussion or Fulminating Powder.

If the word "diabolical" can be properly applied to any substance that chemical artifice has produced, it certainly belongs to this, which, from the terrific power and force of its explosion, truly deserves that title. The extraordinary power of fulminating mercury, or, as it is commonly termed, peroussion powder, prohibits its use as a projectile, because we have not yet made any cannon capable of withstanding its force, if fired in any quantity at once. Sufficient to project a ball or a bombshell would completely shatter a cannon on the instant of explosion. It is a strange mixture that produces fulminating powder—such a combination as none but a true chemist would think of making. Fulminate is prepared with nitric acid, (extracted from saltpetre,) alcohol, (that is, spirits of wine,) and mercury. These substances are the representatives of the atmospherie, the botanic and mineral portions of the world; and, although they are here united, they have but little affinity to each other, and are only waiting to fly asunder at the slightest call. The fall of a feather upon pure fulminating powder will sometimes cause it to explode. We would describe the method of its manufacture did we not fear to do so, lest some of our ingenious readers should attempt to produce it. None but persons of the greatest experience should ever touch it. Not long ago the principal operative at Apothecaries' Hall, a man extremely cautious and of profound experience, was shivered to pieces while drying an ounce of it.

As a means of igniting gunpowder it has proved in warfare of great service, as it adds to the force of the powder. Eight and a half parts of powder fired with peroussion caps are quite equal in force to ten parts of gunpowder fired in the old way by means of the "pan and flint." One ounce of fulminate is more than enough for charging a thousand caps. In charging the cepe the fulminate is mixed with a quarter of its weight of water and half its weight of gunpowder; the whole is then ground together with a wooden muller upon a marble slab. Percussion powder, like gunpowder, owes its terrific force to the concentration into a solid form of the elements of air in the immediate juxtaposition of combustible materials, which, when fired, assume instantaneously the air, shape and bulk which is by the heat developed at the instant of explosion, fearfully increased in size. All substances that contain a great deal of oxygen will "explode more or less when in contact with combustibles, although not included in the category of warlike stores." Thus, at Gateshead, during the late fire there, dreadful explosions took place, although no gunpowder was present. Some of the warehouses contained vast quantities of nitrate of soda, a substance of similar composition to that of nitrate of potash, (saltpetre.) Thus, naptha and the sulpbur being mixed with this, formed a compound precisely similar to, although not identical with, gunpowder. Chemists are, however, acquainted with many substances far more explosive than fulmioate, such as chloride of nitrogen, a pound of which would annihilate the strongest town in the world. By the time the chemists have taught us to control this frightful power, let us hope that the peace of nations will have rendered it useless. [London paper.

AN AMERICAN EARTHQUAKE.—The Baltimore American of the 20th gives the following account of the earthquake which was experienced in that city and vicinity on the previous day:

At about eighteen minutes past twelve o'clock yesterday morning, our citizens were aroused from their slumbers by an apparent explosion and rumbling noise, which was by some supposed to be an explosion of a powder mill or magazine, and by others to have been the effect of an earthquake. Anxious enquiry was made in all directions in the morning, but it was soon ascertained that the powder mills, both on the Liberty road, known as Jamieson's, and those of Messrs. Beatty, on the Susquehanna Railroad, were all in good order, and that the shaking of the earth proceeded from an explosion in a mightier magazine than those constructed by human agency. We since learn that Jamieson's mills on the Liberty road are owned by Messrs. Wm. Mason and Sons, and that they are not manufacturing now.

At York, Pa., we learn from passengers who came down yesterday, that the shock was truly startling, rousing the whole population and creating such an excitement that but few were willing to retire again for the night. The shock and rumbling noise that followed it, causing a shaking of furniture and rattling of windows, is said to have lasted full twenty seconds at York.

In all sections of the city the sensation was equally distinct and unmistakably appalling, and we have met with but few who were not aroused from their sleep by the concussion and unearthly noise that followed the shock, which is variously estimated to have lasted from 12 to 20 seconds. The night was excessively warm, and the atmosphere thick and murky. Many persons were still about the streets, whilst others were sitting up, unable to sleep. By these and the watchmen the shock was believed at once to be that of an earthquake, as it seemed to have a stronger and deeper hold on the earth than could have been produced from the explosion of powder.

On Madison Avenue and at Mount Vernon Place, the shock is represented to have been very severe, instantly arousing the soundest sleepers, and apparently jarring the houses to their very foundations. On Fell's Point the vibration was also very sharp, and in some instances the people ran into the streets in their night clothing, while glasses are said to have been broken in some of the windows. But we have heard from every part of the city, and it was distinctly felt in all directions, causing more or less alarm. We have heard of a number of ladies having fainted from the effects of the shock, whilst some of the negroes thought the world was coming to an end. One old black woman is said to have rushed down stairs, crying out, "Massa! massa! judgment day has come, and Dinah's not ready."

NICK-NAMES.—The following is taken from a private letter from the seat of war:

"Lord Raglan is nick-named in the Crimea, Jack Rag; Canrobert, Robert Can't, because he can't take Sebastopol; Lord Cardigan, is Old Charge Again; Lord Lucan, Old Look On; Gen. Scarlet, Blood and Guts, because of his name, and from his being always in the thick of the fight. The Russians are usually called Johnny Ruskies, but when they fight with unusual obstinacy, they are called Jehnny Rusties."

☞ HEAL THE SICK.—Men of liberal education at the present day devote all their talents to discover the means whereby they may remove those painful maladies which assail the human frame. There is no nobler art than that of healing the sick, considering the numberless illnesses to which man is liable, and which may cause him to drag out a protracted life of distress, or suddenly cut him off in the bloom of his existence and usefulness. We should gratefully unite upon every means of counteracting their dreadful effects, or causing a removal of those clogs to happiness. In those cases where the Liver or the Stomach is the cause, we would highly recommend Dr. Hoofland's German Bitters, prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson. No medicine at this time stands higher than those Bitters, and to those who are suffering from the horrors of indigestion, we say they are the antidote. See advertisement. jy7 1md&WS

☞ DR. HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS, prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson, are justly reckoned among our most valuable medicines. In cases of Dyspepsia it acts like magic, strengthening the tone of the stomach stimulating the digestive powers, and giving ruddy health to the cheek, and brightness to the eye. There are thousands in this community who can testify to their virtues and thousands will hereafter add their testimony.

Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would however, respectfully urge all parents or guardians who design pleoing their daughters or wards in the institution, to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, for litating, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.

School books, stationery, &c., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the usual rates.

Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral department of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.

As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass into another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.

The government of the school is to be understood as that of authority—though parental and mild, yet decided and firm. The institution, in a religious point of view will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.

Pupils will be required to attend church at least once on the Sabbath, and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.

The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.

The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second session commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July. At which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.

All applications for admission of pupils, &c., to be made to the president of the College.

LAGRANGE COLLEGE, AT FLORENCE ALABAMA.—The Tennessee, Memphis and Alabama Conferences have removed this Institution from La Grange to this place, and have appointed the undersigned Commissioners to effect this removal. We have under contract, on an eligible site, large buildings, on the plan of a distinguished Architect, which we hope to have completed during the present year.

We have purchased for the use of the President, a comfortable mansion; and have provided suitable buildings for the opening of the next session on the 21st day of February. We have ordered from Philadelphia and Boston a supply of superior apparatus.

The Dormitory system has been abolished, and ample provision has been made for the board of students in good private families, at $10 per month for board and washing, and $2 for fuel, lodging and room rent.

By an ordinance of the corporation, no Spirituous Liquors are retailed in the town, or Billiard Tables or Nine Pin Alleys allowed to be kept.

We have the pleasure of announcing the same Faculty as formerly, viz:

Rev. R. H. RIVERS, D. D., President and Professor of Moral and Mental Philosophy and Belles Lettres.
OSCAR F. CARY, A. M., Professor of Ancient Languages.
S. P. REES, A. M., Professor of Pure Mathematics.
Rev. B. B. ROSS, A. M., Professor of Mixed Mathematics.
T. P. HATCH, A. M., Professor of Natural Sciences.

In connection with the College is a Preparatory School under the immediate control of Professor S. P. RICE, assisted by MR. N. F. BRIGGS.

Tuition in College per session	$25 00.
Preparatory School, from	$12 to $20 00.

GRISWOLD'S IMPROVED COTTON GINS.—These Gins are more celebrated and extensively used than any other in the States of Georgia and both the Carolinas, and have the preference in all other sections where known. They are manufactured by SAMUEL GRISWOLD, of Griswoldville, Georgia, who has manufactured and sold nearly 20,000 stands—a number more than double that of any other man or firm. He has the only factory having saw gin gear and seed cotton where reliable improvements can be made, which enables him to prove the advantages of every experiment, while all others must make them on an uncertainty; and although he is ever aiming to better his Gins, he has recently succeeded in making a greater improvement in their performance than it was ever before supposed possible to make. These statements are made in good faith as an evidence of which planters have the permission of giving the Gins a fair trial before paying for them.

The following are a few of the many testimonials he has received of their worth.

This is to certify that I have used Griswold's Improved Cotton Gin, and find it to perform to my satisfaction, and take pleasure in recommending them to planters in want of a superior article of Cotton Gins:

DR. JOHN BECKWITH,	WILLIAM MCNUTT,
HON. S. C. POSEY,	H. W. KIMBALL,
GEO. C. RAGLAND,	WILLIAM WATKINS,
A. C. BARTON,	JOHN W. FRIERSON,
D. L. DINSMORE,	REV. DUNCAN DROWN,
COL. ISAAC LANE,	JEROME B. PILLOW,

S. GRISWOLD & CO.

We have used, for one season, Griswold's Patent Water Box Cotton Gins, and find them to run light, pick fast and clean, and smote well. They are convenient and simple in construction, and we doubt not their durability. In short, they are all that Mr. Griswold recommends them to be.

CORRESPONDENCE UP THE RIVER.

NO. III.

Prospect—Low Water Boats—Progress and Boat Knowledge—Geology and Scenery—Animated Nature and Alligators—Red River Water Tonic and Temperance—Morals of Boatmen.

In one of the most beautiful of North Louisiana homes, in the midst of groves of oak, and china, and locust, and with the sweet South breathing full upon me, it would be passing pleasant, with Thompson, to sing the glories of the circling year," or with some genial proser to enjoy the otium cum dignitate which the weather invites. The birds have wet their whistles in the dew, this July morning, the flowers have made their toilets for the day, and birds and blossoms are this minute serenading the world with a concert of odors and melodies. Through the gothic openings and arches of the grove I see the corn-fields waving their tassels, and the vigorous cotton, enameled with blossoms, stretching its expanse of greenness beyond my look.

The three weeks just past have been spent in accomplishing the trip from the mouth of Red River to this delightful retreat, in the vicinity of Shreveport, making an average progress of about fifteen miles a day. Low water navigation affords many topics of discourse; or rather, as a text, it is capable of analysis and fruitful of sub-divisions. In my first epistle something was said of steamboats. Low water boats are sui generis that is, they are a distinct species of the steamboat genus. Several specimens have come under my observation, out of which a structure like this may be generalized. Her outside contour is that of an oblong box—a long parallelogram, without sideguards or paddle-boxes. The forecastle and lower front deck is sufficiently spacious to plant a jack-staff and coil a hawser. Abaft of everything else, in relievo, the single wheel which propels the craft is elongated, where it turns the splashes, as if moved by its own impulse, and conscious of a benevolent enterprise. The chimneys are somewhat larger than stove-pipes, say three times the diameter of a large-headed man's hat, and the voice of the pipes reminds one constantly of a low, feminine and consumptive cough. The cabin of the boiler deck is adapted to the range and promenade of pigmies, rather than men, and its temperature would indicate that it was designed for the accommodation and repose of salamanders. Internally, was the berthe narrow and short, instead of staterooms, and at night we are all literally "laid on the shelf," and the cabin presents the aspect of a catacomb of sleepers.

The time mentioned gives an idea of our speed. Fourteen days from Alexandria to Shreveport! This gives us an opportunity to test the fibre of our patience. Our minimum was zero, our maximum thirty-five miles. Two or three days on board suffices to initiate us into the mysteries of this kind of navigation. We soon learn to distinguish the quality of sand bars and logs by the shock which is felt in striking them. The pilot is an extension of our own senses and capabies, and so keenly are we alive to her escapes and mishaps and hazards, that we feel every bump and tremor which battors her hull or vibrates in her timbers. We learn to calculate the amount of damage sustained by each concussion, and the probable detention at each obstacle will occasion. We become profoundly versed in the uses of yawls, hawsers and capstans, and have the nomenclature of fresh-water sailors at our tongue's end. Amidst the continual jingle of bells in the engine room, we distinguish between one single end another jingle. Each bell is identified by its tone, and what had once the confusion of a French tête-à-tête, becomes a clear and rapid utterance of words which we discriminate with the intuitive readiness of our own vernacular.

Our observations are shut in from the outer world by banks from fifteen to twenty feet above the skylights. On one side the shore rises perpendicularly, displaying the various deposits which the floods of centuries have borne hither from the roots of the North American Andes. The age of the formation may be guessed at almost as accurately by the marks as the longevity of a steer by the circles on his horns, or of a tree by the concentric rings which mark its annual growth. At this stage of water the geology of the valley is laid open to the lovers of natural science, and there are advantages of investigation that no other time affords. Agassiz, Nott and Miller would do well to bring their learning in contact with this marvelous but always opened book of nature. On the opposite, it rises gradually, in beautiful slopes, presenting the same geological characters only in larger print. The scenery, at times, is most beautiful. The abrupt bank is thick with forest trees, which stretch out their broad arms as if praying for "a rise," and fling their shadowe half-way across to the other shore. Richly dressed in their rich foliage, many of them wear bridal veils of moss, lacee of wild ivy and roses, while pendant from their boughs, and reflected in the water beneath, are luxurious tresses of wild grape and muscadine. The slope just across, where it meets the water, is not a point, but a delicately rounded curve—Hogarth's line of beauty. Upon the extreme convex of this line stands a tall white crane, his long neck bending gracefully, his head so turned that one eye looks straight down into the water, and one straight up into the sky; one foot and leg are lifted akimbo, as if to secure the greater silence; the whole, in pantomime, proclaiming him the Isaac Walton of the feathered tribe. We look beyond these immediate surroundings, ahead and up the wild, romantic gorge, through which the emaciated river drags its slow length along; and lo! a Southern sunset completes the picture. The warm and mellow horizon comes down to meet the gilded waters, banks of golden cloud continue the red and emerald walls which shut us in from the lower world, and the illusion steals upon the heart that we are entering the golden gate that opens into the splendors of the fearless land.

Animated nature courts our intimacy in the persons of some of her representatives. The catfish and gar enjoy their sports and gambles about us, and carry on their aquatic theatricals as if conscious of our attention and secure of our admiration. The alligator is in his glory now. He swims near enough to be reached with a pole, then crawls out and displays himself in naked ugliness and ugly boldness upon some sand reef whose continuation, he seems conscious, will give us at least a whole day's toil at the capstan, and evidently exulting over our misfortunes and his superior facilities of locomotion. Every alligator has his day, and he feels that this is his. The enmity which high water travelers cherish towards these creatures is much modified by our circumstances. We drink the water they live in; their presence relieves the monotony of our detentions; and although they indulge in a little harmless bravado, we know them to be as errant and clever cowards as ever Jack Falstaff was. Instead of hatred, we wish them well; and if the issue was made, there is little doubt that our passengers would award to them the exclusive right of way in the channel of Red River henceforth and forever; or so soon hence as Dr. Young and others shall complete the Texas and Vicksburg Railroad.

Our cabin folk, as well as the boatmen, drank river water almost exclusively for sixteen days, and nearly half of the time without ice. No case of sickness occurred, and all landed in improved health, after the longest and most wearisome trip on record. I think the palate detects in the water the presence, at least, of salt, magnesia, sulphur and iron. There may be a mistake in regard to some of these, and their relative quantities I have no means of determining. In fairness, another fact must be mentioned, and then you may pass your opinion upon the healthful or beneficial effects of this water. The most took the water mixed with claret, cordials or brandy. Those that did not fared quite as well as the rest, so far as known. The use of liquors made the water more palatable, but we have no reason to conclude that it made it more healthful. During our trip there was no excessive drinking, and all were well. During the previous trip of the same boat there was excessive drinking and dissipation, and fifteen passengers died of cholera. If this does not prove that Red River water is healthful, medicinal and tonic, I submit to your confrere up the street whether it does not establish the presumption that ardent spirits are no corrective of its injurious properties.

My most painful and serious reflections are my last: the moral and religious condition of those who do business in these waters. We do not meet with more generous hearts, more natural goodness, in any class of men than in these boatmen. The worst aspect of their character is usually uppermost. They are, for the most part, incapable of hypocrisy; they have hearts stored with the springs of benevolence; their liberality degenerates into reckless extravagance and wasteful prodigality. They are often models of courage, patience and industry. I have found amongst them less tendency to infidelity and skepticism, and better and truer religious convictions, than amongst others of higher privileges and happier associations. They are often governed in their business transactions by the highest principles of honor and integrity. This is the bright side. On none has vice laid so heavy and so strong a grasp. Gambling is a passion, drinking is an appetite, licentiousness is a habit, profanity is their breath. This is true of most complements of officers. In the dark hands we have a more ignorant but scarcely a deeper degradation. White or black, they are on a footing. Their commands are larded with oaths, and the examples to which they look only impel them downward. Apart from the passengers, a steamboat is a moral hell; its very atmosphere is instinct of death. These men, thus situated, are debarred all religious privileges; they have no Sabbaths, no sanctuaries, no sanctified influences. Will you, my dear Editor, share in the solicitude of this problem: what has the Church done for these boatmen? How shall they be brought within the pale of her influence?

CHRISTIAN EXPERIENCE.

Skill, as well as honesty, is required in dealing with souls. The gospel is infinitely tender. Jesus does not break a bruised reed or quench the smoking flax. His ministers ought to imitate his gentleness. The following "experience" is in illustration.—Ed.

"Whoso shall offend one of these little ones, which believe in me, it were better for him that a millstone were hung about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depths of the sea."

In the year 18—, there was a great revival among the students of C—— Academy, Pleasant Hill, State of ——, a Presbyterian institution, which also spread throughout the whole vicinity. The altar was nightly crowded with anxious mourners, inquiring what they should do to be saved. I, with several other little girls, was among the number. I was deeply convicted, and humbly implored for mercy to him who said, "Forbid them not." I did not ask in vain, for the Lord spoke peace to my soul, and I was a new creature. I longed to tell the world what the Lord had done for me. I longed to have my name enrolled with the children of God. Sunday came, and those that were desirous of uniting with the Church had first to meet the session and be examined, and those that were deemed worthy were to receive the communion. I, with the rest, repaired to the session room. One of the deacons asked me if I ever disobeyed my parents. I answered that "I had, but"—and here he turned abruptly away before I could finish what I was going to say, which was that I did nor intend to do so any more. They came to the conclusion that I was not worthy to be admitted into their Church; and consequently, when the Lord's body and blood was passed around, (as is their mode,) I was left out. They gave to my companions on either side, but me they passed by. I hurst into tears: my heart was in my throat, I thought that Heaven was wide, but there was no room there for me. I arose and walked out of the church. Years passed on, and I was one of the world's own. I had lost almost every religious feeling, or if I thought of my early impressions, it was only hard thoughts of those deacons.

But the Lord would not let me perish, and the good Spirit was again striving with me. During a revival in the M. E. Church, ——, Miss., I became thoughtful of my sins, and believing that "the prayer of the righteous availeth much," I went up to the altar one night. I was very serious the next day, but having many doubts, did not go again that night. The third night I went again. While there the Rev. Dr. L. came to me and said as near as I can recollect, "You have grieved the Spirit; you came one night, you staid away the next; you have come again; your heart is hardened; and if you do not repent now, your doom may be sealed, and you are inevitably lost."

I tried hard to give myself away, but the tempter whispered the Lord did not want me. For the second time I was almost lost. O! thought I, will no one help me! No one did, then. Again I mingled with the gay and thoughtless world. But the All-seeing Eye was upon me, and the still, small voice bade me implore mercy at the same altar, one year after. Glory to God! 'twas not in vain. While I was fearing, doubting, yet hoping, the Rev. J. B. W. came to me, and bade me look up and believe, and be saved, and said, "O, you are almost blessed!" And from that moment I was blessed, and my soul magnified the Lord. My feet were planted on the Rock that can never be moved. Seven years have passed away, and I am still on the road to Zion. I have never for a moment wished to turn back. I have long ago forgiven those that crushed my wounded spirit. One, I know, did it unintentionally; he was only one of Mary's "scolding preachers." He has long since gone to glory, and there I hope to meet him. But when the spark of life is waning, I will always remember the beloved minister that spoke such soul-inspiring words to me in my most trying hour. May God ever bless him!

SUZETTE.

Though the Godhead were to reward and to exalt without limit and without end, yet the object of His highest favors could never offend the brightness of His eternal majesty by too near an approximation to It; for the difference between the Creator and created must ever be infinite, and the barrier that divides them insurmountable.

If you have cause to suspect the integrity of one with whom you must have dealings, take care that you have no communication with him if he has his friend and you have not; you are playing a dangerous game, in which the odds are two to one against you.

HEAVENLY-MINDEDNESS.

Heavenly-mindedness is an expression that explains itself: it is the minding of Heaven; or the exercise of the thoughts and affections upon those invisible and eternal realities which are declared by the Scriptures to await the Christian beyond the grave.

Alas! how little of this is there to be found even among professing Christians! The description given by the apostle of the predominant taste and pursuits of the men of the world, "They mind earthly things," too well suits a large proportion of those who, in profession, have come out from the world, and are a people separate unto God. How engrossed are they, not only in business but in the cares, the loves, and the enjoyments of earth! Who would imagine, to see their conduct, to hear their conversation, to observe their spirit, so undevout and so worldly, that these were the men who have Heaven in their eye, their heart, their hope? Even to them we should be inclined to think that the Paradise of God is nothing more than a name, a sublime fiction, a sacred vision, which, with all its splendor, has scarcely power enough to engage their thoughts and fix their regards. How little effect has it to elevate them above a predominant worldly-mindedness, to comfort them in trouble, to minister to their happiness or to mortify their corruptions! Can it be that they are seeking for and going to glory, honor and immortality, who think so little about it, and derive so small a portion of their enjoyment from the expectation of it?

What is Heaven? The Bible, and the Bible alone, can answer this question; and even this, though a revelation of God, only partially discloses the infinite and eternal reality. There is enough to excite, sustain and animate hope, but not enough to gratify curiosity. Substantials are revealed, circumstantials are withheld. The description of the celestial world, as we find it in the Word of God, has always appeared to me one of the most striking and convincing of the internal evidences of Christianity. The Elysium of the Greeks and Romans, the Paradise of Mohammed, and the various fantastic ideas of the world beyond the grave entertained by modern pagans, are all of the earth, earthy; nothing more nor better than earthly and sensual gratifications rendered immortal. How different the Heaven of the New Testament; how pure, how spiritual, how unearthly, how divine! How strictly in harmony with the sublime and holy character of God! How befitting a creature intelligent and holy! How completely different from everything which the unholy, sensual and wordly mind of man would ever have devised!

Heaven is usually called eternal life; that is, eternal happy existence; everlasting existence, with all that can render existence a blessing. But what are the elements of its felicity? As regards our own condition, they consist of a soul having perfect knowledge, perfect holiness, perfect liberty, perfect love, united with a body raised from the grave incorruptible, immortal and spiritual. As regards our relations to other beings, heavenly bliss means our dwelling in the immediate presence of Christ; the perfect vision, service, likeness and enjoyment of God; the society and converse of angels and the spirits of just men made perfect. Connected with this is the absence of everything that annoys disturbs or distresses us in this life. Such is the Scripture representation of Heaven.

"My chief conception of Heaven," said Robert Hall to Wilberforce, "is rest." "And mine," replied Wilberforce, "is love—love to God, and love to every bright and holy inhabitant of that glorious place." Hall was an almost constant sufferer from acute bodily pain, Wilberforce enjoyed life, and was all amiability; "so that it is easy to account," says Mr. Gurney, "for their respective conceptions of this subject. What a mercy that both these conceptions are true!" Yes, both are true; and the union of rest and love perhaps conveys the most correct idea of the heavenly state.

Heavenly-mindedness means the spontaneous, frequent, delightful, practical bent of our reflections towards eternal life. A heavenly-minded man is one who, as a convinced, condemned sinner, having obtained a title to eternal life through faith in the blood of Christ, and a meetness for it in the regenerating work of the Holy Spirit, considers himself as a pilgrim and stranger upon earth; regards Heaven as his native country, and as instinctively turns his thoughts to it as he who, in a distant part of the world, feels his mind and heart attracted to his home. Scarcely a day passes during which no thought of his mind, no glance of the eye of faith, turns to the glory to be revealed. In his solitary musings in the house, or by the way, the object is present to his mind, to occupy his thoughts, to refresh and delight his spirit; and when he is with others like-minded with himself, it is his delight to converse upon the country to which they are traveling. Precious to him are those parts of revelation which speak of the life to come, and exhibit to him, amidst the darkness of his way, the distant lights of his Father's house. Sermons that represent the holiness and happiness of Heaven are delightful to his heart; books that describe it are congenial to his taste; and the songs of Zion, which sound like the echo of its divine harmonies, excite all his hallowed sensibilities, and elevate his spirit to catch some of the falling rays of the excellent glory. The beautiful symbols of heavenly bliss, the city too bright with inherent splendor to need the sun; the walls of jasper, the gates of pearl and streets of pure gold, like unto clear glass; the crown of life; the harp of gold; the palm of victory; the white robe; the song of salvation sounding from the countless multitude of the redeemed—all by turns seize and fix his imagination, while his enlightened judgment and his holy heart, letting go these brilliant images, reposes upon the realities they are intended to portray, the presence of God, the vision of the Lamb, the sinless purity of the eternal rest, the communion of the blessed, the fellowship of angels.

HE THAT WILL SAVE HIS LIFE SHALL LOSE IT.

The following fact, in substance, was published in the Christian Mirror some twenty years ago.

A young man, of good abilities and good manners, became, as it was hoped, a disciple of Christ. Such was his course of conduct and so interesting were his religious performances, that high hopes were formed of his future usefulness. Some time after, he formed an acquaintance with a young lady of pleasing manners, both rich and beautiful, yet given to levity and vanity. People wondered at them both. That he, with his present views, should choose such company, or that she, moving in a higher circle, and who was viewed as quite a prize, should, with her different views and feelings, consent to keep his company. After a suitable time he asked her hand. She answered him: "You know my views and feelings. You will, as a matter of course, want to read the Bible and have family prayers, keep the Sabbath and attend public worship; and you cannot expect that I, with my views and feelings, shall be interested." She, after some more conversation, inquired if he was willing to give up his religion for her sake, as that was all that appeared to part them. He left, and soon after went to his class leader, and wished to have his name erased from the class book. His class leader, supposing he was laboring under some temptation, wished to know what it was. He would not give his reason, but plead so earnestly that finally he prevailed. Soon after he waited upon the young lady and pressed his suit. "But," said she, "you know what is in the way." "But," said he, "that is removed." "Removed!" said she, "what do you mean?" He told her what he had done. She fell, almost fainting, into a chair. As soon as she could command words, she exclaimed, "If that is the case, I will never marry you while the world stands. Vain as I am, I was willing to marry you, had I believed you Christian, that you might in future have helped me in that way to Heaven; and all I said and did was to try your sincerity. Had you at first told me decidedly that you would not give up your religion for me, not a word more would have been said. But I have lost all confidence in your piety, and will never marry you, and you need never say another word about it."

Such is the substance of the story. We see from it, whatever the world may say, their judgment and conscience is on the side of religion. And if professed Christians would be respected, and enjoy public confidence, they must carry out the principles of the gospel.

METHODISM IN THE SOUTH OF FRANCE.—From the London Watchman we learn that the reports of the various circuits and stations were encouraging. There is a net increase in the number of members in the District of 84. The increase last year was 239; total increase during the two years, 323; which is one-third of the total number of members in 1853; the present number being 967. The increase in the society above stated does not include the total number of conversions which have actually taken place during the year, through Methodist instrumentality, in the South. It may not be far wrong, perhaps, to state that not one-fifth, in some cases, of the converts become members of the classes. This is partly owing to the unfriendly practices of some proselyting sects, who endeavor to throw discredit on institutions which they both envy and dislike. Among the subjects being agitated by the French Methodists is the establishment of a theological school, or maison d'etudes, on a small scale.

It is easier to pretend to be what you are not, than to hide what you really are. He that can accomplish both has little to learn in hypocrisy.

Further Foreign News.

PARTICULARS PER AMERICA AND HERMANN.

The New York papers of the 16th publish the following full dispatches of the news by the steamship America, from which we omit those items already received here by telegraph:

HALIFAX, Thursday, July 5, 1855.—The Royal Mail steamship America, Capt Lang, from Liverpool at 1 o'clock on Saturday afternoon, the 23d ult., arrived at this port yesterday afternoon, and sailed shortly after for Boston, where she will be due at an early hour on Friday morning.

The America reports, June 27: Passed Royal Mail steamship Africa at 8 P. M. in lat. 50 deg. 20 min., lon. 24 deg. 16 min. W.; 28th, passed brig Caroline Sobenck, running East, lat. 51 deg. 03 min. N., lon. 30 deg. 16 min. W.; 30th, passed ship Toronto, standing East, lat. 49 deg. 56 min. N., lon. 42 deg. 27 min.; July 1, passed several icebergs in lat. 48 deg. 35 min. N., lon. 48 deg. W.

The steamer Hermann, from Bremen via Southampton, sailed from the latter port on the 20th ult for New York, having on board 250 passengers and some 350 tons of cargo.

Defeat of the Allies.

The Allies have made an unsuccessful attempt to storm Sebastopol. The most sinister rumors prevail in regard to the transaction. By some accounts the English loss is set down at four thousand men, but the report is believed to be much exaggerated.

The following are the only official notifications of the event:

"Lord Panmure regrets to have to announce that he has received information that the English troops attacked the Redan and the French the Malakoff towers, at day-light on the morning of the 18th, without that success which has hitherto attended our efforts. Both the French and ourselves have suffered considerably. The names of the officers who have fallen will be forwarded immediately, but it will be impossible to receive complete returns of all the casualties before the 30th inst., (June) at the earliest."

The Moniteur announces that the Government has received two dispatches from Gen Pelissier—the first dated the 17th, informs of operations concocted between the General and his Allies, and that the Turks and Chasseurs made a reconnoissance toward Altodar, Gen Bosquet occupying the Chernaya. The next day, at day-break, the French and English were to attack the Malakoff Tower. The second dispatch, dated the 18th, announces that the attack had failed, and that, although the troops had shown the greatest ardor, and gained a footing in the Malakoff Tower, Gen. Pelissier was obliged to order their retirement into the parallel. This was effected with order and without molestation by the enemy.

Private accounts published in the London Standard say the loss of British officers, in killed and wounded, amounts to no less than seventy. Among the killed and wounded are General Sir C. Campbell, Col. Yea and Col. Shadforth. From the obstinacy and courage with which the combat was maintained by the British at the Redan, and the necessity of eventually retiring from the attack, the slaughter on all sides has been immense, and if the information be correct, the loss, in killed and wounded of the British alone, amounts to very little short of four thousand. The greatest portion of the loss was experienced in a ravine, where a powerful and unexpected battery was opened on the troops. There is reason to fear that the loss has been very great, but Lord Palmerston said on Friday night no additional information had arrived. The Allies lost terribly by the Russians springing a mine, and during the confusion, they (the Russians) recaptured the Mamelon Tower.

Previous advices were to the 17th, stating that there had been smart firing on both sides, but without any result of importance.

A dispatch from Bucharest, via Vienna, confirms the report that an expedition has been undertaken against Perekop. Pelissier is exceedingly savage against the telegraphic messages Napoleon sends him. He is reported to have recently replied that when anything occurs he will let the Emperor know, but that he has not time to act as a telegraph operator. This, according to rumor, accounts for the recent absence of news in the Moniteur.

The Black Sea.

The Russian account of the successes of the Allies in the Sea of Azoff is published. Gortschakoff confirms the success obtained by the Allies, but says that operations against the Sea of Azoff were expected—that not having means to oppose the hostile fleets, the garrison had orders to blow up the batteries and retire—that the grain stores burned by the Allies were mostly private property, and do not materially affect the supply of the army—inasmuch, anticipating such an attack, supplies were mostly conveyed by land, notwithstanding the facilities offered by sea.

The correspondence relates horrible atrocities perpetrated by the French and Turks at the capture of Kertch. A boat expedition is rumored to be preparing to enter the river Don, but the Russians have the entrance defended by twenty-seven gun-boats.

Gen. Adujenow, Vice-lieutenant of the Cossacks of the Don, has issued an address for their general enrollment as militia.

Asia.

The Russian forces have advanced and encamped near Redut Kale. The Turks have evacuated Betoum and Chonrouk Su. Nessif Pasha has advanced with his staff to Kars. A dispatch from Varne, dated June 17, which was referred on the way, says the Russians had made an unsuccessful attack on Kars, and it was reported they had retaken Anepe.

Constantine Walshe, son of the reigning Prince, was killed at Jassy in a duel by the Austrian Major, Stalberg. The affair had caused considerable sensation in the Principalities.

The Baltic.

Admiral Baines, with a squadron of 17 steamers, has left Kiel for the Baltic. The rest of the fleet lay off Seeker Island.

The recent attack on an English boat's crew at Hango, under a flag of truce, causes much excitement in England. Evidence rests solely on the authority of a negro, the sole survivor, who asserts he heard the Russian commander say, "I don't care a d—n for a "flag of truce." Unprejudiced supposition is that the Russians supposed the boat was taking soundings, as recently was done at Kertch.

Admiral Dundas has communicated with the Russian authorities and British Government, through the Danish Minister at St. Petersburg, and demands redress. The Russian account in the Invalide Russe says six were killed and the remainder are prisoners. A dispatch from Dantzic confirms that the officers of the boat, Lieutenant Ganest, Dr. Eastlea, Mr. Sullivan, and all of the crew except six, are prisoners.

Prince Gortschakoff is appointed resident Russian Minister at Vienna, M. Titoff to Wurtemburg, and M. Fonton to Hanover.

Russian influence is very active, even in the smallest German Courts.

The Journal of St. Petersburg publishes the semi-official discussion on Count Walewski's French circular of May 23.

The Journal also semi-officially says that peace is possible, if France and England are willing, inasmuch as the Fourth Point is morally, although not formally settled, and the other points, namely, the navigation of the Danube and the evacuation of the Principalities are also settled, leaving only the Vienna Third Point to be arranged.

All the camps are healthy excepting that at Balaklave, where cholera prevails. The Sardinians are suffering, and Gen. Marmora, the younger, is dead.

Halil Pasha remains in office. A national monument is to be erected to the English dead at Scutaris.

England.

Since the presentation to Parliament of the report of the Roebuck Committee, there has been considerable excitement created by Mr. Roebuck in consequence of his report being overruled by the other members of the committee, they having given notice of a vote of censure on the Government, so worded as to embrace all sections of the opposition—namely, that Parliament, deeply lamenting the sufferings of the army during the winter campaign in the Crimea, and coinciding with the report of the Sebastopol Committee that the conduct of the Administration was the chief cause of the calamities, hereby visits with its severest reprehension every member of the Cabinet which led to the cause of such disastrous results.

The debate on Administrative Reform, after repeated adjournments, ended in the unanimous passing of Sir Bulwer Lytton's resolution that the House of Commons recommends to the earliest attention of Ministers the careful revision of the various official establishments with a view to simplify and facilitate the transaction of public business, and instituting judicious tests of merit, as well by removing obstructions to its fair promotion, and by legitimate rewards to secure to the service of the State the largest available proportion of the energy and intelligence for which the people of this country are distinguished.

Sir John Paul, Wm Strachan and Robert M. Baten, partners of the banking house of Strachan, Paul & Co., London, have been arrested on the charge of disposing of the securities entrusted to their charge.

Mr. Buchanan received the degree of Doctor of Canon Law from the University of Oxford, as also did Chief Justice Robinson, of Canada, Sir Charles Lyell, Alfred Tennyson, Sir De Lacy Evans and Moreton Milnes.

The Admiralty have awarded £16,000 to the salvors of the ship James Cheston.

Italy.

The Marquis of Anzeglio has been sent on a special mission from Sardinia to London.

An Austrian dispatch, dated the 12th, proposes to Prussia, that Prussia and Austria should come to an understanding as to a common course of conduct to be adopted by the two powers in their communications in the Diet at Frankfort.

Denmark.

The Danish Diet is dissolved. Duties forbids enlistment for foreign service, under the penalty of eight years' imprisonment.

The News by the Hermann.

The Hermann left Bremen on the 15th, and Southampton on the 20th ult., and brings 250 passengers and a full cargo of French, German and British merchandise.

There was a rumor prevalent in Southampton, that the Emperor of the French was suffering from the effects of an apoplectic fit. It was also rumored that a great battle had been fought, in which the Allies were defeated and a French General killed.

The adjourned debate on Mr. Layard's motion on Administration Reform was resumed on the 18th ult., and was negatived by a majority of 3,9 to 46. The amendment of Sir B. Lytton was then put as an original resolution, and the debate was adjourned till the 21st.

The report of the Sebastopol Inquiry Committee had been presented to the House of Commons, and was ordered to be printed. In presenting the report, which was very lengthy, the Chief Clerk stated that from the frequent inconsistency and contrariety of the evidence, and the impossibility of summoning witnesses who could have given important information, as well as from other unavoidable causes, the committee had been obliged to end an inquiry which they were unable satisfactorily to complete. The report, however, upon the whole, bore out the statements of incompetency on the part of government officials which had so frequently been made by the correspondents of The Times and other English journals.

In a dispatch from Prince Gortschakoff, received at St. Petersburg, he states that on the 11th and 12th June the fire of the Allies before Sebastopol was weak, and the loss of the Russians very trifling, and that the Allies had reconstructed the Kamtschatka lunette.

The St. Petersburg Journal, of the 12th June, after commenting on the recent circular of Count Walewski relative to the Four Points, asserts that the renewal of the negotiations for peace is not only possible, but easy.

Outrage on a Flag of Truce in the Baltic.

In reply to a question from Captain Duncombe, in the British House of Commons on the 18th ult., Sir C. Wood, First Lord of the Admiralty, gives the following official version of this disastrous occurrence:

Sir C. Wood regretted that the report was only too true. He had to-day received dispatches from Admiral Dundas, the substance of which he would state, giving an account of the transaction. Some time before her Majesty's ship Cossack took and destroyed some Russian vessels near Hengo, and some persons were taken prisoners—the captain of one of the vessels, his son and a sailor. Admiral Dundas, anxious not to use any unnecessary severity toward the trade of the country so long as the supplies for the Russian forces were uninterrupted, directed the Cossack to return to Hango in order to put ashore the persons so captured, who had also requested to be put ashore at that place; four other Russians, who had also been taken prisoners, also requested to be landed there. The Cossack thereupon went to Hango, and, anchoring some little distance from the place, sent the ship's cutter with seven Russian prisoners, and the ordinary boat's crew. The boat approached the shore under a flag of truce, which she displayed for half an hour before she reached the jetty. The officers and the prisoners landed with their baggage upon the jetty; with the exception of the officers, every man remained in the boat. A body of Russian soldiers, between three and four hundred, all armed, came down to the jetty. The English officer waved his flag of truce, and explained why the prisoners were put ashore. The Finnish captain then took the flag of truce from the lieutenant, and tried to explain both in Finnish and in English the purport of the visit.

The officer in command of the Russians spoke not only Finnish but English also, and said he did not care for the flag of truce, and that he would show the party how the Russians could fight. Some hundred of the Russian soldiers immediately fired upon the British officers and the Finnish prisoners upon the jetty, and killed every one of them. They then fired into the boat and killed every man but one. They then rushed into the boat, threw some bodies overboard, dragged one wounded man out and killed him, but they left five bodies for dead in the boat. The boat not returning, later in the day the gig was sent out in search, and it was ascertained from a distance that the disaster had occurred. There was left on board the boat a black man, who was wounded with two bullets through the arm and one through his shoulder. He tried to cut the fastenings of the boat and scull the cutter to the ship. Meantime the Cossack was standing in, in order to ascertain what had become of the cutter, and a boat being sent out picked up this man, who was the only survivor. On his evidence, of course, the whole of the story which he had just detailed must rest, as he was the only person left alive after the transaction.

This statement made a profound impression upon the House. Soon afterward—

Mr Headlam asked whether any British officer had availed himself of a flag of truce to take soundings at Kertch or elsewhere.

Sir C. Wood replied that, so far as any reports had been received at the Admiralty, a statement was utterly untrue.

The papers relative to the [illegible] were then laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, JULY 21, 1855.

Health.—We fear the next weekly report may show an increase in the yellow fever—though the weather is not unwholesome, and we hear of little yellow fever in private practice. Our latest direct information from the Charity Hospitals was on Wednesday morning; in the last twenty-four hours, sixteen deaths of the fever.

Interesting to our Friends and Us.—Those having money in hand for the Advocate will please send it by mail, at our risk—registering.

A subscriber writes, 11th inst.: "I send you $5, to be applied to my account." Very convenient remittance. It paid his dues and put him—where he ought to be—one year in advance.

Others may do likewise. The agents will find the accounts made out thus: Of those in arrears, "owes to —— date," in which the advance payment for the current year is included; of those in advance already, "paid to —— date." Many of these expire before the Conference year, and by paying upon opportunity for the next year, they secure the benefit of the advance price, $2; six months later, 2 50; end of the year, $3.

A New Extinguisher.—A steam fire engine, manufactured in Cincinnati, was received by the city Friday. On Wednesday night it paid for itself ten times over. A fire broke out in the Verandah. This beautiful hotel was consumed, but the valuable surrounding property protected.

The new patern is costly, but does the work of a dozen of the old. What is better, it will ultimately lead to the disbanding of fire companies, a fruitful source of immorality.

Blackwood for June.—The leading article is on Rev. C. Kingsley, and a sterling one it is. Mr. C. is admitted to be a man of genius and a brilliant writer; industrious, withal, having produced twelve volumes in the last six years. But the plan of his works is condemned as violating probability, and their tendency socialistic and sensual. Tregarva, in Yeast, the gamekeeper and Wesleyan class leader, is pronounced his most original and best character.

Bible Agency.—Mr. T. R. Markham has been appointed traveling agent for the Southwestern Bible Society, located 197 Camp street, New Orleans. There is still due about $4,000 on the Bible House. We hope Mr Markham will be facilitated in his good work.

New Orleans Medical and Surgical Journal for July.—This valuable publication, edited by Dr. Bennet Dowler, has been for several days on our table. It contains thirteen original communications, by Dr. Ashe, of Alabama; Dr. Anderson, of Alexandria; Dr. S. Cotjman; Lyne; Simmons; the late Dr. Hester; Dr. Anderson, of Tennessee; Dr. Smith, of Fannin, Texas; and Drs. M. M. and B. Dowler. There are seventeen articles under the general head of "Progress of Medicine"—besides the usual quantity of reviews of contemporary scientific works.

Even to an unprofessional reader the Journal is interesting; the professional must find it a vade mecum.

Mrs. Read's Academy.—The examination of the pupils and other exercises of this excellent female academy, in Baton Rouge, will take place on the 25th and continue to the 28th inst. We have pleasant recollections of an attendance a few years ago, and acknowledge a polite invitation to be present on the coming occasion.

Situation Wanted.—See advertisement for a teacher's place.

Nashville Academy.—Dr. Elliott says: "I may refer your correspondent about dancing. He has done me great injustice before my brethren." "Crotchet" would be the last to do injustice knowingly, and few are more knowing than Crotchet. Apart from this point, which we hope may be cleared up, we take pleasure in commending the institution. A visit to it last spring, and an acquaintance with young ladies and matrons who were there educated, impress us most favorably. The buildings are large, and the domestic and studying appointments admirable. See advertisement for terms.

Rev. R. M. Walker.—We are pained a learning by letter, 10th inst., from "one of his flock," that this brother has failed in health and been compelled to give up his charge. Says our correspondent:

"It is with feelings of the deepest melancholy and regret that we give up our beloved pastor, Brother Walker. He is compelled to flee his labors here, to which he has too intently assiduously devoted himself, in consequence of his feeble health. Long will he live in the hearts of his flock in Shreveport."

The people will be astonished when they come to find the angels laying no more to be made scarecrows.

Holy Ghost Preaching.

DOES THE PULPIT GRIEVE THE SPIRIT?

As generally used, this expression conveys the idea of earnest, evangelical preaching with the accompaniment of power. The subject, rather than manner of preaching, is new meat. It was the remark of a successful minister, who was also a close observer, that he never preached on the Holy Ghost, his offices and relation to the scheme of salvation, but with a gracious movement upon the congregation.

Have not others remarked the same? While the Scriptures were being unfolded on this subject, in the words which the Holy Ghost teaches, the fire burned, dead souls were quickened, and unction descended. The truth spoken was realized, and the witnesses were near.

Robert Hall, who speculated at one time of life very freely, but always honestly, says he was "struck with the fact that whenever in private prayer he was in the most deeply devotional frame, most overwhelmed with the sense that he was nothing and God was all in all, he always felt inclined to adopt a trinitarian doxology." The personality of the Spirit was one of the points about which he "floated in uncertainty" a good while. Although earnestly enforcing the necessity of Divine influence in the transformation of character, yet he spoke of it as the "influence of the Spirit of God," and never in terms of distinct personality. His inquiries and meditations at length issued in a firm persuasion that the Holy Ghost is really God, and not an emanation.

May not this "floating in uncertainty" account for the many side references to Divine influence, without much direct and well defined Holy Ghost preaching?

A revival of Holy Ghost preaching would be a revival in the Church. It is needed. In a sense sufficiently literal to be alarming, does not the pulpit slight and grieve the Holy Ghost?

Here is a fountain of influences, a source of power to which the Church ought not to be uncertainly directed.

Preparation is required for Holy Ghost preaching. Of heart, for the nature of the subject is in such contrast to coldness as to rebuke it; of mind, since unless the light of the holy oracles be clearly reflected, and definitions be accurate, there is certainty of blundering, and blundering here borders on blasphemy.

The XIV of Winans' Discourses is devoted to an edifying and highly instructive treatment of the "Holy Ghost, and His offices affecting the salvation of man." It opens with these reflections, and we commend them to all, especially to Christian teachers:

"We have long entertained the opinion that Christian teachers, both writers and preachers, give, in their teaching, less prominence to the Holy Ghost than the importance of His relation to the cause of human salvation, and the example of the New Testament Scriptures, would seem to render proper and incumbent on them. * * * Are not His offices and the part which He performs in the salvation of man far less frequently brought into view and urged upon the consideration of readers and hearers than are those of the Father and the Son? And why is this the case? Is He of less dignity than the other Divine Persons in the sacred Unity? Are His offices less necessary to the well being of man, or the part He performs less indispensable in the accomplishment of human salvation than theirs? What Trinitarian will affirm that they are so? And if He is equal in dignity with the other Persons in the Godhead, and if His offices and operations are equally important with theirs to the salvation and well being of man, is it not a fault in religious teaching to treat Him and them with comparative neglect?"

Wesleyan hymnology, doctrinal and devotional, is not lacking here; but we regard it as unfortunate that the main Wesleyan contribution, under the department, "Offices of the Holy Ghost," in our present collection of hymns, is in metres impracticable to congregations.

The pulpit, nevertheless, has its duty to do, indoctrinating soul and mind. Nor is it dry doctrine. The revival epoche of Christianity were signalized by its preaching.

Are there not churches where never a soul was born again? Congregations, sitting from year to year under eloquent impotency and in a state of polished hardness and tearless drought? A Paul, inquiring, "Have ye received the Holy Ghost?" might be answered with the touching confession reflecting sadly upon teachers, "We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost."

Our Publishing Interests.

These are progressing. Pity it is that our friends in this section have little more than our word for it—there being no depository or sale agency in the South where our publications may be obtained. This will be remedied—soon we hope. The Book Agents will do the best they can; that may be relied upon.

The Editor, Dr. Summers, feeds the presses well, and though they are not idle, keeps them full. We are in receipt of a fine parcel of tracts—the last installment. Besides several books stereotyped, but not finished, here is the number of pages printed since the commencement of operations, April 3:

Folio	400,000
Quarto	120,000
Octavo	1,579,000
Duodecimo	9,990,000
Eighteenmo	10,223,000
Twenty-fourmo	2,640,000
Thirty-twomo	1,920,000
Covers	155,000
Total	27,037,000

Besides a large quantity of envelopes, circulars, bill-heads, &c.

The Sabbath.—Hem the Sabbath well and it will not ravel out all the week.

A Correction.

It will be recollected that a few months back there was an article in the Louisiana Courier, charging the Mississippi Annual Conference with spending a day or two of its session, in Jackson, La., "initiating circuit riders" into the K. N. order. The professors in Centenary College were also alluded to in a manner doing injustice to them and the institution. That the Courier did not promptly retract its charge and disparaging remarks, upon our prompt correction, we have before complained. Under the head of "A Mistake Corrected," 17th inst., we are pleased to find full, though tardy satisfaction:

"We have discovered, to our infinite satisfaction, that this charge against those gentlemen was entirely unfounded, and we cheerfully take back every word that we uttered to their disparagement. They have no connection, in any shape or form, with that or any other political association. Rev. Mr McTyeire, editor of the Christian Advocate, was in Jackson on the occasion which gave rise to the wrong impressions under which that article was written. We sincerely regret to have given umbrage to so respectable a body of men, whose lives are devoted to science and religion, whose characters are beyond the reach of newspaper attacks, while their feelings are as sensitive to whatever concerns the welfare of their country as the most patriotic amongst us."

Another Division.

Trouble Ahead.—The old pilot, Dr. Bond, gives out these words in the Advocate and Journal, 5th inst. From his lookout, 200 Mulberry street, New York, he sees and bodes evil:

"It is, we suppose, settled that the next General Conference cannot alter the general rule on the subject of slaveholding by members of the M. E. Church, as no proposed amendment of the rule has received the vote of a constitutional majority in the Annual Conferences to authorize action on the part of the General Conference. Yet as the General Conference is competent to pass a simple rule of discipline which will exclude all slaveholders from the Church, 'without respect to character or circumstances,' the next session of that body will be looked to with more or less apprehension that some rule will be enacted which will be utterly impracticable in the Conferences having slaveholding territory within their boundaries; and which, from its very introduction into the discipline, may produce another division of the Church."

As in 1844, Dr. Bond has succeeded in confusing his opponents and staving off the issue, that is all. He makes a good advocate, but a poor judge. He can tangle a witness and hang the jury, but cannot deliver a charge sufficiently broad and clear for bringing in a verdict. His highest achievement is a mistrial.

The position he lays down and holds against all the adversaries raging around, has been so often stated by him, we believe at last we understand it: 'Slavery is a sin, but not always sinful.' The admission keeps his people restless and resolved on doing something; the exception puts them at loggerheads.

Indeed, there is a nice point—that a thing is always substantively what it is not adjectively. Among the curious questions over which the mediæval theologists racked their brains, was this: "How many angels could stand on the point of a needle?" Dr. Bond shows how many subscribers—thirty-two thousand!

So much for being wiser than the Bible, and not leaving the vexed question where it leaves it.

Greensboro' and Auburn.

UNPARALLELED LIBERALITY!

These times are not without good signs. The Church has not exhorted in vain to liberality. Religious education is appreciated. Wealth is not only increased in its measure, but in its consecration. Six months after the motion of the Alabama Conference to establish a college, the Methodists and friends of Methodism in and around the village of Auburn make the munificent offer of $104,000; those of Greensboro', $113,000, for the establishment in those respective localities.

This without any special agency, and in the hardest times!

Dr. Olin, a few years ago, upon an urgent plea for the Wesleyan University, Connecticut, canvassed all Yankeedom, and even brought his powerful eloquence to bear on New York, in a fruitless effort to raise $100,000.

God has given her substance and heart; let Southern Methodism go forward.

Methodist Colleges.

It will be remembered that at the last session of the Alabama Conference, which met in our town, a Board of Commissioners was appointed to locate a male college within the bounds of the Conference. We learn from the Hon. J. E. Groce, of our county, a member of the Board of Commissioners appointed by Conference, that the Board met at Summerfield, in Dallas county, on the 4th inst., and after receiving the various propositions laid before them came to the conclusion that it would be altogether to the interest of the Church that the Conference should establish two colleges instead of one; and will report accordingly. Greensboro', through her representatives, laid before the Board a subscription of $113,000, which had been raised to erect the college if Conference should locate it at that place. Auburn came up with a similar subscription of $104,000. There has been, we learn, a considerable spirit of rivalry between these places upon this college subject, but the decision of the Board of Commissioners will probably give entire satisfaction to both parties, as there can be but little doubt that under the circumstances Conference will approve and adopt their report.—*Talladega (Ala.) Our Home Correspondence.

Wetumpka, Ala., July 1, 1855.

We have just closed a meeting of two week's duration, which has resulted in sixteen accessions to the Church and as many conversions.

Interest of no ordinary kind was exhibited by all who attended the preaching of the Word, and we fondly hope that a saving impression has been made upon the entire community.

We were much assisted by the timely and disinterested labors of the Baptist ministry here.

The Methodist Church in Wetumpka is one of the most comfortable houses of worship in the South.

It is constructed of brick, is 80 feet long and 50 in breadth, was erected at a cost of between $8,000 and $9,000, and promises to be an enduring monument to perpetuate the Christian liberality of this community.

J. BANCROFT.

Pattersonville, La., July 5, 1855.

Brother McTyeire—I presume that revival news will not be disagreeable to you, especially such as I have to communicate. The Lord is doing a great work among the Indians in our section of country. Last sugar rolling an Indian applied to me for employment. Seeing he was disposed to labor, I employed him, with three others. While with me they were somewhat impressed with the claims of Christianity, and asked me if I would go and preach to them. I told them that if I could get a congregation, I would certainly do so. They answered there would be a good congregation, and I sent an appointment, and accordingly found quite a number collected. I have been preaching to them since then (it was in February) every four weeks, with good effect. Sixteen have joined society, and five or six have professed a change of heart, and ten or twelve adults and children have been baptized, and quite a good feeling existing. I preached to them last Sabbath, and had about one hundred attentive hearers. We see in this the providence of God manifested, in sending these Indians to me for employment, and disposing me to employ them, and to open the way to a scattered people, living in the swamps and bayous, (as it were, a lost people,) and blessing the word to them. They were once very dissipated, having their sprees and frolics regularly; but since they have been preached to, not one has been seen intoxicated; and instead of their sprees and frolics, they have regular prayer meetings. May God continue to bless the work among them.

JOS. KNIGHT.

Natchitoches, La., July 11, 1853.

It will doubtless be a source of pleasure and gratitude to you and your readers to know that God, in his goodness and mercy, has revived his work of grace in the hearts of his children, convicted sinners, comforted mourners, and built up the Church. Our second quarterly meeting was held at Oakland, the last day of June and the first of July. Our Presiding Elder, Brother Randle, preached with power on Sunday, and we have reason to believe that the Spirit conveyed the discourse to the hearts of the hearers. Notwithstanding Christians didn't shout along while taking the sacrament, yet the marks were visible of heartfelt contrition, gratitude and love. The evening service closed encouragingly, and the meeting was protracted till the next Sunday evening. It appears that the great Head of the Church took the meeting in his own hands, and conducted it to his own glory. God was there, in all his convicting, comforting, enlightening, sanctifying and saving power. Every day was a triumph to the Church. The Church shouted praise to God at seeing the wicked sons and daughters of Adam forsake the works of sin and folly, enlist in the holy war, and take up their march to the celestial city. Parents and children rejoiced together from a feeling of their sins being pardoned, and the love of God shed abroad in their hearts. Brothers and sisters embraced each other, and mingled their tears of joy, grief and gratitude. Our breast swelled with joy and gratitude, when four interesting young men were blessed in a few moments, and we do not doubt that Heaven resounded with hallelujahs at the news of sinners saved. Thirty-five persons joined the Church, sixteen white persons and nineteen colored.

Not unto us, O Lord! not unto us, but unto thy name be all the glory.

Oakland is about fifteen miles west of Natchitoches. The good citizens of that community deserve credit for the good plain food which they furnished for the people to eat.

Brother Hamilton will, we hope, accept our gratitude for his co-labor. Bro. Dockrey, a local preacher of Caddo, labored faithfully with us from the beginning to the end of the meeting. The Church extends him their thanks. He is near our hearts, and we love him and pray for him.

J. LANDRUM.

General Minutes, 1854-'55.—These, at great pains for accuracy, have just been passed through the press—so says the General Editor. Georgia Conference is the largest, having traveling preachers, 166; superannuates, 25; local, 527; white members, 50,320. Alabama Conference has traveling preachers, 158; superannuates, 5; local, 473; white members, 39,273. The total increase last year was: Of traveling preachers, 139; sup., 8; local, 31; white members, 13,214; col'd members, 10,320; Indians, 66. Total of membership in the M. E. Church, South: Whites, 428,511; colored, 104,564; Indians, 3,767.

NOT SO EASY TO PREACH.

Deacon Johnson was very much given to finding fault with his minister. The Deacon said it was a very easy thing to preach a sermon, and he should like very well to show the people how well he could perform that service, though he had no book-learning, and had never preached in his life. One Sunday morning the minister was taken suddenly ill, and sending for Mr. Johnson requested him, as a special favor, to conduct the public exercises of the day. Delighted that the time had at last arrived for him to exercise his gifts, he hastened home to make what little preparation he could for the grand display. He was at the church, and in the desk, when the cold chill came over him; it was too late, however, to retreat. He rose to give out the hymn, and commenced by saying: "Our pastor is detained by sickness, let us sing to his praise the nineteenth psalm." The evident amusement of the people increased his agitation, and he finished reading the psalm, saying, "Please to sieg five verses, omitting the last line of each verse!" At length he came to the sermon; he read it once; he read it again; but the more he sought for something to say the less he could find. He looked down at the people and the people looked up to him. Matters were growing desperate; something must be done. Mortified and humbled by the result of his experiment, he at length cried out, "Brethren, if any of you think it an easy thing to preach, all I have to say is, just come up here and try."

The meeting was soon dismissed, and the minister had no warmer friend or greater admirer after that time than Deacon Johnson.

SAURIN'S DESCRIPTION OF THE DYING INFIDEL.

O! were my tongue dipped in the gall of celestial displeasure, I would describe the state of a man expiring in the cruel agonies and uncertainties of unbelief. Ah, see everything conspires to trouble him now. I am dying; I despair of recovering; physicians have given me over; the sighs and tears of friends are useless; the world cannot cure me. Whither am I going? What will become of my body? My God, what a spectacle! The horrid torches, the dismal shroud, the coffin, the tolling bell, the subterranean abode! What will become of my soul? I am ignorant of its destiny, I am plunging into eternal night. My infidelity tells me my soul is nothing but a portion of subtile matter; another world, a vision; immortality, a fancy; but yet I feel, I know not what, that troubles my infidelity. Annihilation, terrible as it is, would appear tolerable to me, were not the ideas of Heaven and hell to present themselves to me in spite of myself. I see Heaven, that immortal mansion of glory, shut against me. I see it at an immense distance. I see it, but my crimes forbid me to enter. I see hell; hell which I have ridiculed. It opens under my feet. I hear the horrible groans of the damned; the smoke of the bottomless pit chokes my words and wraps my thoughts in suffocating darkness.

A Heap o' Good Readin' in it.—A gentleman stepped into our office, last week, inquiring for tracts and Testaments for gratuitous distribution in a certain part of the State. He was prompted to it by the statement of a fact which shows the necessity of more zeal in the distribution of the Bible. A man and his son came into his store on business. The boy, seeing a book on the counter, took it up, and after reading awhile said to his father, "Daddy, do buy this book, that's a heap o' good readin' in it!" The gentleman who narrated the circumstance told him that the book was the Bible, and asked him if they had none at their house. On being answered in the negative, he gave the boy the book, and resolved, though not a professor of religion himself, he would supply all the heathen in that neighborhood with copies of the Scripture and religious tracts. What a pity that a book so full of good reading, so admirably adapted to the young as well as the old, the poor as well as the rich, so necessary to make one wise unto salvation, should not be possessed by those capable of reading its blessed pages! Preachers, agents, colporteurs, be on the alert, and carry the word of life into every sequestered corner of the land.

A promise should be given with caution and kept with care. A promise should be made by the heart and remembered with the head. A promise is the offspring of intention, and should be nurtured by recollection. A promise should be the result of reflection. A promise and its performance should, like the scales of a true balance, always present a mutual adjustment.

Gifts.—The best thing to give your enemy is forgiveness; to your opponent, tolerance; to a friend, your heart; to a father, deference; to your mother, conduct that will make her proud of you; to yourself, respect; to all men, charity; to God, obedience.

Conference Missionary Treasurers.—The Secretary says:

"We again would respectfully urge upon all these officers the necessity of forwarding forthwith whatever funds there may be in their hands intended for the General Treasury."

All men wish to have truth on their side, but few to be on the side of truth.

TEST OF GOOD PREACHING.

Whoever hides the truth by embellishment of words, by a vain exhibition of wit or fancy, by opaque learning, by the impenetrable thickets of nice distinctions, by stupidity and lifelessness, by insane solemnity and sanctimonious conventionalism, is a desecrator of the pulpit and a violater of the Sabbath day. Stupidity hides the truth just as fatally as levity.

Consecrated dullness is no better than flippant folly. If a window fails to let the light through, it makes little difference whether the obscuration comes from the web of a big lazy spider, or from the nimble weavieg of a hundred pert little spiders.

God's truth, really, earnestly, pungently spoken, for direct and practical purposes, with distinct results, constantly following, that is preaching, no matter what are the particular methods of speech. Doubtless some are better than others. But every sincere and truthful man must use that way by which God has enabled him to achieve success; some by solid statements, some by inexorable reasonings, some by illustration and fancy, some by facts and stories, just as God has given power to each one.

But the test is the same in the highest and the lowest. Fruit must follow. The truth of God must shine through the human instrument and evince its divinity by signs following, the awakening of the conscience, conviction of sin, conversion to God, and a life redeemed from selfishness, and set aglow with Christian goodness and benevolence.

NEW MEXICO.

Rev. Lewis Smith, at the recent meeting of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, gave the following interesting sketch of New Mexico, as reported by the Watchman and Reflector:

Rev. Lewis Smith, returned missionary from New Mexico, gives an interesting sketch of this new territory. It has a population of 61,000, of whom 60,000 are descended from the Spanish conquerors, the others of mixed blood, from the old Toltec and Aztec races. The country is barren, the streams few, and the population widely scattered. Fear of Indians gather them into small towns and villages. The largest, Santa Fe, has a population of 6,000. These towns are separated by vast uninhabited wastes. The gospel must be carried to them, but local missionaries cannot be supplied in adequate number. Colporteurs must do the work. There are, at most, only 1,200 in the territory who can read. The general ignorance is the fruit of Romanism. Their religion is peculiar, and sits easily on them. They pass from the Cathedral to the theatre, from praying at Church to rob the Bishop, and feel quite as safe in one operation as the other. They will listen to the colporteur readily, discuss with earnestness, never ridiculing him—they are too polite for that. Some will take sides with him for the sake of argument.

Converts are made with difficulty in the larger towns, owing to the vigilant supervision of the bishops and priests, but in small towns, where little money was to be had, the priest came seldom, and never staid, and inquirers might easily be guided to the truth if American Christians had the spirit of the conquerors of Chepultepec, this territory might soon be evangelized.

A Parisian Breakfast.—I rang the bell, and Monsieur Charles responded by bowing himself in as graceful as a dancing-master. To this hour I cannot determine whether Charles was the proprietor of Hotel de Tours or its garcon. He was shrewd enough for the one and serviceable for the other. My order was given, he seized a diminutive table, with one hand persuaded it to the middle of our sitting room, threw over it a snow-white table cloth, rushed wildly yet noiselessly out, returned with plates for three, diminutive war-clubs, which we recognised as bread, and in twenty minutes, (American time,) from the giving of my order, breakfast was smoking on the board. I beg pardon for the misnomer; it was only a suggestion of breakfast to a hungry American. The bread appeared as war-clubs, but not of a size to knock down a strong appetite; the butter pats were the most delicate hints at butter ever thrown out; the fowl was but a Nisse chicken of very slender genteel proportions; while the beefsteak could never had been missed by the noble ox, its former proprietor. He might have been at that very moment roaming over pleasant fields, quite unconscious that a homeopathic portion of himself was before three dismayed hungry Americans.

"Monsieur Charles," said D., with eminent solemnity, "if compatible with the order of Hotel de Tours, we would like to have some butter. I don't mean several pounds, such as a western American is accustomed to, but sufficient sufficient, Monsieur Charles; and Monsieur Charles, another fowl—any the twin-sister of this late unfortunate; and, Monsieur Charles, if it would not create a famine in the Empire, cause barricades to rise and a Government to go down, we would like to have a little more bread and another beef-steak."

This, translated into French, brought forth, first, a stare of astonishment, then the viands. The breakfast, with these additions, was excellent. True, we missed the light biscuits, the hot cakes, corn bread and the many substantial articles of an American breakfast. How these French manage to live on the shadowy trifles here called food I cannot make out; it is another mystery of Paris. I am satisfied the want of substance is working a degeneration. The French will never be free or capable of self-government, until they suppress soupe and strengthen themselves on beef, corn-cakes, buckwheats and abundance of the best vegetables.

Loyalty of a Bird.—"Lira," an interesting correspondent of the Edgefield Advertiser, furnishes the following anecdote:

Lord P., an English nobleman, paid his addresses to a lady who was fond of birds. She had seen and heard a fine Canary bird at a coffee-house near Charing Cross, and entreated him to get it for her. The owner of it was a widow, and Lord P. offered to buy it at a great price, which she refused. Finding there was no other means of obtaining the bird, he determined to change it, and getting one of the same color, with nearly the same marks, but which happened to be a hen, he went to the house. The mistress usually sat in a room behind the bar, to which he had easy access. Contriving to send her out of the way, he effected his purpose, changed the birds, and soon after her return, took his leave. He continued, however, to frequent the house to avoid suspicion, but forbore to say anything of the bird until about two years afterwards, when taking occasion to speak of it, he said to the landlady, "I would have bought that bird of you, but you refused my money for it." "I dare say you are by this time sorry for it." "Indeed, sir," said she, "I am not; nor would I now take any sum for it; for, would you believe it? from the time that our good King (James II, who addicated in 1688) was forced to go abroad and leave us, the dear creature has not sung a note."

According to Custom—Custom-Houses.

The following, from the Washington correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer, appeared in that paper of the 12th instant:

Capt. Bowman, who superintends the building department, has nearly completed an extensive and laborious tour of duty from Texas to Maine, undertaken for the purpose of selecting sites for the numerous minor custom-houses about to be built, and for determining the proper materials to be used. His report will be full of interest.

The immense structure at New Orleans, which though yet unfinished, has cost over three millions of dollars, is gradually sinking into the marsh of the Mississippi, and will probably disappear about the time that railroads shall have transferred to some other point in the South the mercantile supremacy of the Crescent City.

Of course; it would be a miracle if New Orleans should escape a snarling notice whenever an appropriation is made for improvements in the city or its immediate neighborhood. We have become used to such things; so much so, that we were hardly surprised when certain papers in the North appeared to rejoice over the awful ravages of the epidemic of 1853, charging all to the account of slavery, when not one in twenty of the victims ever owned, or ever expected to own, a slave. But it seems to us that these letter writers, in their desire to injure New Orleans, rather overshoot the mark. They put too little of the spice of truth in their enormous dish of falsehood to make it go down with the public. They do not "keep probability in view" sufficiently to enable their calumnies to work the intended mischief. We throw out these observations, in order that they may have a fair opportunity of improving in their labor of slander and villification; not with the remotest hope, however, that the future will be more fraught with justice to us than the past.

The remark of the correspondent of the Courier and Enquirer respecting the "sinking" of the new Custom-house "into the marsh of the Mississippi" is as destitute of truth as it well could be. "Marsh of the Mississippi," forsooth! Why, the Artesian well has been bored nearly five hundred feet through that same "marsh," and so far the indications are that its "upcrust" has not yet been entirely perforated.

The building is solid and substantial; and it does not sink until "railroads shall have transferred to some other point in the South the mercantile supremacy of the Crescent City," it will all be content. When the Custom-house disappears beneath the aforesaid "marsh," what an immense hole would be made, almost as big as the falsehoods daily told about New Orleans!—we will be willing to forego and surrender all claims to any description of "supremacy," mercantile or otherwise.

Equally untrue are the estimates of the correspondent regarding the amount of money expended in the erection of the new Custom-house. He says it has already cost "over three millions of dollars." A more incorrect statement never appeared in the columns of a public print. We will proceed to show by giving the amounts and dates of appropriations, requesting the reader to bear in mind that there is an unexpended balance on hand:

Jackson and Canton Railroad.

We learn from the Jackson (Miss.) Flag of the Union, that on the 11th inst., the first train of the Jackson and Canton railroad was laid into the Jackson terminus of the road, with all the honors, and that Col. Shackelford, after having made a few remarks appropriate to the occasion, struck the first blow in fastening down the last rail laid on this section of the New Orleans and Great Northern railway. There were a great many people present from the regions round about, and the utmost enthusiasm and good feeling prevailed. It is expected, as "a fact of certainty," that before the first day of November next, Canton will be brought within an hour's travel of the capital, and that all along the route of the road planters will beholding with their heads and filling up their purses.

We are very happy to record this evidence of the interest that is being taken by the community population in one of the great railway enterprises that affects the prosperity of New Orleans; as well as that of every State and section doing business with it. The low waters of the past season, and the great losses consequent thereupon, have been arguments of more force towards the prosecution of the work than all the publications of the directors and all the arguments of the press. Men who formerly considered the scheme useless, unnecessary and impracticable, are coming forward now to help, and render certain an unbroken line of railroad communication from New Orleans to Canton, and tapped every little way by other roads running into the country and bringing out country products in their proper season, whether the levee be open or remain closed—whether the rivers overflow their banks or run lazily around bars and sandbars. Already the Great Northern road is in operation from here to the Mississippi line, and is doing, in a comparatively small region, such an amount of business as should encourage the inhabitants of towns and counties lying beyond to put forth every effort to hasten the completion of the enterprise. The road will be completed from St. Louis to Cairo, is near completion from Jackson to Canton, and is partially graded from Jackson to its present terminus near the State line. A little more interest, a little more zeal, a little more energy, will bring about the entire result that is so anxiously anticipated here, and that will be so full of advantages to all living on or near this line of the road. Even an entire loss of the amount invested in a railway between New Orleans and the Ohio river would be a profitable investment, indirectly, to the stockholders, as it would greatly increase the value of their lands and products to an amount beyond that lost. When the investment holds out such additional probabilities of profit, we are unable to see why our planters do not come forward more cheerfully and readily.

African Repository.—We have received the July number of the "African Repository," a magazine, published in Washington by the American Colonization Society. It contains a large amount of valuable and interesting statistical matter concerning the progress of the Association together with much miscellaneous information. Among other matters it notices a statement that in April last the directory of the association published a circular letter appointing thousand agents to solicit money for the aid of the association, hoping thereby to raise the sum of $10,000 to enable it to carry on its operations in this country and Liberia. In order to show the relative sympathy there is for colored people in the North and South—the free and the slaveholding States—we publish the receipts as they are published in the Repository. It will be seen that the contributions run from $1 in Maine and $15 in Massachusetts to $ 30 in Louisiana and $515 in Arkansas! Our statement is unnecessary:

Deaths.

MARY REBECCA, wife of Felix Grundy Hadley, died in Aberdeen, Miss., May 29, 1855, aged 23 years. She embraced the consolation of our holy Christianity November 1850, under the ministry of Rev. P. P. Sandy, D. D., at which time she joined the Church, in which she lived an exemplary member.

I visited her a few hours before her death. The cloud was dark, the conflict was awful. I raised her in prayer, and then sung some of the songs of Zion; encouraging her to appropriate the precious promises of God to her individual necessities, which the good Lord enabled her to do in a short time. She then joined us in singing, and shouted forth in notes of victory, declaring the cloud had dissolved, and that the happy spirits of departed friends beckoned her to her home in Heaven. Her eyes were turned with rapturous delight to Heaven, and the last feeble whisper I heard came from her lips said, "Glory to God." She then calmly fell asleep in the arms of Jesus.

J. H. BROOKE.

Greenville, S. C. papers please copy.

Our readers perhaps seldom called on to chronicle a more afflictive death than that which has grieved us of the society of Sister JANNETT HARDY, wife of Wm. Hardy, who died in Aberdeen, June 19.

She was no doubt taught the Scriptures and instructed in their meaning, was habituated to religious ordinances and familiar conversations on the deep things of God.

This ripened in early life into conviction and conversion. In 1831 she joined the Methodist Church, a member of which she was at the time of her death. She did not manifest that unction which characterizes the true, but in her most devoted moments she enjoyed equable purpose and principle.

While relations shall deplore her loss, many more will be the emotions of condolence on the part of itinerants, to whom she, with her excellent husband, showed much of the hospitality; for like Lydia, they were often led to say to the disciples, "If ye have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my house and abide there."

Dying suddenly, she had no opportunity to say a word about her prospects. We are therefore left in this, as in almost all other instances, to refer to the life for the death. And in this first is right, the second is necessarily right. May this sudden decease quicken the fears of the unaware by loud alarms of danger and danger.

D. J. HAMILTON.

DIED—Of cholera, on 27th June, in this parish of Natchitoches, LA., REV. T. BROWN, in the 25th year of his age.

Brother Brown was nurtured in the bosom of the Methodist Church, having been brought up by a pious father, who died but a few months before him. He joined the church when but a boy, embraced religion shortly afterwards, and lived a faithful and exemplary member: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

T. D. B.

DIED—June 24, in East Baton Rouge parish, Mrs. MELVINA E. NETTLES, wife of Dr. Joseph A. Nottles, in the 22d year of her age.

Mrs. Nottles was the daughter of S. W. Newport and lady, members of the Baptist Church. She had early impressions of piety, and so far had the spirit and the precepts of the gospel moulded her character as to make her one of the most amiable and lovely of women. Some weeks before her death she attended a two days' meeting in her neighborhood, where she became awakened to the duty of connecting herself with the Church of God, and of making a profession of her faith in Christ, and on her deathbed she regretted that she had not done so earlier in life. She suffered severely of scarlet fever, and died after four days' illness, in hope of a better life.

HOW TO INCREASE THE SPEED OF STEAM VESSELS.—The improvements of the last few years in steamboat engines have not greatly increased their speed. Probably the swiftest and best steamer now afloat in any part of the world is the Metropolis, on the Sound between New York and Fall river. She is nearly three hundred and fifty feet long, has four boilers, and a cylinder one hundred and five inches in diameter, through which a high topped carriage and pair of horses were driven, and in which twenty-two persons dined at once. With a pressure of twenty-five pounds to the square inch, she makes sixteen revolutions a minute, and this will carry her twenty miles an hour. Her paddles, (all made of iron except the floats,) are forty-two feet in diameter. This, it will be seen, allows a loss of less than three miles an hour for the slip of the paddles through the water. She has made the distance from New York to Fall river in nine hours and a half.

The difficulty which any increase in respect to speed has to contend against, is the strain. Every enlargement of the paddle wheels, as every augmentation of the number of rotations, throws a greater strain upon the shaft, the difficulty being to concentrate sufficient strength and power there.

An Austrian steamboat of great length, made by an English naval architect, to ply the upper Danube, has been constructed with two paddle wheels on each side, so as to have engines at both ends of the boat. Apart from other difficulties, however, the double loss from the extra weight which the wheels have to lift on coming out of the water, must occasion a great loss of power, and therefore of speed.

But what is to prevent the paddles being affixed to chain cables passed over two wheels, one at each end of the boat? This would be equal, in fact, for practical purposes, to a paddle wheel of any desired diameter—one to which the motive power might be applied from two or more shafts, accomplishing a greater number of revolutions, and hence increasing the speed to almost any desired extent. [Philadelphia Ledger.

He once wanted to know if a sailor were mast-headed for not doing his duty, why you should not weatherock a parishioner for not paying his tithes? He announced the arrival in London of a New Zealand attorney as a gentleman who had 38 full-tattooed all over his face. Hearing of the difficulty of coughing down a speaker, he recommended a trial of the hooping cough. Of Miss Fox, (niece of the statesman,) he said, at Bowood, the Lansdowne's tent, that she was perfect, as she gave him the idea of an aged angel. Of a dressed Venus which he once saw in a serious family, he said it was the Venus Millinaria. On examining some flowers in a garden, a beautiful girl, who was of the party, exclaimed: "O, Mr. Smith, this pea will never come to perfection!" "Permit me, then," said Sydney, gently taking her hand and walking towards the plant, "to lead perfection to the pea." Of Lady Murray's mother, who had a most benevolent countenance, he said her smile was so radiant that it would force a geoscherry bush into flower. He hated dogs, and on being asked by a lady for a motto for her poodle, he suggested, "Out, damned Spot!" but she didn't think it sentimental enough, though thoroughly Shakspearian. Of beres, though he said there were no criminals like them, as they were unpunishable, he was very tolerant, saying he never met with one all the time he lived in the country, but a certain doan, who he declared, "deserved to be preached to death by wild curates." Being asked by a lady if he had been remarkable as a boy, he replied that he was remarkably fat boy, and was intended to have been a Chinese supercargo to Hong-Kong. Complaining of his feebleness as he drew nigh to death, he said he felt so weak that if a knife were put into his hand he should hardly be able to stick it into a Dissenter. He was once dining in company with a French gentleman, who had been before dinner indulging in a variety of free thinking speculatious, and had ended by avowing himself a materialist. "Very good soup this," said Mr. Smith. "Oui, Monsieur, c'est excellente." "Pray, sir, do you believe in a cook?"

EDUCATED OFFICIALS.—"Diok Tinto," the foreign correspondent of the New York Times, illustrates qualifications and fitness of a majority of our foreign consuls with the following story:

A gentleman lately returned from his travels witnessed a curious scene at the American Embassy at one of the continental capitals. A native of the country came in and began to talk, of course, in his own language. None of the officers of the Legation could understand him. He then tried them in French, but they understood that no better. Seemingly very much astonished, he prepared for an effort and produced the following detached fragments of broken English:

"Me go Morica."

"Me want passport."

"Me, woman (wife) little girl."

This disjointed statement sufficed to convince the American Embassy that as the man was a foreigner, he had no need of a United States passport to enter the country; but how were they to tell him so, and how could they make him comprehend that he only required such passports as were necessary to quit Europe? The Secretary of Legation made a brief declaration to that effect in English, but the applicant was no wiser for it.

"Try him in broken English, then, Sam," suggested the second attaché.

"I don't know as I can," replied the Secretary; "however, I'll try."

"Foreigners no wants passport."

"Me no give passport to foreigner."

"America, great, free country; no passport dere."

"You want ds passport for go away Europe; no want de passport for go in America."

This lucid explanation seemed to satisfy the petitioner, for he bowed himself out, saying, "Me glad I come."

It would puzzle me to imagine what means of communication is resorted to at this Embassy, in case the applicants can neither talk nor understand "broken English."

There is an American Consul in France, whose clerk has instructions to "send off" all Frenchmen who can't converse in the Consul's mother tongue.

COOL IMPUDENCE.—"Will you oblige me with a light, sir?" "Certainly; with the greatest pleasure," says stranger, knocking off the ashes with his little finger, and presenting the red end of the cigar with a graceful bow. Smith commences fumbling in his coat pocket, takes out his handkerchief; shakes it; feels in his vest with a desperate energy; looks blank. "Well! I do declare, I have'nt got one, true as the world. Have you another, you could spare?" "Certainly, (says stranger with a smile,) and I beg you will accept it." There is a puff, puffing till the fresh cigar ignites, when they separate with a suave bow and a wave of the hand. Smith chucks his friend, who was near splitting with laughter, under the ribs, with—"There! did'nt I tell you I would get it? That's the way to get along in the world. Nothing like cool, polite impudence!" We thought so too.

MISSISSIPPI.—The Jackson "Flag of the Union" has changed hands and become the property of Col. W. A. Purdom, who will be its future editor and publisher. The Port Gibson Herald has also changed hands and become the property of W. F. Eleely. The Herald of Friday last has the following paragraph:

The tailoring establishment of Mr A. J. Carnahan, in this town, was entered on Sunday night last by some person and robbed of cloth and clothing to the amount of $140. The editorial room of the editor of the Reveille, was also entered the same night, and robbed of a gold watch, money, clothing, and other property, to the value of about $300. No clue has as yet been ascertained that leads to the detection of the thief.

On Sunday night last, the steamer Frank Lyon, on her downward trip, run on the bar just above Vicksburg, where she now lies and where she will remain (unless launched) until the rise in the river next winter. She will have good chance to repair her hull, as a fall in the river of a few feet, which will occur soon, will leave her in "dry dock." The R. W. McRae takes her place in the trade. [Vicksburg Whig.

TELEGRAPHIC INTELLIGENCE.—Washington, July 9.—A Cabinet meeting was held here this afternoon, which lasted over four hours, all the members were present, being engaged, it is understood, in disposing of business that has accumulated during the absence of the President. No definite action was had on the new appointments of Commissioners of the Land and Patent offices.

Secretary Dobbin leaves here to-morrow for the Virginia hot Sulphur Springs. Gen. Cushing is also expected to leave Washington shortly.

Boston, July 9.—Mr. Tuckerman, late treasurer of the Eastern Railroad Company, has confessed to an embezzlement of the company's funds to the amount of $207,000. The defalcations have been going on for several years. A committee of investigation was appointed, who reported the road in a favorable condition with the above exception. It is stated that Tuckerman invested largely towards sustaining Dr. Morton's claim to the ether discovery.

Cleveland, July 7.—The propeller J. W. Brooks, hence for Ogdensburg, blew up fifteen miles from Ashtabula, yesterday. Two engineers were badly scalded and will probably die. One fireman and one deckhand jumped overboard and were drowned. There were ten or twelve passengers on board, but none of them were injured.

SINGULAR BALLOON ACCIDENT.—A dispatch of the 5th inst, from Chicago, says:

Mr. S. M. Brooks, the aeronaut, made a balloon ascension here yesterday. An immense crowd witnessed the performance. The balloon ascended a considerable distance, and was carried in a south-westerly direction. It finally descended nearly to the earth, and was hurled by the wind against the St. Louis and Rock Island telegraph wires. The force of the collision broke both wires and cut the car from the balloon; the latter rose quickly out of sight. The aeronaut returned to the city with very slight injury.

There is now a continuous line of railway from St. Louis to Baltimore. The whole route through from Baltimore to St. Louis by this route is but 968 miles long, and may be traveled over in some forty-two hours' running time, while the distance to Philadelphia is sixty-three miles greater, and to New York of course is still eighty-seven miles further, while the old route, via Chicago and the lake roads, from St. Louis to New York, imposes one hundred and thirty-one miles more of travel than the new one. This, then, it would appear, is the shortest approach from St. Louis to the Atlantic.

AN INTERESTING PLEA.—The New York Knickerbocker Magazine tells the following: "Speaking of "little folks," we have them at our house, Frank three years old, and Ada, one. They have a very kind and indulgent mother, and persuasions and rewards, in the shape of bona-bons, frequently take the place of the more severe discipline that once was considered indispensable. Ada was a "little out of sorts" she day, and crying lustily; her mother, handing her a cake said, "Take this, and stop your crying." Frank, who had been playing merrily—a moment before, suddenly burst into a terrible fit of grief: "Mamma, give me a piece of cake to stop my crying!"

THE DILLON CASE.—We have satisfied ourself that the pother with newspapers over the condition of the questions arising out of the Dillon affair, between our Minister in Paris and the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, is all gammon. That is, the correspondence between the two Governments on the subject has so far been of the most friendly character, and that there exists no likelihood whatever of the least misunderstanding to grow out of it. All stories or rumors to the contrary, whether emanating from Paris or Washington, are unworthy of credit. This may be relied on, as it embodies the firm belief in the premises of all the representatives of foreign governments here. [Wash. Star.

THE GOLD MINES ON THE UPPER ARKANSAS. The St. Louis Intelligencer, of the 4th inst., says:

A letter to the Warsaw Democrat, from Richard Jones, at Empire Hill, Ouachita Mountains, the locality of the newly discovered gold mines west of Arkansas, speaks favorably of the quantity of yellow metal there. The gold is said to be confined to the Ouachita Mountains. Richard Jones has averaged from eight to sixteen dollars per day at surface digging, no deep end thorough work having yet been done. The emigration is increasing, and no attack from the Indians has taken place, though constantly apprehended.

THE "OLDEST INHABITANT."—The editor of the Annapolis Republican has had a visit from one of the oldest men, perhaps, in Maryland, Mr. Richard Crandell, who was born in Anne Arundel county on the 16th of July, 1747, and therefore will be 108 years of age the 16th of this month. He has not the appearance of a man of over 80, and even last fall he sowed nearly all the grain on his farm. He is in enjoyment of most excellent health and spirits; and at one hundred, he says, he had not a grey hair in his head. He served as a privateer during the Revolution, and relates many interesting facts connected with the struggle for American independence.

The Clarksvills (Texas) Messenger of a recent date says:

The genial showers of last week has been quite sufficient to insure a plentiful yield of corn, even should there be no more rain during the season. We predict that corn will be sold for twenty-five cents before October. Oats have turned out much better than was expected, though not a full crop. Wheat has yielded an abundant harvest. We hear of one gentleman, Mr Scaff, having made an average of thirty-two bushels to the acre. There is still a supply of old corn among our planters, sufficient to last until the new crop is ready for use. The weather is at present excessively warm and dry, though the weather-wise prophesy rain in a few days.

SLAVE BURNING IN MASSACHUSETTS.—The Washington Era, an Abolition paper, having commented strongly upon a late Lynch law outrage in Alabama, where a negro who had first violated and then tortured to death a little white girl, was seized and then burnt alive by an infuriated mob—an Alabama paper retorts as follows:

"In a recent biography of the late Rev. Dr. Coleman—an eminent clergyman of Boston—printed by Mervine & Whipple, mention is made of one of his ancestors who, a few years previous to the revolution, was 'poisoned by three of his negro slaves; Mark, Phillis and Phœbe.' The biography says:

"The two former were convicted and executed. The place of Mark's execution was on the northerly side of Cambridge road, about a quarter of a mile above the Peninsula, and the gibbet remained until a short time before the revolution. Phillis was burned at the stake, about ten yards from the gallows."

A monument is about to be erected in Monument Square, Savannah, in honor of Gen. Nathaniel Greene, of Revolutionary memory. Mr. Launitz, the accomplished artist of the Pulaski monument, will furnish the design.

AFFAIRS IN THE CRIMEA.

THE STEAMSHIP PACIFIC'S NEWS.

The principal features of the news by the Pacific have been already received here by telegraph, or anticipated by dispatches of the Arago's account. The following, however, will be found highly interesting:

Journal of the Siege.

PARIS, June 9.—From 1 o'clock until 9 in the evening no shot was fired on either side, while the dark body which crossed the bay between the Mamelon and the Round Tower, or remained in front of the quarries, were removed from the field of slaughter. Both on the French and on the Russian there were large numbers result-ed over the ground of the chief conflict; among the former a large proportion were swarthy indigenes of Arab blood, or, as they are popularly termed by the French soldiers, Turcos and to their contingent of the killed some were added from the very inside of the Malakoff, showing how near the ungrounds attack was delivering the place into our hands. Of the Russians there lay still upon the spot some two hundred corpses, a sufficient testimony to the severity of their losses in the struggle. Among the dead there was observed by one of our Sergeants one partially in English and partially in Russian accouterments. In the language which custom has stereotyped he pointed it to the attention of the Russian burying party to the body, and said, "No English," "Russ," "No Russ," "English." Even the apply-ing further examination of the uniform strengthened the impression that it could be no other than a deserter from the 34th, who went over to the enemy some time back, and a mount that regiment coming by recognized the face and put the matter beyond a doubt. The man had received a less ignoble death than he deserved.

The interval afforded another opportunity, rapidly taken advantage of, of getting another look at Sebastopol and the Mamelon. The rugged, chaneulled and shot bonbed outlines of the fortress grew larger and more real as you wound up to it; but the interior altogether unknown until that moment, excited a more vivid feeling, and alike outside and inside attested the fierceness of the struggle and the pluck of the assailants. The surfaces of the ground within were cut into holes and pits, here like an old stone quarry, there like a bit of Chinese vine-yard; some of these were the effects of bursting shells with well timed fuses, some the cunning apparatus of the hardy and prolonged defense. The corpses which cumbered the earth and were in process of removing gave out faint tokes of coming putrefaction; Russian guns dismounted and dented with shot and splinters, lay tumbled below their embrasures; fifty or so were concealed beneath the debris, and some quantity of hidden powder was also rooted out of the subterranean recesses which abounded in the rock. Three were excavated in the inner face of the entrenchments, were left warm by their previous occupants—food and implements of labor were found in them, and among other things a bit of fishing net in course of construction.

The nearer view alone revealed the stupendous character of the earthworks; still, if astonishment were now a stale sentiment the eye-witness would have been simply astonished at the amount of labor lavished on them. The traverses appeared to be two-eighteen feet in height. An English lady—where will they not go? climb do they not go?—was brought by her husband, an officer, to survey the place—perchance herself had derided his coming. On the further side the view into the barrier was straight and short, and from the furthest point to which access was allowed, it seemed as if a bowshot would carry to the ships anchored beneath the hill. The Round Tower looked, even to experienced eyes, less formidable from that proximity than it had been judged from the distant points of view. How, indeed, could it longer con impregnable when the Russians were bringing out of it forty or fifty corpses of French soldiers who had won their way into its heart?

In the early part of the day there had been a popular impulse to believe that an end of the affair would be made to-night by a combined assault on the Malakoff and the Redan.

We had a great number of casualties during the night in our new position on the left, into which the Russians sent flying grapes and roundshot from the batteries which protect the rear of the Redan. They also ejected over and deposited her cargo of about 1000 shells in the water. But for the diving bell on the spot, they would have become a permanent puzzle to the fishes, who would have taken no doubt, quarters in them according to precedence. By the aid of the divers they are coming up again, and having been presented from drowning will end, it is thought, by being shot.

The Fighting of June 18.

The actual number of our own killed and wounded in the recent attack on the Redan is not that terrible account which was at first supposed. When it was stated that the loss of our noble army was not less than 4 000, that was interpreted to mean the British loss alone; and it was inferred that, if we had lost so many, the loss of the French must have been 10 000, or more. It now appears that the number of killed and wounded in the whole Allied army does not exceed 5 000, of which our portion was just under 1 300. The number of non-commissioned officers and men killed is 144 and wounded 1 056; the total number of officers killed and wounded is 93—making the exact total 1 295. The enemy, it appears, boast that they have taken 600 French prisoners, which, in the present state of our knowledge, we can only suspect to be a Russian exaggeration.

The whole loss numerically is not so great as what we have suffered in the space of a few days, without glory and without any addition to the rolls of honor by cholera or by frost. It is lamentable, not so much for its number, nor yet for such men as Campbell, Yea and Shadforth, who, having done so much, have fallen outside the walls they desired to enter, as because this is a reverse, a check, a delay. It cannot really affect the ultimate fate of Sebastopol, but must prolong a struggle, every day of which is so much is lost to the interests of peace, to the happiness of many nations, and the cause of humanity. So far as regards the more material part of the question, no doubt we are already in a better position than we were on the morning of the 18th. No doubt our batteries are in better order, our guns heavier, our knowledge of the position and of the obstacles before us greatly increased, and the force in the front augmented. To concentrate our army on the siege, we have been obliged to leave the inhabitants of Kertch in the hands of our Allies.

As the siege continues, one consideration after another will be sacrificed to the necessity of our position, and it may even come to pass that we shall be driven to the most cruel and wasteful of all courses—investment and blockade.

It depends on ourselves whether this affair is to operate as a warning, or is to be a sample of all that we do, and are still to do in the course of this siege. Are we always to accept from the enemy the terms of the combat? Are we to confine ourselves to punishing up a hill created by his artillery; standing on our own defence against his advancing columns, carrying the works that he throws up in our way, and attacking, after many days of actual and mutual preparation, the particular points on which he has concentrated all his energy, skill and resources? It is very clear that if we are to let the enemy take the initiative, stake the lists, and impose all the conditions of the conflict, we can hardly expect to escape heavy losses, even if not actually defeated.

For aught we know, that is, for aught that has transpired, the Russians were able not only to devote all their strength for ten days to rendering a comparatively small length of defense utterly impregnable, and full of such cunres as no forethought could provide against, but also to employ their whole garrison in the defense. We have never yet been able to surprise the Russians. They know the time of our intended movements as soon as our own army; and when to this is added a like certainty as to the point and the mode of attack, then the assault is reduced to the lowest conditions of success; then defense is raised to the most favorable, not to say an absolute certainty of success.

As far as the nature of the defences is known in this country, there is no reason why three or four simultaneous assaults should not have been made on various points of the fortifications from the Flagstaff Battery to the Quarantine Bay, why the first should not have taken its chance in the work, and why threatening demonstration should not have been made by the portion of our army on the Tchernaya. When the details arrive, it may turn out that more was there done in this way than has been communicated in the necessarily brief messages of the electric telegraph; but we cannot disguise our fear that from want of some such ordinary and safe precaution there has been a wasteful sacrifice of men.

The siege is latterly assumed the solemn pace of a grand battle war. It would seem as if the auguries had been taken, the decree of Heaven had been read, and that Sebastopol is not to be taken till the third, or possibly the tenth year. Meanwhile, we are to have a succession of engagements, in which the victory is to incline to this or that side, with all the vacillation of the ancient epic.

For inscrutable reasons the allies shrink from following up an advantage at the moment when victory deserves her name; from fear to lose. They have always stopped, like the aged and weary hero of from their day's toil, to recruit their thoughts, as if an army of near two hundred thousand men did not contain the materials of perpetual youth, sleepless activity, and inexhaustible strength. On the 7th the fortifications of both the Redan and Malakoff tower were actually entered by the allies; and, though in few that entered did not return, that is no reason why a reserve of sufficient force, and fresh for the assault, might not have been poured in with the retreating Russians and have made good their ground.

Lord Panmure has received the following list of officers killed or who have died of their wounds, on the 18th of June:

Major General Sir John Campbell;
Colonel Yea, 7th Regiment;
Lieut. Col. Shadforth, 57th Regiment;
Lieutenant Muorant, 15th Regiment;
Lieutenant Bailes, 38th Regiment;
Lieutenant Ashwin, 57th Regiment;
Lieutenant-Below, 34th Regiment;
Captain Sclifner, 34th Regiment;
Captain Robinson, 34th Regiment;
Lieutenant Hurl, 34th Regiment;
Lieutenant Alt, 34th Regiment;
Captain Forman, Rifle Brigade;
Captain Jones, Royal Engineers;
Lieutenant Murray, Royal Engineers;
Lieutenant Graves, Royal Engineers;
Captain Fenwick 44th Regiment;
Captain Hamil. U. Agar, 44th Regiment;
Captain Caulfield, 41th Regiment;
Lieut and Adj. Hodson, 7th Regiment;

During the suspension of arms for the burial of the dead on the 8th of June there was naturally flocking with curiosity to examine the scene of the terrible contest of the previous night, to contemplate the works by which the Russians had contrived to make and hold that strong position and to observe the effect of our fire on those huge entrenchments. It is the first time that our engineers have had the opportunity of examining thoroughly the extraordinary fortifications which have so long and so effectually baffled their efforts. The traverses are described by our correspondent as about 18 feet in height, and the mass of earth which must have been raised to give solidity to such a work can only be compared to the embankment of the railway of the same altitude.

When it is remembered that this enormous extension of the fortifications of Sebastopol was only begun at the close of the winter, and that it has been pushed to its present state of strength by the powerful energy and of the rocky nature of the soil, the result does the highest honor to the skill, daring, and industry of the garrison. It is not too much to say that the occupation of the Mamelon has retarded the fall of the place by a couple of months, and the importance the Russians attached to the defense of it was by no means exaggerated.

But, on the other hand, as this great work now forms part of the French lines, and these enormous embankments have already been turned against the trenches, the attack on this point has acquired a solidity which it never before possessed. It is, moreover, highly satisfactory to learn that, in spite of the magnitude and the perfection to which the Russians had brought these earthworks, they were by no means proof against the fire brought to bear upon them.

The embrasures are described to us by one of our correspondents as knocked into formless mounds, the traverses overthrown, the gun dismounted, and the devastation of the batteries well nigh completed before the attack of the French was made. Whenever the Mamelon is completely armed, and the fire directed against the works it so long served to protect, the same results will be produced on the next line of defense, and the fire of these batteries, as we know, already extends over great part of the harbor. Thus the progress of the siege is perfectly regular, though slow, each concentric line of the works being first reduced by the fire of that which lies beyond it, and then turned against the next portion of the defenses lying within it. The latest accounts inform us that our engineers are now advancing upon the Malakoff Tower by regular approaches, (and, in fact, laying siege to that work which may be considered as the citadel of the eastern side of Sebastopol. To forward an attack on batteries without approaches is always rash, though often successful; but with the usual modes of conducting siege operations the reduction of any given point is a mere question of time.

It is evident, from the last reports we have received, that the bombardment did establish a marked superiority of the fire of the Allies over that of the Russians; for while our correspondents have been enabled to witness and describe the results of the fire on the Russian works, not a gun was dismounted in our trenches, and not a parapet thrown down. Indeed, the enemy appear to have slackened their fire from a conviction that, as long as it was confined to answering the lines of the besiegers, it would do us but little mischief. The heavy losses recently sustained by the enemy are much more attributable to those occasions on which our troops have had to support the fire of the Russian batteries in advanced positions, affording very inadequate shelter, and no means of replying with effect to the enemy's heavy guns.

Considering the magnitude of the enterprise against Sebastopol, and the extraordinary difficulties which have been overcome, it is remarkable that the attack of the 18th is the first abortive attempt which has been made in the whole course of the siege, and that the Generals have usually confined themselves to those objects which their means at the time enabled them with certainty to effect. One of the greatest principles of the art of war is to be daring and to be prudent in season—to carry success to its furthereat point, and so it were to ride the crest of the wave; but at the same time, to be cautious in the commencement of each operation, and to attempt nothing except at the proper time. We express our opinion we may form on these points with diffidence, and with an ample reservation in favor of the more complete knowledge we shall hereafter obtain of the facts; but the principles which govern operations in this nature are so well known and established that a mere observer may sometimes judge of them with more justice than those who are engaged in the heat of action.

The news of the war is more than usually grave. We have indeed still to learn the particulars of our disasters on the 18th, and are still without tidings of any further attempt; but while we wait time we reserve and nature takes its course. Lord Raglan's iron constitution, though laughing even ways in a cause that has laid many a younger and stronger man low, and his lordship has, we are told, requested to be relieved of his command. In order to return home General Simpson, we believe, will succeed him in the command-in-chief. General Estcourt, Deputy-Adjutant-General has fallen a victim to the cholera, and one of the first duties of the new Commander-in-Chief will be to appoint a successor to his, not capable of its duties. Another, less exciting the deepest regret is Captain Lyons, whose talents and enterprise marked him for the command of the expedition to the Sea of Azoff, in spite of his comparative youth, and who amply justified the wisdom of the choice, has died of his wound. It appears that, in his anxiety to make a thorough reconnaissance of Kaffa, he approached so near to the port that, standing on the paddle-box of his ship, he received a rifle ball in his leg. He did not think much of it at the time, but the extreme heat, the excitement of the occasion, and probably also a degree of vexation of being thus unnecessarily disabled, checked the healing process, and deprived the service of the very promising officer to whom we owe our very first naval success in this war. It is evident that the summer is beginning to tell severely as the winter and that it becomes ordinary prudence to make the best of our strength while we have it. We have to choose between war and disease. Miss Nightingale is about to return home. Miss Stanley has already, we learn, arrived.

No doubt that, as the war changes its character, as the conflict draws nearer and closer, as we fight one part of Sebastopol against the other, the arsenal against the town, and the south side against the north—further, as we advance into the interior, and pursue the foe through defiles, over steppes and across marshes, we shall have many more such budgets as that of this morning. The tardy resolutions of a divided Legislature, and the best intended measures of an honest government, will be anticipated by many a removal and many a promotion by Death's own hand, but is needless to say that we never regarded with favor propositions of a retrospective and even vindictive character. They do not become either the gravity of the subject the dignity of Parliament, and in the most pervasive manner in the world—namely, by putting one hand on the young men's shoulder, and with the other fumbling in his own coat pocket—asked him to step ashore and get married. The young man awoke to a sense of his unjustness; and consented. In half an hour, he was married and happy; the brother-in-law acting as his groomsman, and wishing him joy when the ceremony was over.

Now who is prophetic enough to tell which of the above marriages will and in the greatest happiness?

New Orleans Money Market.

THURSDAY Evening, July 10, 1855.

The destructive fire this morning and the rain during the day caused great interruption to out-door operations, and the day passed without any other change than occasioned by these circumstances.

We observe further arrivals of cotton, which, with the receipts of produce from the West, seem to keep up some action in the levee, when not interrupted by showers of rain, which are becoming too frequent for the comfort of our commercial community.

The telegraphic advices by the Canada, three days later from Europe, had but little effect on the market. All thoughts which are not influenced by events in the Crimea are turned towards the condition of our great staple; as we from day to day receive favorable accounts of its progress. We were informed to-day that a bale of this year's growth of cotton had been actually gathered and was in market; as we here not seen it, we can only conclude the announcement is premature and the report had its origin from interested motives. There was a moderate inquiry for money to-day. The offerings of short paper in bank are falling off, from the circumstance that very moderate sums mature here in September, October and November. Of long paper, all falling due this side of March next has (or a great share has) been safely stowed away in the pocte-feuilles and the boxes of buyers and bears for some time, unless an occasional sale transpires.

There was but moderate enquiry for Exchange to-day. The banks are selling on New York at ¼ per cent., and of time bills we did not hear of a sale. Sterling is dull. First class drawers for direct remittance hold at 10 to 10¼ prem. Bills with shipping documents since negotiated at 9¼, which is the rate of yesterday and the day previous, though some drawers are holding at 9 and a fraction over. In France there is no inquiry at present rates, say 5.12½ to 5.08¾—a decline would in all probability bring out buyers. On Western cities there is only a moderate demand, which is freely supplied by private drawers on change street at par to ¼ discount on Louisville, and ¼ to ½ per cent. premium on St. Louis; ¼ per cent. dis. on Nashville.

The steamship Granada for New York on to-morrow morning, will take $50,000 in silver, chiefly Mexican dollars, with some old coinage of American stamp, shipped by

John S Preston	$5,000
R. B. Marshall & Co	30,000
	$50,000

None of this comes out of the banks.

The only sale of Stock to-day was 22 shares of Union Bank on P. T.

"THE LAST LEAF."

BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

I saw him once before,
As he passed by the door,
And again
The pavement stones resound,
As he totters o'er the ground
With his cane.

They say that in his prime,
Ere the pruning knife of Time
Cut him down
Not a better man was found,
By the crier on his round
Through the town.

But now he walks the streets,
And he looks on all he meets
Sad and wan,
And he shakes his feeble head,
That he seems as if he said
They are gone.

The mossy marbles rest
On the lips that he has prest
In their bloom,
And the names he loved to hear
Have been carved for many a year
On the tomb.

My grandmamme has said—
Poor lady she is dead
Long ago—
That he had a Roman nose,
And his cheek was like a rose
In the snow.

But now his nose is thin,
And it rests upon his chin
Like a staff;
And a crook in his back,
And a melancholy crack
In his laugh.

I know it is a sin
For me to sit and grin
At him here;
But his old three-cornered hat,
And his breeches, and all that,
Are so queer!

And if I should live to be
The last leaf upon the tree
In the spring;
Let them smile, as I do now,
At the old forsaken bough
Where I cling.

Lamb and Mint Sauce with Green Peas.

Hind-quarter of the type of innocence,
Whether with pea-coat mint I must dispense,
Or go the twain, blaspheming the expense,
And thus enjoy thee in the tullest sense—
That is the question.

Next section of young mutton, tender food,
Just in the dawn of grass-fed juicyhood,
Dainties like thee should not be served up nude,
But graced with all the trimmings understood
To help digestion.

Then tell the peas, the fragrant mint prepare,
Be thou prime joint, nor sirerdone, nor rare;
Concoct the gravy with exceeding care;
When all is ready serve—I shall be there,
I always am.

Incipient sheepmeat, when on thee I dine,
All table pleasures in thy taste combine;
Three cities midway of the leg be mine;
Then put the rest away—for any one
Is cold roast Lamb.

BIRDS AND INSECTS.—Wilson Flagg, in a late number of Hovey's Magazine, makes five classes of insects, and as many of birds acting as a natural check upon the increase of insects.

The swallows are the natural enemies of the swarming insects, living almost entirely upon them, taking their food upon the wing. The common Martin devours great quantities of wasps, beetles and goldsmiths. A single bird will devour five thousand butterflies in a week. The moral of this is, that the husbandmen should cultivate the society of swallows and martins about his land and out-buildings.

The sparrows and wrens feed upon the falling insects that lurk within the buds, foliage and flowers of plants. The wrens are pugnacious, and a little box in a cherry tree will soon be appropriated by them, and they will drive away other birds that feed upon the fruit; a hint that cherry growers should remember in spring and act upon.

The thrushes, blue birds, jays and crows prey upon butterflies, grasshoppers, crickets, locusts and the larger beetles. A single family of jays will consume 200,000 of these in a season of three months.

The woodpeckers are armed with a stout long bill, to penetrate the wood of trees, where the borers deposit their larvæ. They live almost entirely upon these worms.

Texas in the Olden Time.

An old inhabitant of Texas relates the following episode in his experience during the early days of that State:

He once had occasion to make a journey of some thirty or forty miles, and his wife having prepared his provisions, (in case he should have to camp out,) among which were some nicely baked cakeramina biscuits—she having by some chance obtained a small supply of flour, and retained sufficient recollection of the luxuries of former days to enable her to "do them up brown"—he started very early, and the way being lonesome, he rode fast for some time, until he emerged into a large prairie, when he observed some person on horseback a mile or two ahead. He spurred up his horse to overtake the traveler, keeping his eye upon him all the time, when he saw him go down into the bottom of a small creek, at the crossing. He rode on very quietly, expecting each moment to see the traveler's head appear above the horizon, until more than sufficient time had elapsed for him to emerge from the bottom, when our friend became alarmed, lest the Indians had shot him with an arrow. So he steered for a crossing a short distance above, nearing his way very cautiously, gun in hand. As he was crossing the creek, he observed the traveler's horse tied to a bush in the bottom, but as he could see nothing of the owner, he concluded to "make tracks" as fast as possible, when, as he rode up the opposite bank, he was hailed with:

"Hello, stranger, hold on a few minutes; I'm going that way myself directly."

Thereupon our friend stopped, and looking carefully in the direction of the voice, discovered its owner laying with his feet up the slope of the bank at an angle of 45 degrees, while his head was immersed in the water; but a small portion of his phiz being perceptible.

"What the thunder are you doing there?" enquired our friend.

"Why, I'm soaking my head to get this infernal raw-hide cap off; the sun has drawn it so tight that it won't come off, and it makes my head ache dreadful."

After the stranger had eased his aching temples by the removal of his raw-hide cap, the two journeyed on for some miles together, when the traveler branched off, and our friend jogged on solitary and alone until he arrived at his destination, a short time before sundown. Being an old acquaintance, every one was glad to see him. The children came in, and after shaking hands with them all, he went to his saddlebags, and taking out some of his biscuits, gave them all one apiece; well knowing that it was seldom they ever saw such luxuries.

After sitting a while in the house, in conversation with the "old folks," he heard the children making considerable noise over something in the yard, and being seated near the door where he could look out and observe them, he turned around to see what they were at. One of the children was between him and the object of their sport; on its moving its position, he saw that they had one of the biscuits on the ground, with a coal of fire on the top crust, one of the boys on his knees before it, and the remainder watching with the most intense interest for some event which he could not divine, until one of the boys exclaimed:

"Blow a little harder, Jim, blast him he'll stick his head out directly!"

Our friend fainted. He was aware that biscuits were an article but seldom seen at that time, but that half-grown children should mistake clean, nice, dome-brown biscuits for highland terrapins, was too great a shock for his nerves to withstand.

LAFOURCHE ITEMS.—By the kindness of a gentleman lately arrived from Lafourche, we have learned some particulars of what is transpiring in that section, that have not as yet been made public.

The cholera is prevailing very extensively all along the Bayou Lafourche, and is of an exceedingly malignant type. It broke out suddenly about five days since, and within this short space of time there has been about thirty deaths. The people are panic struck, and escaping in all directions.

Claiborne is also prevailing among the horses, mules and cattle of many plantations, to an extent never before known. Indeed, the disease itself is a new-comer in the region. Some planters have lost from twenty to thirty head of horses and mules, and a great number of cattle.

The cane and corn crops, refreshed by the recent rains, have taken new life, and are now the most promising ever known in that section.

Bayou Lafourche is in good navigable condition for small boats as high up as Lockport—about fifty miles from the mouth.

LOUISIANA.—The editor of the Baton Rouge Comet has had his coat stolen, and proposes to mail a ten dollar note upon the picket, which the thief can have by leaving the coat in its place.

The Franklin Banner, of Thursday last, says:

We have had no rain for several days past in this county. The weather is delightful, with refreshing breezes from the Gulf, and considering the severe ordeal our crops have undergone, they look remarkably fine—far beyond any anticipation. Our planters have indeed reason to be thankful, for at one time their case was hopeless.

Yesterday was warmer than any of the preceding days. In the afternoon, at three o'clock, the mercury stood at 91 deg. in the shade, under the Odd Fellows' Hall.

The Plaquemine Sentinel, of Saturday last, says:

We understand that the bodies of a white man and a negro were taken out of the river at this place and buried a day or two since; we did not learn that they had any distinguishable marks upon them. They were, doubtless, the bodies of the unfortunate Magnolia Brasher [illegible] also a quantity of cotton caught in [illegible]

A Visit to the Catacombs of Paris.

BY OCTAVES LACIOX.

We made one of a hundred curious visitors among whom were Mr. Haussmann, Prefect of the Seine, the Ottoman Ambassador, an Armenian Bishop and his Vicar, Dr. Paul Gaimard, the accomplished and witty traveler, several professors, literati and artists, besides a goodly company of women of fashion. The gate by which we entered, is situated with an interior court of the Octroi Office, at the barrier D'Enfer. Each one was provided with a lighted torch and a tinder box. We commenced the descent immediately, by a long and very narrow spiral staircase, one on which two children even could not have walked abreast; after descending one hundred and fifty steps, being then more than a hundred feet below the surface of the earth, we took, by direction of the guides attached to the Catacombs, one of the many galleries that opened before us. The road, like the staircase, is of the narrowest kind, but smooth and vaulted with great care, and nearly everywhere of the height of five or six feet. Here and there upon the walls, are inscribed the quarters of Paris, with that of the parish under which you are passing; and along the roof a black line has been drawn to indicate the road. But let no one trust too confidently to its guidance, for the line is frequently broken; and any visitor who should blindly advance twenty or thirty steps into this labyrinth of galleries and corridors unattended, could only by a miracle retrace his way.

From place to place, you find both the floor and roof a little humid, and water trickling down the walls, but not sufficient to prevent your passing farther or continuing your way. Having walked thus along the road of the Catacombs, for thirty or thirty-five minutes—the same is frequently repeated on the walls—you find before you a gateway of cut stone, covered with funeral inscriptions, in French and Latin; so, stop—your feet are on the ashes of the dead: Hic sunt beatam resurrectionem expectandes, etc., etc. Directly over the door on the lintel, these two words, Memoriæ Majorum are carved in large raised letters. This gate is kept locked; it was opened to us, and then we indeed, penetrated the Catacombs; then we were in the real Necropolis. Here the galleries are broader, and the roof higher; the air within is cooler too, but impregnated with a cadaverous odor that surrounds you instantly, clings in a moment to your face, your hands, and your clothes.

These catacombs are in a special manner the last abode, the eternal domain of the dead. From the different cemeteries of Paris, they have been brought here, heaped up in large wagons or well filled hearses, and these remains as they are more or less unbroken, or black, or brown, or humid, or dry, all are placed in order like the books in a library in their arrangements. The bones are formed into crosses and lozenges, placed one upon the other just as the size permitted, every stage is two or three feet in height, uniformly crowned by a row of skulls, which serve, in their turn, for the foundation of another story. The artist has sometimes varied his models; thus he has amused himself with the construction of a large cross with his pedestal, the latter formed of skulls, chosen from something striking or singular in their aspect. Each cabinet of the dead is, as it were, ticketed, and bears graven upon the separating stone, the name of the cemetery, from which its contents were drawn, and the date of their translation to the catacombs, here and there are cut in convents of monks and nuns. In a separate corner are entered the remains of the prisoners massacred in September, '92. These bones are not yet duly moulded and stripped by corruption, so as to be admitted to their final place in this funeral museum. In the spot exposed upon a table (not far from a thermometer which stands at 10 deg.) are some extraordinary bodies and curious bones, upon which the hand of time, has pressed in a peculiar manner, hardening some, and softening others, or covering them with a yellowish and sterile moss, a species of humid lichen. At other points bones are heaped upon each other, pell-mell, awaiting the ingenious hand of their arranger. There are likewise at regular intervals, wells five or six feet deep; in these, the water shows so clear and fresh, it would almost enkindle thirst, did you not discover at the bottom some wrecks of humanity that have fallen from the surrounding heaps; there they rot, yet neither change, nor cloud, the crystal clearliness of the surface.

Every where along the road, are Greek, Latin, Italian and French inscriptions, drawn, sometimes from Holy Writ, sometimes from profane authors, ancient and modern—Homer and Dante, Solomon and Seneca, Horace and Ezekiel, Maldiatre, Gilbert, the Abbe Delille,—all these have furnished sonorous and ambitious sentences, better fitted to awaken the imagination of the living, than to touch the heart. On, on, stretches this long gallery of bones and skulls; it spreads to the right to the left—it is before—it is behind—onward for several leagues, uninterrupted, uniform, monotonous and terrible. The dead, the dead—and still the dead; there are not less than ten millions of human relics mingled and confounded together here, in this dark, silent, and subterranean city. Ten millions of men—think on that, on what an immense crowd, and all these have noisily traversed the earth. They have thought—they have written—they erected cities—they swayed or agitated kingdoms—they knew the paths and plots of ambition—they had their balls and their feasts—their marriages and their masquerades—they laughed, they wept—this one prayed, that one defied God—but—all have alike disappeared.

There they lie; some were beauties in their day, some were plain; there are dandies, and coquettes, and prudes, miracle mongers and unbelievers, who can tell them now? Dead kings and princes, and poor davils too; beggars, vagabonds, the lame, the halt and the leperous, but all are quiet. There they touch, they enfold, they amalgamate together, they bear a horrible resemblance to each other, for all their fleshless heads wear the same grin; not the most skillful could tell a Messalina from a Lucretia, or Francis the First from a Tribonian, Hamlet from Yorick, the Christian from the Jew, the Court of the King of France from that of the miracles, Richelieu from a hackney coachman, or Madame de Pompadour from a fish fag. All are on the same level now.

A species of fear and horror comes over the soul as you traverse the numerous paths and defiles which appear like the streets and squares of some city of our progenitors; you walk slowly, you speak little and in under tones and your face grows bloodless. One of our party was a young girl of twenty-five perhaps, dressed not only with elegance but distinction; besides this, she was handsome, and of a good figure; her eyes were of an intelligent and an expressive blue, her hair chesnut, a small and delicate foot appeared beneath the silken folds of her dress, and in a lilac tinted glove was hidden a lightly moulded patrician hand. This woman (by the way) had immediately attracted every eye, and surely her youth and grace most justly deserved our attention. She brought to every mind, amid the destruction and unwearying havoc of death, the immortality of nature, ever fertile, ever renewing; she was a garland of spring and love, a wanderieg memory of the upper earth and the living, where pairing birds were now shaking in their frolics the flowers of the jessamine, and where other couples were walking with a silent step beneath the groves of mighty trees, forgetting the world in their own sweet promise, like Faust and Marguerite, or seeking each other amidst balls and masques, like Romeo and Juliet.

Still when examined closely, there was upon her face a kind of coldness and hardihood—her lip was wanting in sincerity, and her eye in modesty. I said, as I took my second view of her, this woman could see father, mother, husband and even her son in peril, without much emotion or much regret; she is marble. And my opinion is correct. I was leisurely convinced of it as we traveled the catacombs. Never one serious thought, never one elevated sentiment at any time crossed that beautiful face; it remained impassible, with one unchanged, eternal smile; it was not from distraction, it was not from lightness; it was the cold and calm indifference of a heart which is sealed up and hears nothing. On the way she looked upon the hideous and deaaded skulls; she even touched and lifted them with her fragile and coquettish hand, still smiling, just as she would if glancing at a rose. Our visit to the catacombs lasted more than an hour and a half. Then we returned to the gallery and corridors, to the narrow staircase; finally, in a few minutes, we were once again in a city of the living. But to see us as we moved before each other, still affrighted and colorless, a passer-by would have exclaimed, pointing with his finger, like the old woman of Florence, to the strange and pallid Alighieri, "See they have just returned from Hell."

LOUISIANA.—The Shreveport Southwestern, of the 4th inst., says:

The river continues to fall, and is getting down to low water mark. No change in the rates of freight or passage. Mr. Waldron is building a number of flatboats for the purpose of freighting cotton to the falls. As there is no prospect of the water rising, we advise planters residing on or near the river to build flats and ship their cottoe; if they cannot do that let them haul it to this port where it can be shipped.

The Democrat has the following paragraph:

Col Fuller, with his usual energy, is now engaged in operating in the region of the raft. The object is to get a navigable channel through Dooly's Bayou, and the lakes; and down through twelve mile Bayou into the river below. This important work will be vigorously prosecuted, and now is a good time to do the work, as the waters are low enough to permit operations without the least difficulty.

The people of Vidalia have been annoyed by thieves recently. The Intelligencer, of Friday last, says:

On Tdesday night, while sleeping alone in a room, adjacent to and belonging to the Vidalia House, Capt. I. J. Course, of our parish, was robbed of his clothing, and a pocket book with a small sum in change. Hat, shoes, clothing, all were taken, except his watch, which was under the pillow.

Mrs. Bunting's house was entered on the same night, and robbed of several valuable articles, the rogues having gained access to an unoccupied room:

The Bastrop (Morehouse parish) Times, of the 8th inst, records an affray between two citizens of that town, S. B. Hendrick and Dr. R. A. Phelps, in which the latter received three shots from a revolver, neither of which proved fatal.

The corps of engineers of the Vicksburg, Shreveport and Texas railroad have reached this place. They have permanently located and staked out the road between the Ouachita and Mississippi rivers. As far as we have heerd the survey has given entire satisfaction. This is the result of having men who understand their duty. [Ouachita Register, 5th.

The Harrisonburg (Catahoula Parish) Independent of Wednesday last, has the following paragraphs:

We learn that about the first of this week a young man named Abram Smith wee accidentally shot by a lad named Morris, on Wallace's ridge, in this perish. It seeme that the parties were out hunting, with a shot gun, the hammer of which would not stand when only half-cocked, and that while Morris, either forgetting or being unaware of this fact, was in the act of cocking the gun, it accidentally exploded, and the entire charge entered Smith's side, causing his death in a few hours.

The Democratic Convention convened at Winnsboro, in the parish of Franklin, in accordance with previous notice, on the 9th inst, and proceeded to the nomination of a candidate for this Senatorial District. Upon counting the ballots it was ascertained that the Hon. Francis Oliver, of this parish, was the nominee, he having received the votes of Catahoula and Franklin. Gen. Humble received the votes of the Caldwell delegation.

ECCENTRICITIES OF COSTUME.—There is no part of our costume, either male or female, which has not already passed from one extreme of absurdity to another, and been most admired at its highest point. Coats have been wore with voluminous skirts dangling about the wearer's heels, and with scanty lappels descending six inches below the waist. Coat sleeves at one time fitted skin-tight, and more than once have been so wide as to sweep the ground. Flapped waistcoats, which in the time of George I. reached nearly to the stocking; were soon out so short as to be nearer the arm-pits than the thigh. The close-fitting, tightly-strapped trousers contrasts indiscreetly with the trunkhose of the 16th century, stuffed out with five or six pounds of bran, to such an extent that as a Harleian manuscript tells us, alterations had to be made in the Parliament House so as to afford additional accommodations for the members' seats. It is related that a fast man of the time, on rising to conclude a visit of ceremony, had the misfortune to damage his nether integuments by a protruding nail in his chair—so that by the time he gained the door the escape of bran was so rapid as to cause a collapse. It may have been that similar mishaps caused the substitution of wool or hair for bran, which afterwards became common.

Holmes, in his "Notes of Dress," says: "A law was made against such as did stuffe their shyrtes to make them stand out; whereas, when a certain prisoner (in these tymes) was arounsed for wearing such bryches contrary to law, he began to excuse himself of the offence, and endeavored little and little to discharge himself of that which he did wear within them. He drew out a pair of sheets, two table cloths, ten napkins, four shirts, a brush, a glass, a combe and night cap, and other things of use, saying: 'Your lordship may understand that because I have no safer store-house, these pockets do serve me for a room to lay my goods in; and though it be a strait prison, yet it is a store-house big enough for them—for I have many things more yet of value within them.' And so his discharge was accepted and well laughed at."

NOW AND THEN.—On the eighteenth of June, eighteen hundred and fifty-five, the combined French and English forces assaulted the Redan and Malakoff towers before Sebastopol, and were defeated by the barbarous Russians with great slaughter. Forty years before, on the eighteenth of June, eighteen hundred and fifteen, the English and Bincher gained a great victory at Warterloo over the French and Napoleon the Great. Formerly the English celebrated the anniversary of the great day at Warterloo with great eclat; but they have changed all that now, and this year we have witnessed the delightful spectacle of the victors and the vanquished embracing each other, and mutually endeavoring to forget all about Waterloo, Wellington, Binoher, Grouchy, the great Napoleon, and several other matters equally gratifying to the British lion and distressing to the Gallic cock. But affection is, after all, a bore, says Delissier. One must have some exoitement on Waterloo day; and so he assaulted the southeastern defences of Sebastopol, and the Anniversary of Waterloo day was celebrated by the most disastrous and bloody defeat that the Allies have yet sustained. It is a singular and interesting historical coincidence. [N. Y. Herald.

PAINFUL ACCIDENT.—One of the most painful accidents, in some respects, that ever happened in this part of the country, occurred on the Greenville Railroad Saturday afternoon, about a mile and a half below Greenville. The locomotive of the train bound up, ran over a steer, which threw it off the track. It turned upside down on top of the engineer and fireman. The former was confined by his head and arm. The scalding water from the boiler ran over him, from the waist downward, and stood about him in a puddle. It was so hot that those who first went to his assistance were obliged to leave him and plunge into cold water immediately. All attempts to extricate him by pulling at the arm proving unsuccessful, the miserable man, in his agony, requesting those about him to cut his arm off—any way to get him out. In a few minutes, however, notwithstanding his extreme pain, he recovered his self-control, and, as soon as his head was released, coolly gave directions to those at work in raising the locomotive off his arm. Owing to the soft, swampy character of the ground, it was nearly an hour before he could be relieved. He died at three o'clock Sunday morning. His name was Dufore. The fireman, whose name is Loeg, was very badly bruised, and it is feared cannot recover. [Dayton (Ohio) Gazette.

A RAT WHIPPED BY A SQUIRREL.—One morning last week, a citizen of this village, while digging in his garden, heard a clatter in his barn. On repairing thither he was met by a tremendous large rat, fleeing for dear life, hotly pursued by four hens. As the rat passed he came in collision with the hoe, killing himself. The hens claimed the victory.—[Ogdensburgh Sentinel.

Captain Samuel Brady and Cornplanter.

A LEGEND OF THE ALLEGHANY RIVER.

Many of the wild legends of border strife and Indian barbarity that have been enacted along the shores of the Alleghany and Ohio have never been resoned from the dim and fading remembrances of a past ago. But occasionally a story of thrilling interest is snatched from the lingering records of the red man.

The story I am about to relate I received from an old Indian pilot of the Alleghany. It was many years ago, when that stern old chief, Cornplanter, (whose remains now repose in silence and loneliness on the banks of that beauteous river he loved so well,) was in his glory. His tribe roamed over the dense and unbroken forests along its banks, fearless, unmolested and free.

His people were hostile to the whites, and never lost any opportunity to lie in ambush and seize the lonely voynger as he descended the river, and consign him to the stake and the torture. But the watchful, shrewd, and deadly foe of Cornplanter and the whole "tawny race" was the indomitable and fearless Captain Samuel Brady. This veteran pioneer and Indian hunter was one of those noble specimens of the hardy foresters who plunged fearlessly into the interminable forests that then overspread so large a portion of the Western States.

Like Daniel Boone, Lewis Wetzel, Simon Kenton, and others, who made Indian hunting a pastime, his deadly hate of the Indian, and his burning passion for hunting them down, amounted to a monomania. This hatred was in consequence of the wrongs they had inflicted upon his family—his father, Captain John Brady, and his brother having fallen victims to the tomahawk and scalping knife.

The scene of the present story is at a place known to boatmen and fishermen as "Brady's Bend," and where now the noise and bustle of a new manufacturing town called the "Great Western" resounds along the shores that then echoed only to the whoop of the savage or the panther's scream.

It is a bend in the river of nine miles in length, and is sometimes called the "Nine Mile Bend," and is scarcely half a mile across the necklers in this bend, Cornplanter, returned from some successful inroads upon the whites, had secured several prisoners, by tying them to as many trees, while his swarthy and hideously-painted followers were busy in making preparations for the laggot and the torturo.

The stake was erected and the faggots prepared with all the coolness and refinement of Indian barbarity. It was a beautiful evening; the sun was just sinking behind the lofty hill upon the opposite shore. Calmness had thrown its oily wand upon the Alleghany's crystal tide, and it slept. The full, round moon, just bursting through the tree-tops behind them seiled calmly through the distant blue, and cast its mellow beams upon the sleeping river, and danced upon its placid bosom.

The melancholy note of the whip-poor-will from the adjoining thicket fell sweetly upon the ear. The victims were unbound and led forth to the place of torture. At this moment a voice, high up among the frowning rocks that loomed out from the thick hemlocks that crowned the hill opposite, hailed Corupianter in the Indian tongue, informing him that "he was an Indian warrior, just returned from the war-path with a goodly number of prisoners."

He desired that the ceremonies of the torture might be suspended until he could ford the river and join them, when they would celebrate the occasion with unusual demonstrations of savage rejoicings. To this Cornplanter consented. The flames that had been kindled were extinguished, and the prisoners again bound to the trees.

In the meantime, Brady, for it was he who had deceived the wild Indian, with a body of men moved silently up the river to a place known as "Truby's Ripple," and there fording the river, drew his men up across the neck of the bend, and moved noiselessly down upon the savages. So cautious was his approach that the Indians were completely cut off from retreat before they became alarmed.

Brady's men hemmed them in from behind, while the Alleghany rolled in front. The first intimation to the savages of his approach was communicated by a deadly discharge from his unerring rifles. The Indians fought with desperation, but were overpowered; all were killed or taken prisoners save the chief, Cornplanter, who, finding himself alone, plunged into the river, and swam for the other shore.

Being a good swimmer, he remained several minutes under water, but as he rose for breath, he was greeted with a shower of bullets. In this way, alternately swimming under water as long as he could hold his breath, and then rising to the surface, he escaped unhurt, and reaching the other shore in safety, secreted himself behind a large standing rock.

The prisoners were of course unbound, and all joined in the jollifications and joy at the timely and unlooked for release. The rock that shielded Cornplanter from Brady's bullets was pointed out to me by the old Indian, in a recent trip down this river. It is known as Cornplanter's Rock." The old Indian gave me the story with a sad and dejected countenance, in broken English.

"Alas! what a change! Where then the sheeny tide of the beauteous Alleghany parted only to the swift skimming birch en canoe and echoed to the wild voices that came out of the dense, dark forest, now is heard the shrill whistle of the steam-pipe and the rushing of the mighty steamer. Where the tawny savage then reclined upon the shady banks from his pursuit of the deer, the panther and the bear, or rested from the war-path, is now the scene of life and activity.

The tall old forest has receded from before the advance of civilization, and given place to farms, beautiful villas and bustling towns. The Indian, too, has passed away; but a few, and they but miserable decaying relics of what they once were, are now occasionally seen, the descendants of the proud race that once could call these hills, and groves, and rivers and all their own. Alas! in the language of the poet:

"Chieftains and their tribes have perished,
Like the thickets where they grew."

THE NICARAGUA EXPEDITION.—The New York Evening Advertiser of the 9th, contains more complete news from the Isthmus, received by the Northern Light than has reached this city. We copy the following in regard to the Walker expedition:

There is, and for the next arrival or two no doubt will be, conflicting intelligence of the filibustiering expedition under Col. Walker. According to the statement furnished us by the purser of the Northern Light, Col. Walker, having received some aid from Realijo, landed at Pilo on the 27th of June, about fourteen miles from San Juan del Sud, with 375 men—another account says 275—and took possession of a small village called Rivas, not to be found in any gazetteer. On the following day he entered San Juan del Sud, a small and even more defenceless place than San Juan del Norte, and took what arms and ammunition the place contained, no one opposing.

Next we have a report "from a passenger" to the effect that the marauder landed his whole force, consisting of sixty men, near San Juan, and thence marched on Rivas, which place offered, and probably could offer, no resistance; and that at this place he was joined by Castillon's men, numbering about 200. This would make the combined forces of Walker and Castillon to be under 300, which is no doubt the truth.

Yet another account, dated from Virgin Bay, June 29, is that both Nicaraguans and Americans from this party were coming in small parties of five and ten, and in a pretty conciderable hurry, across the Transit road, and making for Costa Rica, and a postscript mentions positively the defeat of the marauders. We have little doubt that the last report will prove to be the correct one. When Walker left California he had but a small company of men, and his arrangements and equipments were far inferior to those of his disgraceful and disastrous expedition to Sonora. Beside, we have no faith in the success of these illegal, brigandish, piratical expeditions. They have no moral force and command no confidence. Their ultimate failure is certain. Walker will come out of this business with greater dishonor than from his Lower California buccaneering exploits, however he may for a few days succeed in robbing, plundering and destroying helpless villages.

On the night of the 6th inst., a whole block of brick stores was burned down in Norfolk, Va. The loss was estimated at $45,000.

CENTENARY COLLEGE OF LOUISIANA

Centenary College of Louisiana is located in Jackson, La., 12 miles east of Bayou Sara. Its location is beautiful, retired and healthy. It has commodious buildings, a large library, a good chemical and philosophical apparatus, a well selected mineralogical and geological cabinet, and a full Board of Instruction.

As this section of the Southwest is but poorly provided with academies and preparatory schools, there is connected with the College a Preparatory Department, in which all necessary instruction may be received for entering College proper.

The College is now in a highly prosperous condition, and under the management of the present Board of Trustees and Faculty it promises permanency and extensive usefulness.

APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.

Messrs Editors—After reading your late extracts from Barrow on the succession of apostolic office, it occurred to me that it might be useful to show that our Church teaches nothing incoesistent with that opinion. We must distinguish between what is technically termed "apostolic succession," and the assertion that bishops are the successors of the apostles. Something that goes by the former name we all recognize, but for the latter statement there is no foundation either in Scripture or in standards. The chief officers of the Church bear the same relation to the apostles that the governors and judges of our States bear to the original framers of the constitution, in one aspect, while in another both may have been administrators of the laws.

In this latter respect all ministers of Christ may be considered successors of the apostles, with this important difference, that the epostles had original and inspired jurisdiction, while that of the subsequent ministry is derived and fallible. Nor does the prayer book teach more than this.

The rubric prefixed to the ordinal is merely declarative of the fact, which no Episcopalian disputes, that the Holy Scriptures and ancient authors (not the Holy Scriptures alone, as J. U. Onderdonk attempted to prove) render it evident that there have been from the apostles' time three orders of the ministry. See the collect in the office of institution: "Most gracious God, who of thy wise providence hast appointed divers orders in thy Church." "They are not appointed by the authority of a divine command, so as to make departure from them for a sufficient cause a positive sin, but by God's wise providence, just as in the government of states the powers that be are ordained of God."

The next collect, I believe, contains the only instance in which the phrase "apostolic succession" occurs in the prayer book, and it is often triumphantly pointed to as closing the question of a succession of the apostolic office to bishops, so far as the Church is concerned. Let us see. It reads, "O, holy Jesus, who has promised to the with ministers of apostolic succession to the end of the world, be graciously pleased to bless the ministry and service of him who is now appointed to offer the sacrifice of prayer and praise to thee in this house," &c.

Now here is no apostolic succession of bishops even alluded to, save in common with other ministers. It is not the bishops of apostolic succession, but "thy ministers (all ministers) of apostolic succession." Nor can there be any doubt of its inclusion of Presbyters and deacons, for it occurs in the Office of Institution, an office for settling Presbyters over churches. The Letter of Institution, provided in the same office, is addressed, "To our well beloved in Christ, A. B. Presbyter, greeting." If any one still holds that bishops are the successors of the apostles more than other ministers, he should acknowledge that it is a mere opinion of his own, not authorized by the Church.

The text referred to in the collect, "Lo! I am with you always, even unto the end of the world," as applied by Bishop Hobart and many others to a succession of the apostolate, is certainly the smallest capital upon which such an investment of opinion was ever made. Its true meaning is contained in the 98th hymn, for the "Ordination and Institution of Ministers," not merely of bishops; and this is precisely accordant with the collect already adduced from the same service.

A SUCCESSOR TO THE APOSTLES.

Progress of Agriculture.—It was stated in the Scientific American, on excellent authority, that between fifteen and sixteen thousand reaping machines will be sold the present year in this country. The demand is so great that the manufacturers cannot supply it. Estimating the cost of these machines at nearly two millions of dollars, it affords a gratifying evidence of our agricultural prosperity. But it also indicates that our farmers are wide awake to the importance of using machinery wherever it is available. No class of men have been more benefited by modern improvements than farmers, and they show both wisdom and economy in availing themselves of their advantages. It is said that a reaping machine will pay for itself in one season.

No Progress.—The sun shone as bright the first day of the world's existence as now; and so with the Bible and Christianity.

Dancing.—It does sometimes make us more graceful; it much more frequently makes us graceless.

GENERAL MINUTES.

We have scarcely ever performed a more disagreeable work in our life than perusing the General Minutes for the printer and passing them through the press. We have spent many a wearisome hour over these documents, verifying, falsifying, correcting, and arranging their various statistical details, so as to secure at least an approximation to truth and order in this important register. We have spared no pains in this matter, having carefully and repeatedly gone through the computations and used all the means within our reach to secure the correct spelling of proper names in the numerous cases in which they come to us with a varying orthography. We hope no one will be offended if we say that there must be a greater effort to secure correctness in our Church census on the part of bishops and secretaries of conferences, and the preachers in their respective charges. Some do well, but others—we hope they will do better than they have done heretofore; and there is no harm in saying that much. The following is the—

BAPTIST CRUSADE AGAINST METHODISM.

Macon, Miss., July 14, 1855.

It is to be regretted that any of the energies of the Christian denominations should be spent in a war upon each other. The struggle for a mere nominal supremacy in numbers and influence, aside from the spiritual advancement of those apparently brought into the Church, is a dangerous error, and threatens much evil. There is work enough to do for all of us. So strangely is the human mind constituted that no one creed or church government can become an Aaron's rod and swallow up the others. Diversity of thought, of sentiment, in all other departments of human investigation, exists, and we may not expect the most sublime system known to man to be free from this peculiarity. Religion unites us all to a common center, the cross, the great atonement; but we may occupy any point in the radii of orthodoxy and be secure. I mean that he who builds his faith upon Jesus Christ, who awards to him the praise of his salvation, who feels that through Jesus Christ and him crucified he has received the pardon of sin, is a Christian—is now by a living faith united to the true vine. I care not what his name may be. At Heaven's door he will not be asked whether he was baptized by sprinkling or immersion, whether he came from a congregational or connectional church organization—whether he has had the hands of an assured successor of the Apostles upon his head or not. The adaptation of the soul to heavenly joys—its fitness for the company of God and and angels—its holy qualifications, bestowed through our Lord Jesus Christ—these and only these will be the test of entrance to the heavenly inheritance. These are truths somewhat hackneyed, believed by all who pretend to Christianity at all, but in many persons it is a dead faith. There are no appropriate results. The Episcopalians are uneasy. The bishop must lay his hands upon the Methodist fold, or else they must receive the denunciations of "The Church." True, it will not do to say that the sin of refusing a man's hands to be placed on their heads is going to send them to perdition. But then the thing must be believed, whether said or not.

The Methodists are not baptized! Who says so? The Episcopalians. Why are they not? It was not done by a "successor of the Apostles." Who are "successors of the Apostles?" Bishop Green and all Episcopalians. And how much more like the Apostles are Episcopalian ministers than the Methodist ministers! Do they labor more, endure more privation for Christ's sake? Do they preach the gospel to the poor and the destitute, while Methodist ministers flaunt in silk robes in the wealthy cities? Do Episcopalians walk more orderly, do more to advance the cause of Christ, than the Methodists? No; nor a tithe as much. Then let them keep that high-sounding, unmeaning "succession" to themselves. If we are to have lifeless litanies for Methodist camp meetings, a religion of cold and unsatisfactory forms, instead of the warm breathings of spiritual Christianity, we would rather be excused. We would like the "succession," but Episcopalians cannot prove that they have it. If they could, we cannot live on the succession; it is too scanty a diet. Therefore we can't consent to bury Methodism in favor of High Churchism.

But if we prove that we are baptized, after all, for aught that Episcopalians can say, it turns out that we are all ignored at last, by another ambitious sect. Methodists are not baptized. And why? They have not been immersed. Baptism is the door into the Church; immersion only is baptism; therefore Methodists, not being immersed, have not entered in at the door, and consequently must either acknowledge themselves thieves and robbers, who have climbed up some other way, or, as Baptists sornplo. not to say, we are not in the Church at all. To maintain such ground, assumption is piled upon assumption, until one scarcely knows how he can exercise charity for the vain men who stand and swell over their pretended virtues. For half a century we have had sermons, and essays, and books, and lectures, and libraries scattered, to prove what? That men ought to fear God and keep his commandments? No. But to convince men that the quantity of water wherewith they are baptized has an essential connection with their salvation. And yet the world will not believe it. Campbellism took passage on the water craft, and is fast running aground. The fact is, men want something besides assertions, they want proof of these things. But in these latter days we are to have convincing evidence. The Bible must say, "He that believeth and is immersed, shall be saved." That sounds well. Now, then, if the Pedobaptists do not surrender, we will hurl our anathemas against the infidels! Who could have the hardihood to disbelieve the Bible? And does not the Bible say "immersed?" Yes; but it is the Baptist Bible, not the one given by inspired men of old. We'll put that along with the "succession." We can't think of giving up our soul-refreshing class meetings, our glorious love feasts, and our Bible too, in order to be covered up in the water a moment.

Well, we are not to be won by attacking our doctrines. There must be a weak place in Methodism somewhere, and it must certainly be the government. It is a "great iron wheel," crushing everything over which it passes. But do the Baptists suffer by the Methodist despotism? Yes. The Methodists are growing too fast, outstripping others in numbers and influence, and there must be a stop put to it. Surely there must be some tyranny about it, or else it would not grow so fast; for tyrants are always successful! The warlike editor of the Tennessee Baptist gives the word, publishes a book of slanders, and calls all his brethren to the charge. All over the Union, North and South, there are wars and rumors of wars. Baptist preachers, in the plentitude of their sympathies, are mourning like Rachel for her children. They will not be comforted while there is a formidable body of Methodists extant. Divided among themselves, ready even now to be shattered into a thousand fragments by the Bible Union, with its friends, sympathizers and enemies, it is necessary to engage in a foreign war in order to keep the peace at home. The poor Methodists are so awfully oppressed, and nobody sees it but the Baptists! They have liberty. Aye, forsooth—the liberty to quarrel, contend and strive amongst themselves; and ought not this glorious liberty to be sought by all men? Who would be deprived of the right to fight his brethren? Poor Methodists! That awful "iron wheel" turns so regularly, keeps everything in such admirable order, it ought to be crushed at once!

But, alas! it is all the empty vaporings of bigots. They will not stand their ground when pressed to it, but are conveniently sick or marvelously "dignified" about the time for controversy. For several years the Rev. S. S. Lattimore, of this place, has maintained a position not only of defiance toward the world, but but he has been particularly interested in the prosperity of the Methodists. Exceedingly anxious for a controversy with a Methodist minister, he would congratulate himself upon a new arrival. He hoped to find an antagonist for the lilt of arms. But our brethren here exercised patience, and disliking the strife, heart-burnings and other evils of controversy, Mr. Lattimore has not been gratified. But he fondly hoped, at the commencement of this year, that we should meet in amiable discussion; a kind, clever debate was very desirable indeed with a Methodist preacher. Williams and Chapman were not enough. A third! a kingdom for a third debator in the Methodist ranks. He was soon told that he could be readily gratified. We have kept the peace long enough. From East to West, from North to South, we hear the thundering of the Baptist crusadors. We must meet them. Patience has ceased to be a virtue. We are recreant to our trusts if we do not meet them—prudently, charitably, kindly and in brotherly love, if they will let us, but boldly, uncompromisingly wielding the sword, if we must. At all events, we must meet them. So I think, and so I have acted. Mr. Lattimore no sooner ascertained my determination than he grew wonderfully pacific; rather dreaded the evils of controversy, and wondered why we could not live in peace, as he and other Methodist preachers had done! But, if I sought a controversy, and would challenge him, de novo, perhaps he might make it convenient to discuss. I will not stickle about terms, yet I will not consent to occupy the position of an aggressor, in order to defend myself. I proposed a debate without a challenge; and all at once Mr. Lattimore publishes a card declaring that all intercourse with me is at an end! And what, reader, do you think is the cause of this extraordinary step? I will tell you. Some years ago Mr. Lattimore publicly declared that there was a spurious edition of Mr. Wesley's Notes in use among the Methodists. He said that this spurious book was gotten up in order to avoid Mr. Wesley's testimony upon the subject of baptism. The note on the 4th verse of the 6th chapter of Romans had two words left out of it, as follows: In the genuine, it reads, "Alluding to the ancient manner of baptizing by immersion;" in the spurious, "Alluding to the ancient manner of baptizing." So there was a forgery. And all done to keep the Methodist people in ignorance of Mr. Wesley's views on the subject of baptism! This whole assertion I denied. Mr. Lattimore responded, and said he saw a copy of the book in the hands of Rev. Reuben Burrow, of Tennessee. My position was this: If there be such a book in existence, the Methodist Church is in no wise responsible for it; yet I never have heard of the book before, and I doubt its existence. In process of time Mr. Burrow is heard from, and he says he has never seen or heard of the aforesaid book. I publish his letter, and simply leave Mr. Lattimore to settle the issue with Mr. Burrow. But Mr. Lattimore grows suddenly indignant and retires from the field, declaring that he is to have no farther correspondence or intercourse with me!

These are facts, and they are significant. Our church government is attacked because the presumption is that we will not defend it. Let us deceive them for once. God forbid that we should create strife, but unless we give these Baptist champions a chance to annihilate us we shall never hear the last of it. Mexican anarchy will compete with the United States Government as readily as their system with ours, and they know it. Let us scatter the hooks among the people; let us lecture to our charges upon our government; now, if necessary, let us discuss orally the issues presented. If any Baptist preacher thinks he can prove Methodism to be a second edition of Popery, give him a chance to do it, or he will brag for a hundred miles around you, and claim that you are afraid of him and the truth! Give them light; they want it badly. Many of them know precious little about the Methodist Church government, and they are the men who have most to say against it. Give them a genteel chastisement, and perhaps they will mind their own affairs for the future.

Further Foreign News.

BY THE STEAMSHIP ARAGO.

The principal and most interesting feature of the details of the steamship Arago's news is the account of the conflict of the 18th of June, which resulted so disastrously to the Allied forces:

The British and North American Royal Mail steamship Africa arrived at Liverpool on the morning of the 1st inst.

The Arago brings intelligence of the death of Lord Raglan, Commander-in-Chief of the English forces in the East. The melancholy news was received by Lord Panmure from Gen Simpson on the afternoon of the 30th ult. For some days previously Lord Raglan had been suffering from indisposition, but until 4 P. M. on the 28th, his lordship progressed to the satisfaction of his medical attendants.

Afterward, alarming symptoms developed themselves, attended with difficulty of breathing, which gradually increased. From 5 o'clock P. M. he was unconscious, and from that period he gradually sank, until 25 minutes before 9 o'clock, at which hour he died. The event has plunged the whole army into the most profound grief. It is stated that Maj. Gen. Simpson has succeeded Lord Ragland pro tem.

The Times correspondent, writing from the Baltic, states that on the 21st ult. the Amphion, 30, screw frigate, while employed in reconnoitering the fortifications at Sweaborg, accidentally mistook the channel, and in consequence, grounded.

The boats were immediately dispatched in all directions to sound, and while so employed, one of the near forts opened a brisk fire upon the frigate. Four shots struck her, killing one man and wounding two others. The Captain of the Amphion, however, returned the compliment with such energy and precision, that he succeeded in blowing up a large Russian powder magazine, and occasioning other serious damage to the fort.

News from Stockholm states that the British have destroyed Wystadt.

From Copenhagen, July 4, we learn that the French war steamers Pelican and Fossin had anchored, and the English war steamer Ajax, towing the Jackdaw and Swinger, had passed southward.

The Journal de Constantinople reports that the town of Kertch no longer exists, a fire having completed its destruction on the 14th of June.

A line of electric telegraph has been opened between Odessa and St. Petersburg, and before long telegraphic communications will be established between St. Petersburg and Sebastopol.

His Majesty the King of the Belgians and suite arrived at Buckingham Palace from Ostend on the afternoon of the 3d inst on a visit to Queen Victoria.

Admiral Seymour, who was wounded on board H. M. ship Bamoath, from the bursting of an infernal machine, was still suffering, and little hope was entertained of saving the sight of his eye.

The detailed accounts of the attack on the Malakoff and Redan towers made by the Allies on the 18th ult., have been received, and are published in extenso in the London morning journals. The various correspondents ascribe the repulse and great loss which the French and English experienced to the want of proper management and the total absence of that military knowledge and judgment so requisite in such hazardous and difficult undertakings.

The Journal of St. Petersburg publishes a correspondence respecting the outrage at Hango, which Russia excuses on the ground that the flag of truce was not up. Russia accuses England of making improper use of flags of truce.

Another "demonstration" against Lord Robert Grosvenor's Sunday Trading Bill, took place in Hyde Park on Sunday, July 1, and exceeded in numbers and riot the one which took place the week previous. According to the reports of the Morning Herald the scene is beyond description. At the lowest computation upward of 100,000 men, women and children, were present. The proceedings were commenced by a man attempting to address the crowd, which attempt was immediately put down by the police. This gave rise to an extraordinary scene of confusion. The constables hats were knocked off, and the several carriages which were bold enough to venture were hooted, and the horses frightened by the mob. Several of the ringleaders were taken into custody, but not without giving great trouble to the police, who were in many instances compelled to use their staves in a very severe manner.

In the House of Commons, on the 2d July, Lord Robert Grosvenor withdrew his bill against Sunday trading.

In both Houses of Parliament, on the evening of the 3d inst., a royal message, recommending the House to provide some material token of recognition to Lord Raglan for the services he had rendered to his country during this and previous wars, was brought under consideration, and it was agreed that an annuity of £1,000 a year should be granted to the widow of his late lordship, and £2,000 a year to the present possessor of the title, with remainder to his next heir.

In the House of Lords, while discussing the merits of the late Lord Raglan, the Earl of Galloway blamed the Government for having allowed certain charges adduced against Lord Raglan in Parliament and elsewhere to pass unanswered, and to this neglect he believed the premature death of the late Field Marshal was in a great measure attributable.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News states, that the French Government demands a new loan of seven hundred and fifty million francs. It proposes an impost of one tenth on produce, and on the revenue accruing from the carriage of passengers and goods by railway. 140,000 of the class 1855 were called under arms.

The War—Journal of the Siege.

Correspondence of the London News.

Heights before Sebastopol, June 21.—The original plan of attack contemplated a joint English and French assault of the Malakoff, which, as commanding the Redan and forming the grand key to the whole network of redoubts and batteries in front of the place would, if taken, have at once rendered the former untenable, and placed the town and harbors at the mercy of the captors. For reasons, however, which no one can understand, this very sensible and apparently most practical design was abandoned, and the plan was changed into one of a simultaneous attack upon the two great works—the Malakoff being undertaken by the French, and the Redan by ourselves. The first manifest disadvantage of this arrangement was the spreading of our forces over a field of difficulties nearly double in extent, and enabling the enemy to bring a vast number of guns into play against us, which, in the former case, could not have injured a man. To vastly enhance the chances of failure involved in this plan to ourselves, our whole attacking force, including supports and everybody else, was limited to some four thousand men; while the French, with a much juster appreciation of the difficulty that fell to their share, told of twenty-five thousand.

Of our handful, again, a large proportion consisted of raw recruits, recently arrived to fill up the gaps in the regiments selected for the service—regiments which, with one or two exceptions, have borne the whole brunt of our trench fighting, and suffered accordingly. This was done through no want of old soldiers, of whom the third and fourth divisions could have furnished an abundance—men who have been kept comparatively idle while their comrades of the Light and Second Divisions have been worked like galley slaves. Sir George Brown, I believe, is to be thanked for this selection; anxious as he was to gain fresh laurels for his own command, though he well knew the materiel of which so large a proportion of its strength is composed. I have already mentioned that the 33d regiment had been chosen to lead the attack, and that, through a similar motive of mistaken desire to bring glory to his own favorite corps, General Airey was, at the eleventh hour, permitted to assign this place of honor to the 34th—a regiment which, whether justly or not, enjoys only a moderate reputation among the others now in camp.

Later in the evening preceding the assault, Sir George discovered that the major commanding the 33d was laid up with a wound received in the attack on the Quarries, and that the senior captain—an officer, by the way, of some eighteen years' service—would have charge of the corps during the storming. "Impossible; this will never do," said the friend of apoplectic neck fracture, "another regiment, with a field officer in command, must be substituted."

A message to this effect was telegraphed to head-quarters, but Lord Raglan, with a degree of common sense which was quite unmilitary, overruled his second's objection, and replied that an officer of captain——'s length of service, be his rank what it might, should be quite as fit to lead his regiment into action as any field officer in the service, and, accordingly, that no substitution should be made. I merely mention these trifles to show the state of uncertainty and confusion in which our preparations were still almost within an hour before the assaulting force marched down toward the scene of its struggle and defeat.

Then another deviation from the original plan of the attack was made, also at the eleventh hour, by Gen. Pelissier, to which both military sense and common sense agree in attributing no small share of both the French and our own failure. Though the bombardment had been kept up vigorously the whole of Sunday, night necessarily compelling a slackening of the allied fire, and during this respite there was reason to expect that the Russians would employ themselves in making good the injuries done to their batteries during the day. It was therefore arranged that at daybreak on Monday a terrific fire of shot and shell should be poured into the Redan and Malakoff, to render as many of their guns as possible incapable of mischief. An hour or so, however, before the combined forces marched from the camp the French commander-in-chief rode over to our own head-quarters and declared that he could not wait for this preliminary assault of artillery, as he would have so many men in his trenches before the Malakoff that there would be no cover for them; and consequently they (and we) must attack at daybreak, at all hazards, and take the chance of finding the enemy's guns in the most favorable condition in which our bombardment and their owner's subsequent idleness might have left them.

Of course Lord Raglan complied, though forty-nine out of fifty of the subaltern in his camp would have foreseen the consequences to be expected; and accordingly, soon after the first streaks of sunlight broke over the horizon the doomed thousands rushed to defeat and death so little is even known of the details of French operations here, that I may give you few particulars of the attack on the Malakoff; but their plan of assault appears to have consisted in assaulting the work on both flanks and the front simultaneously, and with overwhelming numbers—25,000 are said to have been engaged.

In just retribution for the disregard of their General to the good to be expected from a short morning's bombardment, they found the redoubts swarming with defenders, and guns bristling from every embrasure. On them, as on our own men, showers of grape and canister were poured out, literally mowing down whole battalions at a time; while from along the whole semicircular line of parapet the crowd of riflemen sent volley after volley into their disordered ranks, that passed through them like a sheet of molten lead. Three times they gave way, and as often rallied; but were finally driven back after a struggle of some three hours and a half, leaving the space between the Mamelon and Malakoff literally covered with the dead and dying.

With our own men, the space to be passed over from our most advanced trenches to the Redan was somewhere about seven hundred yards, and from the first moment of their rushing over the parapet toward the point of attack, they were met by the same awful and annihilating storm of canister and grape. Many fell within the first dozen yards, and theuce on to some broken ground about midway, in which the remainder sought cover, the field was strewed with the slain and wounded. An officer present in the affair, and who was one of the few who escaped uninjured, described the fire to me as being perfectly awful—much more severe, he assured me, than that which greeted our men at Alma, where he also fought, and received a wound. Few of them ever reached the abattis in front of the work—none, I believe, ever even saw the deep ditch which protects its approaches.

I have already mentioned the confusion which characterized the first commencement of our movement; and coupling this with the murderous preparations made by the enemy, you will be at no loss to understand that success was most improbable. I shall presently mention what the Russians thought of our generalship, as repeated by one of them in my own hearing. During the whole affair Lord Raglan and Sir G. Brown were ensconced within our eight gun battery, but though this afforded a good view of the scene of the struggle and the disorder which marked it, for some reasons unknown to uninitiated spectators, they appeared unable to give any efficient directions for the correction of our multiplied blunders. When the sad scene was ended our men straggled back by every safe avenue to the camp in a state of dispirited confusion well in keeping with the mob-like disorder in which they had been throughout the assault.

I know not what may have been the feelings of your home-public on reading the telegraphic news of our defeat—for I presume the scribes at head-quarters made no attempt to conceal the naked fact that our repulse was neither more nor less than a defeat—but here mingled chagrin and indignation were general throughout the camp. Officers and men alike felt that disgrace had been incurred, and that in consequence of the unredeemed mismanagement of their generals. From drummer boys to colonels a sense of humiliation filled every breast, the deeper that every body was sensible that neither men nor regimental officers had shown themselves deficient in what, under proper guidance, would have commanded success.

About midnight on Monday, I was roused up by the sound of a terrific cannonade, and sustained musketry fire, along the whole front from our left to the French right, and on hastening out to the height in advance of the Victoria Redoubt, heard and witnessed what induced me to believe that a night attack had been made by ourselves and the French to retrieve the fortunes of the day. From the Malakoff to the extreme left of the Redan—a space of about a mile—whole clouds of flame burst along the line from the sustained discharges of some two hundred cannon, while musketry filled up the short intervals from both our own and the enemy's ground. The night was pitch dark, and as the storm of shells whistled through the air, nothing could be grander than the fiery parabolas of these terrible messengers, from battery to redoubt and from redoubt back again to battery.

I have neither time nor power to describe the magnificent but awful pyrotechnic scene. A badly aimed shell from the Malakoff passed high over the Mamelon, and fell some sixty yards from where I stood; but though this was safe enough I deemed it best to shift my ground, and so retired. A loud "three times three" rose upon the midnight air from the direction of the Redan; and as one can never be mistaken in this peculiar product of British lungs, I jumped to the pleasant conclusion that the day's stain had been wiped away, and that the Redan was our own. I was, however, mistaken; and the explanation of the whole affair was this: During the night, the French, endeavoring to take advantage of the darkness had crept out from the Mamelon to recover a number of scaling ladders which they had been compelled to abandon during the attack. The Russians perceived them, and opened a smart fire of grape from the guns of the Malakoff, which was repeated by a shell from the Mamelon. Almost simultaneously a party of the enemy emerged from the Redan, in expectation of what they deemed a similar attack to that attempted by the French, and being perceived by our men, a volley of musketry was poured into them and chase gave with the bayonet. After a short time the Russians turned and fled, and it was at this juncture that the hurrahs I have mentioned were sent after them. After this the cannonade was kept up for some time from both lines, in the manner I have remarked.

Next morning there was hardly a gun fired on either side; and about 12 o'clock we hoisted a flag to request the necessary truce for the burial of our dead. A delay of some minutes having occurred before an answer was given—but during which messengers were sent hurrying from the redoubt toward where we supposed the General of the Russian trenches to be—the wisdom of an officer in command on our side, a quardsman of more light than apparent intelligence, ordered the flag to be pulled down.

Five minutes after, several Russian officers mounted the parapet and waved their caps, as if inviting us to renew the request; but captain —— refused, alleging that he must "wait for further orders;" and this, though many of our poor wounded fellows were lying within sight, writhing, in pain and thirst under a broiling sun! "Further orders" were waited for, and no truce was again asked till 4 o'clock, when it was at once granted, and when our dead and wounded, the latter in a most painful state, were brought in.

The Russians threw out an advance line of sentries to keep off prying eyes from the Redan, and a similar precaution having been taken on our side the neutral space was thus narrowed greatly. The scenes of battle carnage have been often enough described, so I need only say that this was like the rest—harrowing to look on. Dead and dying lay all over the ground.

During this proceeding a number of Russian officers mingled among our party, and as several of them spoke English fluently, a good deal was said. Their "grumbling" inclination, however, was as marked as in most cases to defeat itself; though one of our officers was guilty of the indiscretion of informing a very suave interrogation that their grape did sad injury to our men in possession of the lately taken quarries—a remark which procured his instant order to the rear by General Airey.

It was by one of these polite feints that the inquiry was made of an Englishman at my side whether "our generals had really been drunk or not during the recent assault." The Russians having helped us to gather in the dead, the whole sad duty was soon performed, and the truce brought to an end. Since then nothing of interest has occurred, and the firing has nearly been suspended altogether.

Sea of Azoff.

Nothing new from the Sea of Azoff. On the 18 h the English steamer Ripon arrived with 253 inhabitants of Kertch, including men, women, and children. This part of the population of Kertch have been quartered at the English Admiralty. Hasis Pasha has offered a khan to lodge them. The expense of their subsistence is provisionally at the charge of the English Government.

WAR SPIRIT IN RUSSIA.

A private letter from St Petersburg to one of the editors of this paper, presents a vivid picture of affairs at that capital. We do not sympathize in the strong Russian feelings of the writer, but we give our readers the following extract, as it affords a glimpse from the seat of war. The letter is dated June 5th:

"I have now been here three weeks, and seen many things to interest me. I have been well received wherever I have been; and I assure you that I am quite as much a Russian as I was before I left the United States. As for the war, there appears to be but one feeling here among all, and that is to fight it out. The nation is with the Emperor, and is resolute never to yield to the demands of the Allies. Everything here is military, and in preparation for war. A day or two since I went to the Foundling Hospital, and there found a large number of females making bandages, and others scraping lint, for the soldiers that are wounded. I saw a letter from a surgeon at Sebastopol, saying that the battle of the night before had added sixteen hundred to their wounded. Day before yesterday I went down to Cronstadt on board a steamer that took a large party on a pleasure excursion to see the Allied fleet, which lies about five miles from the forts. We sailed all around the forts and the men of war, which are placed to defend the town. I was told that there were a hundred thousand men on board the ships and in the forts.

The scene was highly exciting. As we swept over the water, the band played stirring national airs, and the multitude on board burst forth in repeated cheers to the forts and ships, which were echoed back in loud harrahs from the sailors on the ships, and the soldiers in the forts, while in the distance we could distinctly see the Allies taking down their spars and topmasts, preparing for battle. As I was gazing at the magnificent array, an old gentleman, standing by me, who could speak English, said, with a good deal of feeling, "What a scene! Here are we on a pleasure party, sailing over the water that must soon be red with so much blood. I cannot enjoy it."

"An attack is now hourly expected. I have made arrangements to go at once to a hill about three miles from the scene of action, where I can see every shot that is fired. I do not want an attack to take place, but if there is to be one I want to see it. I will write you a full account of it as soon as possible. My own opinion is that the Allies will be beaten, but it may be because I want to have them, or because I am not a good judge of the matter. How long I shall be detained here I cannot tell. I may leave for home by the first of July, though I now think of taking a trip to Odessa, Theodosia and Sebastopol, to look at a route for a railroad. This would keep me here until November. At first I found it very difficult to get about without an interpreter. But now I can ask for everything I wish in Russian, and I think, if I should stay here three or four months, I could speak it very well." [New York Evangelist.

A letter from Kertsch, in a French journal, says that an English officer having paid a visit to the cemetery of a Russian church, was greatly surprised to see a great number of newly made graves. As none had been killed, and no epidemic prevailed in the town, he conceived suspicions and the graves were opened. He found in them not fewer than fifty magnificent brass guns, quite new, and a large quantity of projectiles and powder.

The exhausting air pumps used in connection with Mr Richardson's atmospheric telegraph apparatus, are to be twenty feet in length, and of a calibre or area equal to fifty times that of the tube, so that one hundred feet of the tube will be vacuated by each stroke of the pumps—probably about twelve thousand feet per minute, or one hundred and thirty miles per hour. Four times this velocity may be obtained, however, if required. The tube is furnished with an ingenious arrangement of mechanism at each station where it is required to open the package crates.

Health of the City.

Our latest reports from the Hospital are of Wednesday. On that day there were nineteen deaths in this institution, seventeen of which were of yellow fever; an increase of only one over the report of the same day last week. One of the daily papers has the following paragraph:

"The Weather and the Health.—We do not often indulge in weather and health discussions in these columns, being transformed into a weather and health thermometer. The weather is not to our liking, no matter how much it may suit the taste of some of our contemporaries. But, as we are quarantined below and above; and as it seems likely that eastward will shortly be our only avenue of egress; and as the weather is unfavorable, a considerable amount of sickness prevailing, the worst part of the season before us, these dull, sirocco muddy, old Aquarius continually tippling over his watering pot without regard to rhyme or reason, and mosquitoes worse than the plagues of Egypt, we cannot see that we have anything to lose, and therefore do not care much what we say. So here goes.

"That the weather is unfavorable to health is certain. Altogether too much rain has fallen during the present month. The winds, too, have been mostly from the wrong direction. As a natural consequence, a considerable amount of sickness has followed, although nothing of an extraordinarily alarming character. Notwithstanding the efforts of croakers, we do not anticipate any great epidemic of any kind.

"If our people would be sufficiently prudent in their habits, the chief source of danger would at once be removed. Temperance in eating and drinking, frequent bathing and avoidance of night air, regularity in all things and personal cleanliness, are the best safeguards against yellow fever and all other diseases known to the latitude. The ablest physician in the world cannot give better advice than is embodied in the foregoing suggestions. We would like to see them fully carried out.

Oak Bowery School.—We had the pleasure, a few days since, of attending the closing exercises of the summer session of this prosperous institution. It is under the management of Messrs. Slaton & Kennedy, who impressed us as finely qualified for their position. The intellectual character of the young gentlemen who are students in the institution interested us by the satisfactory proofs which they gave of fresh and vigorous faculties, as well as scholar-like discipline. Our intercourse with some of them was as extended as limited time would allow, and we have rarely been as forcibly struck as we were with their animated conversation on popular topics and their general intelligence.

Bible Destitution in Alabama.—We have been favored with an opportunity of examining the report for June of the labors of Rev. O. H. Shaver, the active and efficient agent of the Alabama Bible Society. The labors of this excellent gentleman have been devoted to Coosa county. In one section of the county he found sixty families without the Bible. About 250 Bibles and Testaments were gratuitously distributed and nearly 100 sold. The number of families visited or their condition ascertained was 255. The report details some touching incidents, showing the anxiety of the people to possess the Word of God. Every citizen, whether he is a practical Christian or not, must rejoice at the operations of this noble institution. It richly deserves the hearty sympathy and cordial support of all patriotic, benevolent people. It is doing a great and good work—a work that will advance the virtue, intelligence and piety of Alabama—a work on which the best blessings of Heaven will certainly abide.

East Alabama Female College.—We are in receipt of a pamphlet copy of the Third Annual Report of the above institution, located in the flourishing town of Tuskegee, Ala., from which we are led to the most gratifying conclusions as to its prosperous condition and flattering prospects. From a summary of the students in attendance during the past year, we perceive that the number in all the various departments amounts to 219. The trustees express their confidence in the entire success of the enterprise. The Board of Examiners, in the conclusion of their interesting report, submit the following resolution as embodying their appreciation of the institution:

"Resolved, That the East Alabama Female College, as an institution of learning, is, in our judgment, an ornament to the beautiful town of Tuskegee, a standing monument of the liberality and enlightened patriotism of its founders, and a blessing to the State; and that it deserves and should receive the hearty patronage and encouragement of every female friend of education in the land."

No Cross No Crown.—Coleridge remarked that the temper of the present age inclines it to every aberrating indulgence. Men appear to think the Christian armor an unnecessary incumbrance; they appear to have no desire to engage in any combat, to undergo any trial; if religion is to be cultivated, it must be as one of the fine arts, as an element of belles lettres. They forget or despise the saying of Bishop Patrick, that there is no passage to celestial glory but by some cross; that we must suffer with Christ if we will as coheirs live, if we would be with him in Paradise.

English Methodism and its Branches

The Christian Advocate and Journal makes up a summary of the current history of British Wesleyanism.

The British Wesleyan Conference will meet this year in Leeds, on the last Wednesday in July. The reports from the district meetings indicate a decrease of membership this year of about 3,000; but there are more than 20,000 members on trial, or probationers, as we term them, and these are not counted in the report of the members in society. The principal decrease has been in Cornwall, from which district more than a thousand Methodists emigrated to Australia last year.

The names most prominently mentioned for the presidency this year are Isaac Keeling and Francis A. West.

The British Wesleyans are building a monument to the memory of the late Dr. Beaumont, which promises to be not less beneficial to his family than honorable to themselves. They are raising a fund by voluntary subscription to make some substantial provision for the family. The amount already collected reaches nearly $5,000.

The Annual Conference of the Methodist New Connection (Mr. Kilham's secession) has just been held at Sheffield. A very interesting debate on a motion to permit the preachers to remain in their circuits, when that course was agreeable to both parties, a fourth or fifth year, instead of the limit being three years, as at present. The discussion occupied nearly an entire day. The voting was strongly against the proposed change, though the speaking was mostly in its favor. The objections were, however, of a very practical character, and as they may apply to more than one latitude, we submit them to our readers.

Rev. Mr. Lynn said he was of opinion that it was only a very small proportion of the people that wished for this change, and they were the rich people of the connection, who were moved by feelings of sympathy for the preachers and their families, and wished to promote their comfort by preventing their removal from town to town.

Mr. Robinson was yet more outspoken, observing that the reason why the Independents could not lay hold of the hearts of the mass of the people was their preaching of elaborate intellectual discourses. Again, they were compelled to preach so as to avoid offending the rich of their congregations. In this connection, however, a man could now speak the truth in the pulpit, but if the change were made that was proposed, preachers would be careful to ingratiate themselves with the rich, knowing that their comfort would greatly depend on that course. In conclusion, he warned Conference against breaking down the connectional principle. In the proposition he could see no good, while he could see many evils, and a strong tendency towards congregationalism.

An application for admission into the New Connection was received from two Everettite circuits. The character given these Wesleyan reformers by those who presented their application would seem to justify the body in declining to amalgamate with such turbulent spirits. Though a portion of the disturbing elements that went out from the Wesleyan body a few years since have joined the new connection, yet the great mass of the agitators found a more congenial home among the Warrenites, called the Wesleyan Methodist Association. The fusion of Warrenism and Everettism is nearly complete, and the terms of their union, with the principles on which the new organization is based, have been published. The lay element is incorporated most emphatically in the new body. The Methodist Association, by this compact, surrenders—first, its very name, which is abandoned; secondly, its "foundation deed," which is to be constructed anew; thirdly, all interest in the connectional property; fourthly, all right of appointing preachers to circuits which do not ask for them; and, finally, every vestige of ecclesiastical authority. The Annual Assembly of the new body reserves to itself the right of making yearly collections for home and foreign missions, and that is all. Here is "progress" with a vengeance. One would have supposed that some affection for the itinerancy, a feature common to Wesleyanism, would have survived the rage of these reformers; but not a trace is to be discerned in this new and yet nameless body. It expressly stipulates that no circuit need take a traveling preacher unless it please, and the circuit which refuses is to be exempt from any contribution to the "Preachers' Children Fund." We invite those among us who are laboring to modify our system to watch the progress and mark the inevitable fate of this new body. To this complexion has "No secession, no surrender, no supplies," come at last.

Men miss truth more often from their indifference about it than from intellectual incapacity.

The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him; and He will show them his covenant.

The man who returns good for evil is as a tree which renders its shade and its fruit even to those who cast stones at it.

Deliberate with caution, but act with decision; and yield with graciousness or oppose with firmness

LETTER FROM FLORIDA.

Warrington, July 3, 1855.

To day is dark and gloomy; the rains fall in fitful but heavy showers. Did you ever see it fail that the weather was a sure gauge for our feelings? We are all thermometers; our mercury rises or falls with the weather. Here I am, sitting in the preacher's study. To the south, my open door affords a view of the navy yard, the north wall of which is about one hundred yards distant. Beyond the wall, inside, we look upon the row of nice and uniform houses built for the naval officers. Now, Brother Mc., if we were just on the south side of these houses, instead of the north, I would put my arm within yours and go up with you to the gate in front of the Commodore's mansion, and point all its beauties and conveniences; but as we are on the north side, and can only get a back view of all things, we had better defer our front view scenes, hadn't we? Yes, I thought so. Well, since you are so complacent, I will promise you, on some fair day, to take a walk with you through the yard; beginning at the center wharf and strolling right and left, we shall see all that is to be seen.

Now let us look through this window, opening towards the north. Our view ranges over the church yard, and away on to the majestic old woods. But let us observe the things nearest to us. Close by us, just inside the church yard palings, we see a white slab, rising up with commendable simplicity over a little mound of sand. On it we find, "In memory of T B," with his age and the date of his death. At the bottom of this date are the following lines, by his son:

"Rest father, from thy earthly cares,
In the bosom of thy God;
Thy soul rejoiceth, while we weep,
In anguish o'er the sod."

The fame of Mr. B. says he was a good man. May our greatest effort be to leave in the world a memory of our goodness.

Just by the side of this grave, on the side away from us, is a neat enclosure, the palings all painted white except the tops, which are black, and seem to be mourning the loss of one whom earth could ill spare, and one whom Heaven wanted. Around the grave, now green with grass, are seen rose bushes, weeping, in the falling showers, that the hand wont to cultivate them is stilled in death beneath them. Let us talk to these rose vines a moment. "Whence came you, beautiful vines?" "We came from the old home of our mistress, who sleeps beneath us. We were planted by her own hands in the large frame that stands just by the little wicket gate, as you go in at the front. For a long time, through hot summer months, she came night and morning to water us. We always threw up our stems and ruetled our scarlet robes when she came, to welcome her, for she fed us, and we grew strong." "You missed her when she was taken away, did you not?" "Yes—but you see how these tears glitter upon our leaves. Yes, it was in October. She came not one evening, and we were vexed at our mistress, and, naughty things as we were, we got up drowsy and ill in the morning, and thought that now our mistress would come. But she came not for that day; and many long days to us came circling around the columns of eternity, but she came not. But the doctor came to the house, and in hurrying past us knocked off our neglected and faded roses. And he came often and staid long. We could hear our mistress talking in the house; her voice was weak and wasting away, but it spoke firmly of Jesus, and said something about a cross, we didn't hear what, and she spoke about Heaven, and sung—

"Sweet fields arrayed in living green,
And rivers of delight."

The servant would come out crying, but mistress hadn't scolded her. Our mistress exhorted all to be good, and told her husband to not grieve so much; and she would take her infant one, and kiss it and pray for it. At last the hearse came slowly up to the door, and four men took out a black looking box and took it into the house; and on the morrow they came again with the same hearse, drawn by two white mules, and then they went in and bore the coffin out again, and they said our mistress was in it. A long train of weeping ones, with slow step and heads bowed, followed, and our mistress was borne away." "What else, roses — what more?" "A few days passed, and our master came. Tears were in his eyes. As he came he was muttering, in sorrowful strain. He said something about his lost one, and spoke of a grave, and said his heart was there. He said our mistress wished to buried in the old church yard, near by the church, for in that church God had made her happy. He took us up and said he would plant us by her grave. He knelt down and prayed, and though tears were in his eyes he looked glad, and in his low heart-breathings we heard these words: 'Hallelujah! for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth!' He took us from our parent stem, and put us here to keep our silent vigils over the loved lost one."

In the midst of these vines rises a slab, and on it we read, "To the memory of Rachael R. Saffen." Underneath are these words: "And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." Here, my brother, would my own heart stay, bound by the ties of own associations. This grave calls up and passes in review before me the fond scenes of my own childhood home. It brings with it, too, the hot, scalding tears that flowed for a dying mother. It goes back to her bedside and is a prophet to repeat again her dying admonition, "My son, meet me in Heaven." I must go and kneel by my mother's grave. No, that grave is in the home of my childhood, and I am in the home of the stranger, to preach Jesus. But I may, and we all may go and kneel at the cross. This blessed cross is our bond of union and promise of a better meeting; for while we, with hearts big with grief and eyes dimmed with tears, are kneeling to pray at the foot of the cross, my mother and all our loved ones are circling around its top, lost in the glories of the world above, and are praising God and the Lamb that was slain.

We have been dwelling, perhaps, too long among the tombs, for I have actually been weeping. God has softened my heart, and it gives him the praise of tears. In the common burial ground that we see to the west, through another open window, stand some venerable old "live oaks," and, if you don't object, we will go and have a talk with them some other day. They have stood in the walls of that yard for many a day, have seen days come and go, and looked upon the burial of many a prouder body than you or I. They may have stormy stories to tell us.

Now let us turn to our north window, and look through the rein at the hills and valleys spread out just beyond us. There they spread themselves away towards the north, covered with the green old trees, and from this distance look like the heaving billows of some green sea. The clouds are thick and black above them, and fall around them as the wing of death.

But the rain falls thick and fast, the wind comes in fitful gusts, and we must close the window and the story of our items. But we'll have another look round at things. So good bye. Yours, truly,

THOS. S. ABERNETHY, JR.

CATHOLICISM AT HOME.

A correspondent of the New York Times gives the following statement of facts in a recent letter from Florence, Italy, illustrating the fruits of the Roman Catholic religion on a government under its influence:

"A man suspected of reading the Protestant Bible, from the fact that he had been singularly lax of late in his attendance at mass, was waited upon by a deputation from the Government and the Church. His house, his books, his papers were examined, and he and his family interrogated. He did not deny nor attempt to deny that he had long entertained doubts, both of the divine mission of the Pope and of the virtues of the priesthood. He asserted that he had determined to investigate the doctrines of the reformed religion, and to learn something of the character and practice of its professors. This he has done, but without seeking to propagate his doubts and hesitations among others, an offence which he knew to be punishable. But he had supposed, he said, that he might be allowed to set his mind at rest upon a subject so important. The committee asked a variety of questions, and succeeded in convincing itself that the man was a confirmed Protestant, and was quite lost to Catholicism in this world and beatitude in the next. "You will hear from us soon, sir," said the committee, in taking leave; "Be careful not to leave the city." Four days after, and at 4 o'clock in the morning, the guilty apostate was summoned to listen to his sentence; hard labor, in irons, in prison for one year; the prison selected being at a distance, and, if I am not mistaken, on some Mediterranean island. The verdict was immediately carried into execution. Such are the winning ways employed by the modern inquisition to preserve souls to God, to discountenance Lutheranism, and to maintain the country in its present state of matchless ignorance, misery and degradation."

ANECDOTE OF MR. WESLEY.

While traveling in Georgia I picked up the following anecdote of John Wesley and Gen. Oglethorpe. It seems that these two gentlemen were fellow-passengers from Europe. In the course of this voyage, Mr. Wesley heard Gen. Oglethorpe making a great noise in the cabin, upon which he stepped in to know the cause. The General immediately addressed him, saying:

"Mr. Wesley, you must excuse me. I have met with a provocation too great for a man to bear. You know the only wine I drink is Cyprus, as it agrees with me best of any; I therefore provided myself with several dozen of it, and this villain (his servant, who was present, almost dead with fear) has drank up the whole of it. But I will be revenged on him. I have ordered him to be tied hand and foot, and to be carried to the man of war which sails with us. The rascal should have taken care how he used me so, for I never forgive."

"Then, sir," said Mr. Wesley, looking calmly at him, "I hope you never sin."

The General, confounded at the reproof, threw his keys to his servant and bade him do better in the future.

What a severe reproof was that. Would it not be well for every one, while refusing to forgive a person who has injured him, to bear in mind that he himself has no promise of being forgiven by his Heavenly Father until he cherishes a forgiving spirit towards everyone! How can an unforgiving man utter this petition in the Lord's Prayer, "Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive those who trespass against us?"

Success.—To attain it, be prudent, be patient, be persevering.

Gaming is the child of avarice, but the parent of prodigality.

Our Home Correspondence.

Trinity, La. July 17, 1855.

Mr. Editor—Our national Birthday was celebrated in this parish in a way that does honor to this section of country, and to those who participated. The different Sabbath schools, viz., Harrisonburg, Trinity, Locust Grove, Harmony and Blackwood, met on the banks of Little River, formed a procession, and with appropriate banners marched to the ground prepared for the occasion. The order of the day being announced, the exercises commenced by singing a national hymn, and prayer by Rev. T. A. Routon. The Declaration of Independence was read by Hon. F. Oliver, after which a Sabbath School address was delivered by Rev. Robert Campbell, of Trinity. The address was very appropriate, and was delivered in fine style. The speaker portrayed in glowing terms the blessings attending the Sabbath School cause, and urged with much zeal the necessity of training their children to study the Bible and attend the Sabbath School. After the address the exercises of the schools commenced, under the direction of their superintendents and teachers. These embraced speaking appropriate pieces and singing hymns. The exercises were of a very interesting nature. The scholars acquitted themselves in fine style, and the great concourse of people that listened to them were delighted. Many who had never witnessed the like before came to the conclusion that the cause was a good one, and that it ought to be encouraged.

Dinner being announced, the ladies and children filled the first table, which was well supplied with the good things of this life, while overhead waved the Star Spangled Banner.

After all had partaken at the table, they again met at the stand, and then listened with delight to an oration delivered by Geo. H. Wells, Esq., of Harrisonburg. Mr. Wells dwelled much upon our national blessings, and condemned nullification in strong terms. The oration was a very able one, and was pronounced by many as being among the best that they had ever listened to. This closed the exercises of the day—a day that will long be remembered by the citizens of Catahoula.

Nothing transpired during the day to mar in the least the peace and happiness of those who met on that occasion. No spirituous liquors were allowed on the ground; ice water and lemonade was the drink. All appeared satisfied. May the day always be spent in this sober and orderly manner.

A FRIEND OF SABBATH SCHOOLS.

Autaugaville, Ala., July, 1855.

The undersigned, as Secretary of the First Sabbath School, at Aeberry Church, would beg leave to report:

That the school still maintains an uninterrupted degree of prosperity. The interest manifested both by the teachers and scholars is of the highest character and all appear to be impressed with the vast importance of the great work to be accomplished by this means of doing good.

The school is now governed by our long tried and faithful Superintendent, Brother Samuel Standemire, and Brother T. J. Motley, Assistant, together with nine male and twelve female teachers; numbering in all, 116 scholars, 47 male and 69 female. The average attendance being 100, and the number of questions recited averaging 1,050. Number of school books, 500 volumes; bound library, 200; small unbound, 300; 30 copies Sunday School Visitor, when published.

The Secretary, in conclusion, would beg leave to refer to the faithful services of Bro. Standemire as Superintendent. For twenty years has he labored in that capacity with a zeal and devotion worthy of the highest commendation and praise. He may well be styled the Father of the Sabbath School at Asberry. From its incipiency to its present eminent and flourishing condition has he maintained and fulfilled the duties of the office which he now holds, with great promptitude, manifesting by his constant presence and attendance the greatest solicitude for its success; thereby not only challenging the admiration and respect of all, but particularly those under his supervision in the various classes of the school.

WM. N. THOMPSON, Secretary.

The heathen world, as Mr. Bickerstaff reasons the matter, had so little notion that perfection was to be expected from men, that among them any one quality or endowment in a heroic degree made a god. Hercules has strength, but it was never objected to him that he wanted wit. Apollo presided over wit, and it was never asked whether he had strength. Those wise heathens were glad to immortalize any one serviceable gift, and to overlook all imperfections in the person who had it. But with us it is far otherwise. We are only too eager to reject any manifest virtues, if we find them accompanied with a single apparent weakness.

Nor does the shrewd Mr. Bickerstaff end the argument here. He discovers in it the secret why principally it is that the worst of mankind, the libellers, receive so much encouragement. "The low race of men take a great pleasure in finding an eminent character levelled to their condition by a report of its defects, and keep themselves in countenance, though they are excelled in a thousand virtues, if they believe they have in common with a great person any one fault.

You had better be poisoned in your blood than your principles.

DEVELOPMENT OF SOUTHERN INDUSTRY.

The last number of DeBow's Review contains an address lately delivered before the South Carolina Institute for the Promotion of Agriculture, the Mechanic Arts and Manufactures, by Hon. James L. Orr, on the subject of the development of Southern Industry. The address is quite lengthy, occupying not less than twenty-two pages of the Review, but its scholarship, truth and suggestiveness entitle it to a general perusal and careful consideration. It touches upon a subject that came prominently before the late Southern Commercial Convention, as well as before other previous Conventions; that has been largely discussed in the newspapers and magazines of the day, and awakened very considerable interest among the reflecting portion of the community in every Southern State.

The dependence of the South upon the North for almost every manufactured article, is altogether disproportioned to the necessity of the case, and ought to be ended. There should be some degree of fair reciprocity in the business of the two extreme portions of the Union. Instead thereof, there is such a disparity as may well attract the attention of all thinking men. We go abroad for nearly every article we eat or use. We import from Massachusetts, Ohio, New York and Connecticut all of our machinery, our domestic utensils, our cloths, our fashions, and a great deal of our provisions. Our steamboats are built at Cincinnati, and our steamships at New York; our mills and machinery come from Boston; our cottons, our linens, our ploughs, our hats, our printing paper, the very pavement on which we ride and walk are brought from the same places. We send to the North for our horses and mules, for our shoes and woollen goods; for our books, for our carriages; indeed for almost every thing we want. They purchase from us the raw material at low prices, and send it back in a manufactured state at most extravagant cost.

This state of affairs cannot continue forever. The vis inertiae that has been so long and justly charged against Southern character must give way to a new impulse, and we must manufacture as well as produce. There is no reason why mills should not multiply around as well as in the Northern States; why the fabrics we use should not be made from the material we raise as well at home as abroad, and the charges of transportation and creation be saved to us. The experiments already made in this and other slaveholding States show that success and profit attend every judicious undertaking and encourage us to fresh efforts. Shipbuilding and the building of steamboats might just as well be carried on at Pascagoula, Charleston and Savannah as at Bath, Kittory, Boston or New York. In this city we could find plenty of labor, of capital and of demand to support as extensive machine shops as can be found at Pittsburgh, Cincinnati or Louisville. We might make our own printing and writing paper, as is done in Georgia and Carolina. We might publish our own books, educate our own children, and in a thousand ways rid ourselves of the painful servitude we are under to Northern merchants and capitalists. The cotton and cane crops are certainties however, so far as immediate sales and ready money are concerned, and being very productive, our planters prefer to invest and re-invest their property in the production of these articles rather than expend the slightest time or make the slightest outlay towards rendering themselves more self-dependent and independent than they now are. The great blinds their eyes to the less, and they work on through their whole lives well contented if such closing year finds them in a better pecuniary position than the new at its commencement. They ignore Dr. Franklin's wise suggestion that "a penny saved is worth two pence earned;" they will not gaze at a horizon which lies beyond that of their fathers, and so continually grow more and more dependent upon others for the common necessaries of life.

It is undoubtedly true that different regions are naturally adapted to different occupations and pursuits; that they are marked out for some special department of industry in which they may excel. New England is fitted for manufacturing; the great West for producing corn and wheat, and the South for the production of corn, cotton, cane and rice. A well regulated system of exchange might make it profitable for each section to turn its best energies to that occupation for which it has the greatest facilities. No system, nor no state of affairs, however, will warrant an entire hoedlessness of everything beyond the particular branch of industry which should be most prominent. The Yankees must do something beyond making cotton cloth and brogans, and the West something besides raising wheat and fat beeves. They do so. The New Englanders are almost entirely self-subsistent, and the Western people could, without great difficulty, be thrown upon their own resources to-morrow. How is it with us? The famine of the past winter is the most suitable reply. We are dependent for almost every article on States lying above us; dependent for our clothing, our tools and our food; dependent for necessaries as well as luxuries; dependent for the bread we eat and the clothes we wear. There is, to be sure, a partial dependence for cotton and sugar upon us, on the part of those we so largely patronize, but our own inertness is not thereby excused. The money we expend to build up cities and villages abroad, had better be expended at home and the profits be retained in our own pockets. Every great manufacture is the nucleus of a village, which may in time grow to be a town or city, giving aid to all business within its reach, increasing the value of land and of produce, and making plenty more plentiful. Our planters should raise their own corn, their own cattle, their own pork, and our citizens should endeavor to create here those manufactures for which they are now compelled to go abroad.

The subject is a very broad one, but it is well worthy of careful examination, and must ultimately come up in a decisive shape. Why not do something at once? [Daily Crescent.

A Fast Horse.—The Delta has a Mississippi correspondent, who, a few days ago, while driving out with a horse and buggy, was chased by a drove of mad bulls. After a pursuit of a few minutes, notwithstanding the Colonel threw out his overcoat and carriage cushions, the bellowing herd overtook him and came near destroying his buggy and making a finish of himself and his fleet steed.

The ship Agues, which arrived at New York on the 13th, sailed from Rio de Janeiro on the 2d of June, in company with the ship Barnshee, for Baltimore.

On the evening of the 1st of June the ship Megunticook, from Philadelphia, was on fire in the port of Rio, and had to be scuttled. It was supposed the crew set her on fire, as a number of them had been arrested the previous day for mutiny.

At Toronto, Canada, on the night of the 14th, an attack was made by a mob on a circus company at that place. The wagons and fixtures were smashed and an attempt was made to burn the canvas. Fire arms were used by the rioters and several persons were badly hurt. The police finally quelled the disturbance.

France.—Opening of the Legislative Assembly. Speech of the Emperor.

The French Legislative Assembly was opened on the 21 of July, when the Emperor Louis Napoleon delivered the following speech:

Messieurs les Senateurs, Messieurs les Deputes: The diplomatic negotiations commenced during the course of our last session are already made you forsee that I should be obliged to call you together when they came to a termination.

Unhappily the conferences of Vienna have failed in procuring peace, and I come again to appeal to the patriotism of the country in your own. Were we wanting in moderation in settling the conditions? I do not fear to answer the question before you.

One year already had passed since the commencement of the war, and already France and England had saved Turkey, gained two battles, forced Russia to evacuate the Principalities, and to exhaust her forces in the defence of Crimea. We had, moreover, to our favor the adhesion of Austria and the moral support of the rest of Europe.

In that situation the Cabinet of Vienna proposed us if we would consent to treat upon bases vaguely formulated. Before our accession to a refusal on our part seemed natural. Was it then to be supposed, forsooth, that the demands of France and England would increase in proportion to the greatness of the struggle and the sacrifices already made?

Well, France and England did not turn these advantages to account, or even make the most of the rights given to them by previous treaties, so much had they at heart to recilitate peace and to give an unchallengeable proof of their moderation.

We restricted ourselves to ask, in the interests of Germany, the free navigation of the Danube, and a breakwater against the Russian power which continually obstructed the mouths of that great river.

Well, all these propositions, which I may say in magnanimous from their disinterestedness, and which were approved in principle by Austria, Prussia, and by Russia herself, have been rejected in the Conferences.

We demanded, in the interest of humanity and of justice, the same guarantees for the Christians of every confession under the exclusive protection of the Sultan.

In the interests of the Porte, as well as those of Europe, we demanded that Russia should limit to a reasonable degree, sufficient to defend her against any attack, the number of her ships in the Black Sea, a number which she could maintain with an aggressive object.

We demanded, in the interests of Austria and of Germany, a better Constitution for the Danubian Principalities, that they might serve as a barrier against these repeated invasions of the North.

Russia, who had consented in theory to all, has refused every limitation of her naval force, and we have still to wait for Austria to fulfil her engagements, which consisted in rendering our treaty of alliance offensive and defensive, the negotiations failed.

Austria, it is true, proposed to us to guarantee with her by treaty the independence of Turkey, and to consider for the future as a casus belli an increase of the number of Russian forces of war exceeding that before the commencement of hostilities.

To accept such a proposition was impossible for it in no manner bound Russia; and on the contrary, we should apparently have sanctioned her preponderance in the Black Sea by treaty.

The war had to follow its course.

The admirable devotion of the army and navy will, I trust, soon lead to a happy result. It is for you to preside me with the means to continue the struggle.

The country has already shown what sources it has at its command, and that confidence it places in me.

Some months since it offered me 1,700,000 Of more than I demanded. A portion of this sum will suffice to maintain its military honor and its rights as a great nation.

I had resolved to go and place myself in the midst of that valiant army, where the presence of the sovereign could not have failed to produce a happy influence, and a witness of the heroic efforts of our soldiers. I should have been proud to lead them; but serious questions agitate abroad, which have always remained present and the nature of circumstances demands at home new and important measures. It is therefore, with regret that I abandoned the idea.

My Government will propose to you to vote the annual recruitment bill; there will be an extraordinary levy, and the bill will take the usual course necessary for the regular administration of a recruitment bill.

In conclusion, gentlemen, let us pay homage solemnly, a just tribute of praise to those who fight for the country; let us mingle our regrets with those whose loss we have to deplore.

So great an example of unselfishness and constancy will not have been given in vain to the world.

Let us not be discouraged by the sacrifices which are necessary, for as you are aware the nation must either abdicate every part of its character, or if it possesses the instinct and the will to not conformably to its glorious traditions, to its providential missions, it must learn how to support all the trials which alone can re-temper it, and restore it to the rank which is its due.

Faith in the Almighty, perseverance in our efforts, and we shall obtain a peace worthy of the alliance of two great nations.

Our latest Madrid correspondence bears date the 26th and 27th ult. Under this latter date we learn a telegraphic dispatch was received at the British legation from Lord Howden, stating that Victoria, June 25, 6 P. M., send assurances of his safe arrival at that town, after having left Bilboa six hours in the hands of the Carlists, on the north side of Burgoe.

Mississippi.—On the 10th inst., says the Natchez Courier, a difficulty occurred in that city between two Germans, Jacob Marks, a merchant of that place, and J. W. Winters, a butcher. In the fight Winters was stabbed through the arm near the shoulder with a butcher knife, which divided many of the large blood vessels, not involving, however, the brachial artery. Mortification supervened and the arm was amputated. His recovery is extremely doubtful. The Intelligencer says that the matter is to undergo judicial investigation. It deems it improper to attempt to detail the facts except what all agree in, that Winters commenced the fight. Mr. Marks seems to be deeply distressed, and manifests much concern about the wounded man's recovery, having proferred to pay all necessary expenses for medical aid.

The Coffeeville Herald, of the 14th, says:

We learn that the eastern portion of Tallahatchie county was visited, on the night of the 4th inst., with a most severe and destructive hail storm, destroying, entirely, whole fields of cotton and corn, and so damaging others that half a crop will not be made.

Burning of a Steamer and Loss of Life.—A dispatch of the 17th, from Philadelphia, says:

The splendid steamer John Stevens, belonging to the Camden and Amboy Line, was destroyed by fire at 2 o'clock this morning, while lying at Wilts Hull landing, below Bordentown. The entire woodwork was consumed, but the hull being of iron, it is probable that the machinery, not seriously damaged. The J. S. was the largest and the most expensive boat in the Delaware River. She was built in 1846. The cook and steward are reported missing. The other hands saved themselves by leaping overboard.

The origin of the fire is not known. Six persons were sleeping on the boat. So far as the pilot, one deck hand and the chambermaid are all that are known to be saved. Three firemen, cooks, are missing, who are supposed to have jumped overboard.

The "volosnic repeating pistol" is the name of a newly invented fire-arm in New Haven. It carries a Minie or conical ball, in a rifle barrel, and will put it through, it is said, a three-inch plank at a distance of ninety rods. The revolving tube will hold ten ball cartridges, and can be deposited in two seconds of time. The piece may be discharged thirty times in fifty seconds. It is so contrived that it is not liable to accidental discharge. There is no priming, no flash and no recoil. The powder and ball are inclosed in the same metallic cover.

Deaths.

JOHN S. GOODMAN.

The subject of this brief memoir was born in Charleston, S. C., February 20, 1826. He, however, was raised in this city, (Mobile, Ala.,) having been brought here by his parents when only about five years old. In the fourteenth year of his age he made a profession of religion, and was received on trial in the Franklin street Methodist Church, December 16, 1839, and from that time to the day of his death he lived as becometh the gospel of Christ. A more beautiful and striking exemplification of early piety is rarely to be met with. His name has long been a "household word" in the family of Methodism in this city, and will long be remembered as significant of "the highest style of man." He was proverbial for depth of piety, combined with earnest, ardent and holy zeal. He shunned no cross, shrunk from no toil, nor avoided any responsibility where duty or principle was involved; but, with modest demeanor and humble trust in Christ, went forward to every good work to which the Church, under God, appointed him. A few particulars of his short but useful life will not only serve to corroborate this statement, but may be referred to as an outline of character worthy of all imitation.

It pleased God, in the wisdom of His providence, some time in the fall of '41, or winter of '42, to remove from him his father, leaving one young brother, at a very tender and susceptible time of life, without the care and counsel so necessary to the proper guidance of the steps of youth. The same dispensation left him involved in responsibility beyond his years. Being the oldest son, the care of his widowed mother and her orphan children, to some extent, fell upon him; and nobly did he do his part, faithfully did he feel the demands of his delicate and responsible position. To this his weeping mother bore testimony in his dying hour. He called her to his bedside, and with other parting words he asked her, "Mother, have I done my duty towards you—have I been a dutiful son?" To which she replied, "My son, you have nothing to reproach yourself with; you took your father's place, and have done all that a son could do." Indeed, he was all that a mother could wish. He early learned to toil, that he might have something wherewith to assist others in the sad hour of adversity and bereavement; and of all he earned he called nothing his own while his mother, sisters or brother had a real want.

In 1851 he was married to Miss Lavinia Mason, of Sumter county, Ala., and as husband and father he was equal to himself as man. He combined the manly with the gentle, nobility of nature with simplicity of manners, and the soul and center of domestic bliss. He was obeyed because he was beloved, and loved because he was worthy. He was hero, within the family circle, at home, with wife, children and confiding friends, his piety was conspicuous and his religious example shone with peculiar lustre. Let us now glance at his relations to the church.

In 1846 he was appointed by the writer of this article leader of a large and important class, composed mostly of intelligent young men, a class in which he had grown up, and of every member of it he was well and favorably known. The appointment gave universal satisfaction. And while he entered upon the responsible duties of his office with becoming diffidence and self-distrust, he nevertheless failed not to meet all its demands with a degeee of zeal and integrity that soon characterized him as one of the most efficient and profitable leaders in the connection. He continued in this relation until our return to his charge in 1854, when he asked for a change, on the ground that his secular engagements were so numerous and pressing that he could not well spare a night in the week to attend to the class; adding, at the same time, that he believed that a change would be profitable to both parties. How far he was right in this remains to be known. True, he had led the class for nine years, but so far as that is concerned, he might have continued nine years longer with profit to every member. In this, however, he was an exception; for there are few such leaders as was our deceased brother. In compliance with his request a change was made, and he was appointed to one of the Sunday morning classes, which he continued to lead up to the time of his death, with great acceptability and profit. He was a man of faith and full of the Holy Ghost, and his meetings were generally characterized with power. He entered upon the duties of his last appointment with some reluctance, because the class was composed of some of the oldest members of the Church. His reverence for age was such that he doubted for a while the propriety of the appointment. He however yielded his objections, and served them faithfully to the last; and they now mourn his loss as that of a friend and faithful spiritual guide. At the mention of his name they weep as children, and truly their bereavement is great.

In 1847 he was licensed to exhort, and in this capacity he was, if possible, more remarkable than in any other. I have often seen him, during the progress of a meeting, rise from his knees in the congregation, after sermon, and walk deliberately within the chancel without solicitation, and pour forth such a flood of warm, affectionate appeal to the unconverted, that the whole congregation was held spell-bound to the close; and not unfrequently some soul, unmoved before, would rise and come forward for prayer. He was a man of wonderful gifts. All his efforts were impromptu, and worthy of the most talented among the ministry. Ardent and impulsive, yet such was the depth and genuineness of his religious experience that his impulses were always on the right side. He never thought he was called to preach, yet he always thought he was called to work! He recognized other fields of usefulness than the pulpit, and well did he answer his vocation. He was the most efficient and useful layman of his years I ever knew. To this the whole Church bears testimony, and deeply do they deplore his loss. The old Franklin street Station has lost one of her brightest ornaments, and she mourns for him as a mother bereaved of her son. Other religious denominations in the city sympathize with us, and feel that the Church of Christ has lost a "burning and shining light." Even the wicked do homage to his character as a Christian, and accord to his memory the largest measure of reverence and respect. His employers speak of him as an efficient and faithful business man, a valued friend, and a Christian in the highest sense of the term. They lament him, not merely as a loss to their concern, but as a brother beloved indeed.

A few weeks previous to his death he seemed to have a presentiment that his end was near at hand, and spoke of it in his class meeting and elsewhere. On Friday morning, July 6, at 2 o'clock, he was suddenly seized with bilious cholic, and from the very first moment of his illness he said he would never recover. He continued to grow worse every hour and suffered the most excruciating pain, with but slight intervals, to the last. But calm and collected, he said he was ready; arranged his temporal matters as far as possible, and gave the fullest directions about everything pertaining to his family, his business, and even the place of his burial. He called his friends severally to his bedside and gave unto each his dying charge, not forgetting even his servants. Some of these interviews were remarkable and deeply affecting; and we trust will long be remembered and productive of much good. His pastor, with others of the Methodist ministry, was absent from the city during his illness, not having returned from Summerfield, and only arrived a few minutes too late to see him alive. He however, did not forget us. He frequently inquired about our return, and finding he could not last till we arrived he left a message for us, which I must be pardoned for inserting here: "Tell Bro. D. farewell, and to live the life of a Christian; tell Bro. B. to preach Jesus; and tell Bro. N. to be faithful." And after again exhorting all around and about him to meet him in Heaven, he took his final leave of his wife and children, and on Monday, July 9, about 6 A. M., his pure and happy spirit took its flight from "earth-born woe and care" to meet with God in Heaven.

"Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

DIED—In the town of Bastrop, La., on the 9th July, 1855, MARY EVANS, consort of the Rev. G. W. Evans, of the Louisiana Conference, and daughter of Jonathan and Mahala Clower, in the 17th year of her age. The deceased has left an infant son without a mother's care or a mother's love. But the mother's God will be the infant's guide, for He doeth all things well. The deceased had been married but a little over one short year, when torn by the ruthless hand of death from the embrace of her affectionate husband, kind parents and many friends, who mourn with bleeding hearts and wounded spirits her early demise. But we mourn not as those without hope, for she had been for some years a member of the M. E. Church, and a consistent Christian; and when the grim monster, death, was about to drag her almost angelic spirit away, she said she was going to Heaven. Farewell, loved one! No more shall we hear thy sweet voice until we greet thee on the plains of light.

Hushed be every mirthful sound,
Calmed the turbulence of life,
Spirits holy throng around,
Gazing on the final strife,

Spirit, what is death? O, tell!
In its mistery surprise.
What is life where seraphs dwell?
Hallelujahs endless rise,

Rashly do I ask to know
What the secrets are to thee,
What is duty here below,
Weeping Calvary to me.

Beauteous is the Heaven of light,
Multitudes its radiance share,
Faith's triumphant at the sight,
And happy Mary's there.

DIED—In Galnesville, Miss., July 11th, CHARLES HARVEY CROSBY, son of Rev. G. L. Crosby, aged 11 years. His death was very sudden, he having been apparently in perfect health until within twenty-four hours of his decease. When free from convulsive paroxysms, his mind was clear and self-possessed. When near his end, he commended himself in a tranquil and serene manner to the mercy of God, his Heavenly Father, and then his spirit went to rejoin his beloved mother, whose death was recorded in these columns a few weeks since. The then bereaved husband is now also the bereaved father. Yet still the language of his heart is, "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord!" C.

DIED—At his residence in Galveston, June 29, JOHN KLEIN, a native of Nova Scotia, and lately a resident of New Orleans, aged 50 years. He was a good husband, an affectionate parent and an honest man.

QUARANTINE AT VICKSBURG.—In reference to this subject the Vicksburg Whig, of the 19th, has the following:

We publish this morning the quarantine ordinance offered at the last meeting of the Board of Mayor and Council, and laid over until Monday evening next, and ordered to be published. We have not read this ordinance, but as it is said to be a copy of the Natchez ordinance, which has stood the test and found to be satisfactory, we presume this will be adjudged sufficient. We will not permit the expression of a doubt as to the passage of an ordinance for the protection of our citizens. We know there are some, a very few, who doubt both the propriety and necessity of a quarantine; and while we can respect their opinion on the subject, we must say that the sentiment of the country and a vast majority of the city has been too well expressed to leave room for a doubt as to the wishes of the people upon the subject. We have only one request to make in the matter, and that is, as public sentiment demands the adoption of quarantine regulations, that our Board of Mayor and Council will act promptly in the matter, so that our citizens may not only be put at rest, but that it may prevent the uprising and circulation of the thousand and one rumors and reports which will so surely tend to the destruction of our summer business and social happiness.

There is little, in fact no doubt, that the ordinance referred to passed the Council last evening. So, we are now effectually shut out from both Natchez and Vicksburg.

MEETING OF THE KANSAS LEGISLATURE.—The St. Louis Republican has a letter from its Kansas correspondent under date of the 9th inst., from which we extract the following:

Most of the members were at Pawnee early on the morning of Monday, the 2d inst., the day of their convocation by the Governor's proclamation. They were obliged to encamp in wagons and tents, as no houses were provided for their accommodation. The legislative hall was no even completed. It was a rough barn or warehouse, in which the floor was not yet laid, although the carpenters worked at it through the Sabbath day on the 1st inst.

The members desired to hold a caucus for the purpose of selecting permanent officers for the two houses. There was no house in which they could eit, and they were obliged to resort to a grove about a mile distant and arrange their preliminaries in its shades.

At 12 o'clock, M., the floor of the capitol was so far finished that it could be occupied, and the two Houses convened at that hour.

Of the Council, Thomas Johnson was elected President, R. R. Rees, President pro tem., John A. Halderman, Chief Clerk, Charles H. Grover, Assistant Clerk, Carey B. Whitehead, Sergeant-at-Arms.

Of the House, J. H. Striegfellow was elected Speaker, Joseph Anderson, Speaker pro tem., J. M. Lysle, Chief Clerk, John Martin, Assistant Clerk, T. J. B. Cramer, Sergeant-at-Arms.

HORRIBLE REVENGE.—Dr. Radcliff, who was fond of the pleasures of the table, was one afternoon comfortably disposing of a bottle of wine, when a countryman entered the room, and begged him to come immediately to his wife who was dying.

"I can't help it my fine fellow, I can't come till I have finished my bottle."

Now it happened that the countryman was a large strong man, and the doctor a very small one, so it occurred to the former that his best plan was to seize the doctor and carry him off on his shoulders. He did so; and while he was henring him alone, the doctor, bursting with rage, exclaimed:

"You villain, I'll cure your wife." And he was as good as his word.

Seven slaves belonging to William McCoy and others, of Pendleton county, Va., eloped a few nights ago, each one taking a horse with him. They are doubtless making their way to Canada. A considerable number have run away from Pendleton and Hardy within a year or two, and some of them who are in Canada are in the habit of corresponding with their friends in their own neighborhood.

The New York Journal of Commerce estimates that 25,000 bushels of potatoes have arrived at that port this season from Bermuda alone, besides large quantities from Charleston and Norfolk. The crop in the Northern States promises to be unprecedented, so that it will be a difficult matter to keep up the prices much longer.

A Paris physician has just published a pamphlet with the title of "The Physical and Moral Degeneration of the Human Race caused by Vaccination." The startling theory that Jenner, who for more than half a century has enjoyed the reputation of one of the greatest benefactors of humanity that ever existed, was in fact the principal author of cholera and a host of modern diseases, has been broached before, but without exciting much attention. Now, however, the Imperial Academy of Medicine has placed the subject on their papers for discussion.

CAT FISH HOTEL CONSUMED.—This well-known place of resort, situated on the Bay Road, about five miles from the city, was burned down on Sunday morning between six and seven o'clock. Mr. Bennett, the proprietor, lost most of the fixtures, etc., of the house. The origin of the fire is not known. Mr. Bennett has removed to the new house about one hundred yards below the site of the old hotel, where he is now ready to receive his friends. He has christened it "Hotel de Cat." [Mobile Tribune.

On the 16th the Manchester (N. H.) Corporation Mill, No. 1, was nearly destroyed by fire, together with the contents. Loss estimated at $250,000. By this accident 500 persons are thrown out of employment. There was insurance to the amount of $100,000.

On the same day another fire broke out destroying twenty-two stores and dwelling houses, including Fatney's block. Loss about $100,000, partially insured.

The Baltimore Sun cautions persons who intend taking service with either the allied forces or the Russians, that they cannot hope to be released until the end of the Crimean campaign, lest they should convey important information to the enemy.

A soldier on trial for habitual drunkenness was addressed by the president—"Prisoner, you have heard the prosecution for habitual drunkenness, what have you to say in defence?" "Nothing, please your honor, but a habitual thirst."

SHOCKING AFFAIR.—A dispatch of the 16th, from Buffalo, says:

James Thompson's house in the village of Brant, C. W., was fired by incendiaries on Saturday night, and Mr. Thompson and three daughters and two grandaughters perished in the flames.

ARRIVAL OF THE CANADA AT HALIFAX.

The Spanish Insurrection Not Ended.

From the New York papers of the 19th we cut the following telegraphic dispatches of the foreign news received by the steamship Canada:

HALIFAX, Wednesday, July 18.—The Royal Mail steamship Canada, Captain Stone, from Liverpool on Saturday, the 7th inst., arrived here at 10:50 this morning.

The Canada reports passing, on the 8th July, the American ship Constitution off Castlet Rock, Ireland.

The Canada left Halifax at 2 P. M. for Boston, where she will be due about 10 o'clock Thursday evening.

Lord Raglan was buried on the 3d of July with all the pomp which circumstances permitted.

There are rumors that Pelissier is about to be superseded.

Since the repulse of the 18th June, the Allies have been strengthening their advances against the Malakoff, and Pelissier's latest dispatch, dated July 4, says his works are progressing satisfactorily.

Gen. Simpson telegraphed on the 4th, that there was nothing new since his last accounts.

The main facts have been already stated of the unsuccessful attack upon Sebastopol on the 18th of June. The papers per the Canada contain further details, including the dispatch of Pelissier.

It is stated that General Margan's French Division, on the way to attack the fort on the extreme right, on the Careenieg Harbor, commenced the attack prematurely, and before the other division had taken their ground. Margan fell mortally wounded, and his division being thrown into disorder, the Russians turned their concentrated fire upon the next division, as it came up under General Brunet, and shattered it badly. Brunet also fell. Orders were then given to withdraw the troops into the trenches, although General Autevaux had meantime reached the Malakoff Tower. The retreat was effected with good order, but with great loss.

When Lord Raglan saw the defeat of the first French Division, he hastily ordered an attack on the Redan, to effect a diversion in favor of the French, although it was previously intended that the British should not attack until the French had captured the Malakoff, inasmuch as the Malakoff's guns quite commanded the Redan. So far as civilians at a distance could judge, Lord Raglan's order to attack was a great error, for the British storming party not being sufficiently strong to carry the works, were repulsed with great slaughter. A curious incident is, that had the assault been general, or systematically planned, the city would have fallen, or at least its first line of defense might have been carried.

French letters of June 25th say that the army was full of confidence. The approaches were pushing forward to the Malakoff Tower, and a French battery of thirty guns was nearly completed in front of the Careenieg Bay, to keep off the Russian ships, their fire having caused much loss on the 18th.

Vienna papers say that Gortschakoff had sent for 24,000 more men, as he had reinforced Liprandi's army with another division.

The Turks and Sardinians under Omer Pasha and Gen. Mormora, have made excursions in the lateral valleys of the Tchernaya, without meeting resistance.

Numerous works of art, captured from the Kertch Museum, and from Gen. Wraegel's private collection, are on the way to Paris.

Mr. Stow, the Commissioner sent by the London Times to the Crimea, to administer the balance of the Hospital Fund, fell sick from overexertion, and "routine" excluded him from the very hospitals he was aiding. He was carried in a coroche in the Church at Balaklava, where he died a victim to official inhumanity.

The Turco-British contingent force, now numbering 6,000 men, is in camp near Demusdere.

Careful estimates show that this war has already cost half a million of lives, and yet no decisive battles have taken place.

A dispatch from Berlin, dated July 4, states that the town of Nystadt, at the entrance of the Gulf of Bothnia, has been bombarded and destroyed.

Russian accounts under date of June 19, say, the Allied flotilla of 180 guns fired for eight hours against the batteries at the mouth of the Narva, without effect, and then withdrew to Seskar Island.

June 20—The Allies made a descent on Kotka, Island, destroyed the telegraph and burnt the Government stores.

June 21—Some of the Allied steamers took soundings in Nystadt Roads, while others fired some hours on Port Revel, without doing any material injury.

June 22 and 23—Occasional shots were exchanged between gun-boats employed in shore and the Revel batteries.

The Journal of St. Petersburg publishes a correspondence respecting the recent affair at Hango, stating that the flag of truce was not visible, and accusing the English of making improper use of flags of truce generally.

July 5—The hulk of the Allied squadron was off Cronstadt.

England.

The business before Parliament was not of an important nature.

Messrs. Roebuck and Duncombe had asked for a Committee of Inquiry into the alleged brutal conduct of the police at the Hyde Park demonstration against the Sunday trading bill, but were refused.

On Friday night Mr. Milner Gibson asked the Government for an explanation as to Lord John Russell's recent conduct at Vienna, in stating, among other things, that Great Britain never contemplated a restoration of Poland and Hungary. Messrs. Cobden, Roebuck and D'Israeli, all attacked Lord John, after which the matter was dropped.

Gen. Peel was to move the previous question against Mr. Roebuck's vote of censure.

Lord Elgin, it is said, will be appointed Postmaster General.

The magnificent iron paddle-wheel steamship Persia, of 3600 tons and 1,000 horse power, was launched in the Clyde on the 3d of July. She will be ready to take her place in the Cunard line in October next.

M. Peterson, the Russian Secretary of Legation at Lisbon, was recently discovered on board an English steamer, returning from Southampton to Lisbon, he having been on a secret mission in France and England. The American Minister to Portugal, they say, recognized him.

France.

On the 5th of July, the Legislature voted the loan of 750,000,000 francs. In addition to this loan, an increase of taxation is proposed, namely, one-third increase of duty on all spirits, ten per cent on railway passengers and goods, and a new war "decime" of indirect taxation, is expected will produce seventy millions of francs per annum.

The Emperor's speech has been variously commented on, but on the whole is regarded favorably. The hit at Austria is considered as well merited. It is reported that the Austrian Minister has asked for an explanation.

Spain.

A dispatch via Marseilles, dated July 5, states that a rising had taken place in Catalonia. The difficulty is, nominally, respecting the rate of wages. Two manufacturers had been assassinated at Barcelona. The National Guard refused to march, and the Captain-General had shut himself up in the Citadel, with a few faithful troops, whence he sent mediators to the insurgents, who received them with shouts of Vive Espartero.

A Madrid telegraph dispatch of the 5th, says that the insurgents still held Barcelona.

Accounts from Perpignan mentioned the defeat of a Carlist leader.

The outbreak at present seems more like a riot than an insurrection.

The correspondent of the London Times says the Spanish Minister at Paris had a long interview with the Emperor on the state of Spain, and Napoleon had expressed a determination to prevent any attempt to unseat Queen Isabella.

The Spanish Government is loud in its praise of Napoleon, and contrasts his exertions in the cause of order with Louis Phillippe's duplicity. Various indications show that Napoleon is manufacturing political capital in Spain.

Italy.

In Sardinia much depression of feeling exists on account of the mortality that has befallen Sardinian troops in the Crimea. Turkey appoints a resident minister to Sardinia.

The Neapolitan Government is reported to have sanctioned the erection of an hospital for convalescents of the allied army at the Baths of Ischia, but this seems questionable.

Prussia.

The King is recovering from his recent indisposition.

Russia.

Some English papers contain statements respecting revolutionary movements in Russia in favor of Constantine as Emperor, but they are manifestly inventions.

Liverpool Cotton Market.

The Broker's Circular reports a fair amount of business at the close of last week, at full prices, but since the arrival of the Africa with favorable advices of the growing crop, the demand has been on a more limited scale and prices of most qualities of American were an eighth lower than on Friday last.

Other circulars mention that there is no pressure in the market, nor any large quantity offering, and that the above decline of an eighth is somewhat irregular, and mostly in qualities below fair. The week's sales add up 46,400 bales, including 11,780 on speculation, and 2,800 for export.

Friday's sales amounted to 4,000 bales, including 1,000 on speculation, the market closing tamely at the following quotations, as given by Messrs. Brown, Shipley & Co.: Fair Orleans 7¾d: Middling 6¾d; Fair Mobilee 7d.; Middling 6 5-16d; Fair Uplands 7d.; Middling 6¼d.; Ordinary to good ordinary 5¾d. to 6d.; Inferior 4¾d. to 5¾d. Some firms quote Fair Mobilee and Uplands at 6¾d., and Middling Orleans at 6 7-16d. The stock on hand is 607,000 bales, including 423 000 American.

Liverpool Breadstuffs Market.

Messrs. Brown, Shipley & Co report the Corn Market quiet, with moderate sales in Wheat and Flour at last week's prices; while Indian Corn has been quite neglected at nominally 1s. 6d. to 2s. decline. White Wheat quoted at 11s 9d. to 12s. 2d.; Red, 10s. to 11s 3d.; Western Canal Flour, 40s. to 40s. 6d.; Philadelphia and Baltimore, 40s. and 41s. to 42s.; Ohio, 42s 6d. to 43s.; Canadian, 40s 6d. to 41s.; Sour, 39s. to 40s.; Yellow Corn, 44s 6d. to 45s.; Mixed, 44s 6d.; White, 46s. to 46s 6d.—with no inquiry on Friday. Wheat and Flour were firmer than in the early part of the week. The weather had been favorable, and the crop prospects were good.

Liverpool Provision Market.

Messrs. Richardson, Spence & Co. report Beef without demand, but stock much reduced. Nothing doing in Pork. Bacon in active demand at the decline, 49s. being the extreme quotation. Lard had advanced 1s. 6d; the stock on hand was about 2000 tons. Messrs. Bigland, Athya & Co. report Bacon dull, and Lard advanced to 53s. to 54s.

London Money Market.

Money easy, though not perhaps quite so cheap as before the publication of the French loans. Exchange on Paris had fallen, and there had been considerable export of gold. Consols closed at 91¼ to 91⅝. Dollars 4s. 11d. to 4s. 11¼d. Bar silver, 5s. 1½d. Doubloons 74s. 6d. to 74s. 9d. Eagles, 76s. 3½d.

LAFOURCHE ITEMS.—We clip the following items of intelligence from that excellent paper, the Thibodaux Minerva, of Saturday last:

The weather has become very regular in its habits lately. The mornings are hot, sultry and oppressive; about the middle of the day the clouds gather over us and weep as though the flood-gates of heaven were opened to their fullest extent; and in the evening we have a repetition of the roasting and boiling process. Of course mosquitoes flourish most luxuriantly under such a state of affairs, and the specimens now hovering about our head and heels, and ciegieg their notes of derision as we vainly attempt to annihilate some of the boldest, are a caution to gallynippers."

THE SUGAR MARKET.—On next Saturday, the 28th inst., there will be a meeting at the Court House of all those interested in establishing the sugar market at Algiers, instead of over the river as at present. We have heard some pretty strong arguments used on both sides of the question. We sincerely hope something may be done to relieve the planters and shippers living on the line of the Opelousas Railroad from the vexations they have heretofore experienced in regard to this matter.

FIVE FEET DEEP OF EELS.—We find the following fish story in a late number of the Boston Transcript: "At the season of the year, when numerous species of the piscatory tribe resort in indefinite embers to their usual haunts to deposit their spawn, the water at the foot of the large dam at Lawrence, on the Merrimac river, presents a curious and interesting spectacle. Incalculable swarms of lamprey eels, shad and alewives have gathered at this point, for the purpose of repairing to the upper tributaries, but the falls being eighteen feet in height, the force of the miniature cataract is such that their progress is effectually stayed. They attempt all sorts of ways to climb the falling mass of waters, only to be driven back to repeat the vain experiment. When the dam was in progress of construction, the migratory habits of the fish were considered, and a large, substantial fish course, built of heavy timber, was erected at the southerly end, that they might readily follow their instinctive nature; but they were thwarted by the rushing tide, so that not even salmon, that exceedingly nimble fish, is able to stem the current. Millions of fish, chiefly lamprey eels, therefore, accumulate in the tumbling waters, in masses literally four or five feet deep, and fishermen, who have purchased the right, station themselves on the bank with long lances, to spear them. One man recently obtained nine thousand in a single day. A peculiar feature of the organization of the lamprey eel is, that it has no bones, and does not preserve that tenacity of life, even to its immolation in the frying-pan, which is characteristic of our common harbor eels. Its flesh is not admired by our citizens generally, but large quantities are packed in barrels, and sent abroad to tickle less fastidious palates."

A DOG STORY.—A friend in Scottsburg, who signs himself "One who reads and pays for the Herald," (such persons are always entitled to a hearing in these columns,) sends us the following affecting account of the fidelity of a dog to his master:

Mr. O M Hopkins, late of Scottsburg, who died in January last, had a small and sprightly terrier, named "Nig," of which he was very fond. After the death of his master, Nig grew melancholy. Nothing the family could do seemed to amuse him. He could not be enticed from the side of his mistress, but would follow her about everywhere, grave and sedate, as though actually thinking of his dead master. One day a closet containing his master's clothing was opened. No sooner did Nig discover the garments, than he frisked about, almost frantic with delight, evidently expecting his master to appear. When the poor animal discovered his error, he testified his disappointment by piteous and mournful howlings.

In May last, poor Nig grew more melancholy than ever. All attempts to induce him to leave the house were unavailing, until one day his mistress went to visit the grave of her husband. Then he followed, and on arriving at the mound commenced digging and moaning, testifying his grief in the most affecting manner. From that time he could not be enticed to leave the grave, but stayed day and night till he starved to death. He was found there, stretched on the earth, cold and stiff. [Danville Ifer.

To offset the above and show that human beings have some feelings as well as brutes, we give place to the following, which we find in the Pittsburg Dispatch of the 10th:

A German, named George Shank, aged about fifty, for many years hostler for Dr. Dalig, in Waynesboro', committed soloide last Saturday morning, by hanging. The only cause for the act seems to have been distress at the death of a favorite horse belonging to the Doctor. During the sickness of the animal, Shank was heard to say "When Fox di a I want to die," and after its death, when removing from the body the halter, he said, "the halter will do me a service some day."

LATER FROM MEXICO.

Destructive Gale on the Coast.

The steamship Orizaba, Capt. Forbes, arrived on Wednesday, bringing files of papers from Vera Cruz to the 22d, and from the city of Mexico to the 18th.

Captain Forbes reports that the American bark Flash, Capt. Wilson, from New York, arrived at Vera Cruz on the evening of the 21st inst.

Capt. Forbes also reports the occurrence of a most destructive gale on the Pacific coast of Mexico, on the 1st ult. The ports of St. Blas and Mazatlan were visited by a heavy gale, in which some six ships were driven ashore and totally lost. Farther down the coast, at Ypalta, the American clipper ship Water Witch, Plummer master, was driven from her anchorage and became a total wreck. Capt. Plummer, of the Water Witch, came passenger on the Orizaba.

Some thirty lives were lost at Mazatlan, and property to the amount of a million and a half of dollars were destroyed.

The papers by this arrival are destitute of news. The fact that they announce no further defeats of the insurgents appears rather significant. The subject of establishing a constitutional and organic system of laws is undergoing discussion in some of the journals in the usual guarded style. The revolutionary storm has no doubt superficed the matter, and it is apparently the prelude to a conciliatory course on the part of His Serene Highness, as the only means of retaining his sway.

A slight shock of earthquake was experienced in the city of Mexico, on the 15th.

Copious rains had fallen in many parts of Mexico. At Mextillan fields had been inundated and crops destroyed, and the rise of water at the city of Mexico, on the 11th inst., was almost unprecedented.

FATAL ACCIDENT.—On the afternoon of the 16th, as a number of workmen were engaged in erecting a bridge over Ridley's Creek, on the Isles of the West Chester Railroad, Pa., a temporary framing gave way and fell, carrying with it the entire superstructure and five workmen employed on the upper chord. The foreman and two workmen on the lower chord perceiving that something was giving way, sprang to the nearest pier, a distance of fifteen feet, and escaped uninjured. Three of the five who fell with the bridge were killed, and the other two are so much injured that no hope is entertained of their recovery. The names of the killed are Dixon Doley, Jacob Russel and George Stille. George Jeane and Thomas Deason were severely wounded.

STRUCK BY LIGHTNING.—The Pittsburg Dispatch states, that on the 1st inst., the house of Mr. Leinhart, in Franlin county, Pa., was struck by lightning. The fluid ran down both ends of the house, penetrating it at several places, and shattering to pieces everything in its course. There were nine persons in the house at the time, Mr. Leinhart, his wife and seven sons, all of whom escaped without injury except one of the sons, who happened to be in the loft; he was struck on the head with such force as to break the bridge of his nose and completely sever one of his eyelids. It is thought the sight of the injured eye will be entirely destroyed, but that otherwise he will not be seriously affected.

The Washington Union pronounces the statement that the three American officers, sent to the Crimea by our Government, had been refused by the Czar permission to visit the fortifications of Sebastopol, a "malicious fabrication." Accordingly to a private letter received in Washington, they were entertained in Berlin by the Russian Minister, greeted at Warsaw with great hospitality by Prince Paskiewitch, who got up a grand review of troops for their edification, and afterwards invited them to St. Petersburg. An engineer was provided to accompany them to Sebastopol and show them the fortifications.

On the Boston and Maine Railroad, a few days ago, near Berwick, as the conductor was passing through the cars, taking up tickets, he found a man dead in his seat. The conductor had spoken with him but fifteen minutes before, when he appeared to be in perfect health; and so easy was his transit from this world to the next, that passengers sitting in the next seats did not notice any change.

We learn from the Shreveport Gazette of the 14th that a desperate affray occurred a day or two previous at the stage stand one mile beyond Greenwood, between a railroad contractor by the name of Brooke and a couple of men named McRady—father and son. The fight commenced by young McRady firing at Brooks with a gun, while the old man pursued and cut him with a bowie knife. Brooks turned upon his pursuers and knocked McRady the elder down with a club, and getting possession of the empty gun he felled McRady the younger. The Gazette learns that the old man died from his injuries.

A PETRIFIED INDIAN.—While engaged in excavating recently upon the Milwaukie and La Crosse railroad, near Schlesengerville, Iowa, the workmen came upon the petrified remains of an Indian, and with the remains some singular relics of olden times. The body was perfect, not having suffered by decay. His height, at the present day, would be considered gigantic—measuring seven feet two inches. On his breast was a plate of copper, on which were engraved numerous hieroglyphics, the meaning of which can hardly be imagined. But there they are a record of the past. Could these hieroglyphics be read, they might, perhaps, unveil some of the mystery which hangs like a dark cloud over the history of the red man. An arrow of considerable strength and curious construction was also found with him, and especially invites the attention of antiquarians.

J. J. MCCAUGHAN vs. THE NEW ORLEANS AND MOBILE MAIL LINE.—This is a suit for damages brought by the plaintiff, a resident of Mississippi City, against defendants for neglect on the part of the managers or captain of one of the boats of the mail line in not stopping and landing at Pascagoula according to advertisement and stipulation, the plaintiff and others being detained and prevented from reaching New Orleans, as desired. The suit has been pending for some time before the Circuit Court of Harrison county, Miss., and came up for trial last week, and the jury gave a verdict in favor of Mr McCaughan, assessing his damages, loss of time and detention, at two thousand dollars.

ROBBERY AT PASCAGOULA.—From a private note we learn that an extensive robbery was committed at Pascagoula on the morning of the 21st, about 3 o'clock. A house was broken into and about $1000 abstracted. The outrage was supposed to have been committed by two men, who escaped in a sail-boat named the "Gem." Boats were despatched as speedily as practicable to all the islands and settlements on the coast, with the view of overhauling the plunderers. We hope they may be successful.

COMMERCIAL MATTERS.

New Orleans Money Market.

Wednesday Evening, July 25, 1855.

Another day of showers of rain; fortunately there is but little doing in money, cotton and produce, which is sadly affected by these frequent showers, which somehow or another come up in the forenoon or the day just to season to interrupt what few out-door operations have to be transacted.

The offerings to banks, the day of discount which fell on Wednesday, were large for the season; of course nothing beyond the daily income could be loaned, and that, unfortunately for borrowers, is not large. At this season of the year, and particularly when some anxiety is felt regarding the health of the city it would be an accommodation to the business community if Directors of the Banks could make it convenient to meet every morning for discounting paper and purchasing of Exchange. This system has been adopted by the Southern Bank since its organization, and has proved to work well, and obviates many inconveniences which attend semi-weekly conventions and consultations. Of what advantage to a borrower is it who keeps an account only in one bank to wait intervals of three or four days for loans which they could be granted in fifteen minutes? Of course any innovations on old established rules, or into old fogyism, are looked on with distrust and not consonant with a majority of the habitues of the bank parlor. In most of the banks, at this time, it is impossible to converse more than three to four Directors, about as many belonging to each bank as are in the city; and it is not making too great a demand for them to consider our suggestions.

There is but little paper offering on the streets, though rates of interest are well maintained. Brokers are going to the sea shore suburbs for a few weeks recreation, and he yers think they can do better by holding on; though of the truth is really told, there is but very little money at this time in market for investment in paper. Some second grade paper has been placed at 16 and 18 per ct. for small sums. Fortunately, the general construction of all engagements, commercial and financial, have been so large, that the actual want of money is confined to a narrow circle. Money continues to be freely offered in New York, though in Boston there is more demand, with slightly enhanced rates of interest.

Exchange to-day varied but little from yesterday. Considerable accessions to the stocks of cotton, tobacco and other produce were made by the arrivals of boats from Memphis and St. Louis, which furnish more material for the basis of exchange. Good private drawers have reduced their rates for Sight on New York below the banks. We quote this evening—

Agricultural.

WHY DOES LAND PRODUCE WEEDS?—Because there is more wild or fibrous matter in the soil, produced by ages of the growth and decomposition of vegetation, than there is of that properly required for the crops which we wish to raise.

As we have often said, burn a plant, and the ashes will show what the soil is composed of. The ashes are what is drawn from the earth. By the decomposition, what was drawn from the atmosphere is liberated, and escapes in the form of gas. The ashes are mineral, and never exist naturally in the

The ashes of all plants consist of the same [illegible] only in different proportions. Lime-crop, which is grease and alkali, but when properly combined, are neither, but a new compound, as with soils. If the compost is largely wild, or vegetable, it will produce weeds, make an excess of phosphate of lime, and it will as naturally produce wheat; give it an excess of alkali, and it will produce potatoes. A farmer should fit his crop to the soil, or his soil for his crop.

THE SEMINOLE WAR EXPEDITION.—By a late Gazette dispatch from New York, a few days ago, we were informed that late news had been received from the British colony at Sierra Leone. The following particulars will be found of much interest:

Many sanguinary engagements had taken place between the British troops and the barbarous tribes of the frontier. An expedition against a native chief on the Mallagbee river had resulted disastrously to the English, most of the men being either killed or taken prisoners. Some of the prisoners taken by the Africans are said to have been put to death in a most barbarous manner. One man (a Mr. Firth) is said to have been cut up and his flesh distributed through the settlements. The loss of the English in this encounter was reported to be about 50. The natives report their number not to exceed 12 killed and wounded. Among the chiefs on the part of the British was the Assistant Quartermaster (Andrew) of H. M. steamer Teaser.

The New Era loudly condemns the authorities for undertaking the Mallagbee expedition with an inadequate force. Incompetent men, moreover, it is alleged, were in command. The atrocious treatment of the soldiers captured by the Africans, is said to be too horrible to bear description. The name of the chieftain against whom this unfortunate expedition was undertaken is Bamuah Mimah Lahl. Anticipating another visit from the enemy, it seems he was at last dates following the example of the Mussulmans, in obstructing the navigation of the river with stones, so as to prevent any vessel from passing up. The dead bodies of the soldiers were sent to the floating up and down the river, or lying ashore on the shore, with their arms decently tied behind their backs, presenting the appearance of having been tied and afterwards put to death. In many cases the natives ordered the unfortunate fellows to come out of the water and surrender themselves, whereupon they were despatched in detail.

We have accounts also of the seizure of British subjects by the natives on the Rio Nunez. H. M. sloop-of-war Forrest had been dispatched to look after them.

BROOKLYN NAVY YARD.—The yard just now presents a scene of considerable activity. The steamer Niagara is rapidly progressing, under the personal supervision of George Steers, who has the contract for building her. It is likely she will be ready for launching by the beginning of October.

The steam frigate San Jacinto, which arrived on the 12th of June, has just been taken from the dock, and is now being fitted up with as much dispatch as possible. She is destined for the East India squadron, and will be under the command of Commodore Wm. M. Armstrong, who is now in Boston awaiting the fitting up of the vessel previous to his taking command. The San Jacinto was built at the Brooklyn Navy Yard in 1850, and mounts six guns. This steamer is to be the flag ship of the East India squadron.

It is reported that the steamer Potomac will arrive here on or about the 25th inst., from Norfolk. She will bring with her J. C. Dobbin, Secretary of the Navy, who will take the sea voyage for the benefit of his health, which is now quite delicate.

On Monday morning the yard was visited by the Russian Consul-General at this port, Alexis Pestchurieve. He was received with a salute of thirteen guns, and appropriately entertained on board the North Carolina. He was accompanied by two Russian naval officers. Several ladies were on board, among others the wife and daughters of Commodore Boerman, and music, dancing and other festivities were indulged in.

Of late years a manifest improvement has taken place in the internal arrangements of the Navy Yard, much of which is due to the energy, tact and skill of the officer at present in command, Commodore Boerman. His term of office will soon expire, and if he is not re-appointed, it will be difficult to find an officer as competent to fill the post.

During the past month there have been 630 recruits received on board the North Carolina, of which 125 are apprentices. It is noticeable that since the abolition of corporal punishment it is much easier to recruit than formerly. Now the department has their pick of the men, when formerly, they were obliged to take them as they came. A system of rewards and punishments has been adopted, which appears to be effectual in preserving discipline. At the end of a cruise, an honorable discharge entitles the recipient to three months' extra pay, which may amount to as much as $120. In a few years the system will no doubt be much perfected, and as high a state of discipline maintained as was ever exhibited under the old regime of cat o'nine-tails and public whippings. [N. Y. Herald, 18th.

It is said that in consequence of the late massacre, the Allied Governments will issue the following proclamation, if satisfaction is refused by Russia: "Colonel ——, of the Russian army having committed a cold-blooded, cowardly and brutal murder on the persons of three officers and sixteen seamen of her Britannic Majesty's navy, who, under a flag of truce, had, unarmed, entrusted themselves to his honor and that of the noble profession of arms, which he has disgraced by the cowardly act of an assassin and pirate—Colonel —— is hereby placed without the pale of the law of nations, which he has so disgracefully violated, and it is hereby ordered and directed, to all whom it may concern, that upon his capture by any French or British naval or military authority, he, the said Colonel ——, shall, on being identified, be immediately hanged by the neck until he is dead; and there the usual reward for the apprehension of a common murderer (£50) be paid over to his

It is, in fact, tar oil, expressed by the slow processes of nature from the primeval forests that compose the coal beds. By distillation, fifty per cent. of this substance is converted into a thin light-colored oil, of a faint, bituminous odor, giving about twice the light of sperm, and as a lubricator having the advantages of remaining fluid at a temperature of several degrees below zero, of being entirely free from any corrosive quality, and of not becoming gummy, or rancid.

LATER FROM TEXAS.

The steamship Chas. Morgan, Capt Place, arrived on Saturday last, with later dates from Galveston and Interior Texas.

The Galveston News of the 19th states that great numbers of cattle were dying in the counties of Liberty and Jefferson, of the disease called charbone. The News says:

The cattle are first attacked with a swelling in some part of the body, which, if scarified and burnt, generally disappears, but if neglected goes on increasing until the animal chokes and dies. If the place first attacked is on or near the chest death follows sooner than when a less vital part is affected. Some persons suppose the disease is caused by a fly, but the more probable suggestion is that it is the effect of the brackish water the cattle have used during the late drought.

Three prisoners, two of whom were confined for murder, broke jail at Austin on the night of the 29th ult., and escaped. A man named Wright, who was also confined for murder, refused to make use of the opportunity thus afforded him.

The Austin State Times has the following account of a bloody transaction in that city. The victim, Mrs. Malone, was the mother of ten children:

On Sunday morning last a German named Frederick visited the house of a Mr. Malone, living about twenty miles from this city on the Colorado river, and asked for some buttermilk. Mr. Malone, who had not yet risen, got up, and let the man in and then started to the milk house to accommodate his guest. While he was gone, Frederick walked deliberately to the bed where Mrs. Malone was sleeping and sheathed a broad knife in her breast, killing her instantly. It is said that no previous misunderstanding existed between the parties, and that Frederick had frequently been at the house before the day of the murder. On the return of Mr. Malone with the milk, and his discovery of the act, he took down his shot-gun and aimed at the murderer, but the gun unfortunately snapped; the murderer then made a blow with the same knife with which he had killed the wife, at the husband, who clubbed his gun, and knocked the villian down. He arose and renewed the attack on Malone, who gave him a second blow with the gun, breaking his skullbone. He then killed him, and having attended to the burial of his wife, started with the prisoner to this place, but before he reached here the murderer breathed his last.

Under the head of "More Indian Outrages," the San Antonio Texan furnishes the following account of a recent desperate fight with Indians near the frontier:

On Saturday evening, June 30, some fifteen Indians surrounded the house of Mr. Westfall, who is well known to most of our citizens, and who lives on the Leona, some thirty five miles below Fort Inge and in this county. The attack was made upon Mr. Westfall while he was absent from the house, leaving at the time no occupants in it but a Frenchman named Louis, and a large dog. It seems that the Indians had been lying in wait for some time, and took this opportunity to attack him. Mr. Westfall, however, succeeded in getting back to his house, wounded in a dangerous manner,—the ball striking him in the left breast, high up and coming out at his back under the opposite shoulder. He fastened the door, and the Indians then commenced an attack upon the house. Louis and Westfall now exchanged shots with him in rapid succession; but Westfall was fast failing from loss of blood. Louis approached an aperture in the wall in order to make sure aim, and was shot through the heart, fell and expired.

The faithful dog, on seeing Louis fall and the blood streaming from his body, became frantic with rage, and, rushing out at a small aperture, sprang among the Indians, seized one and tore every garment from his body and was on the eve of killing him, when he was shot and overpowered by the demons in human form that surrounded him. Poor dog, he has nobly sacrificed his life in defence of his master. Well may the poet say—

"My dog the truest of his kind,
With gratitude inflames my mind."

Westfall, overpowered by the loss of blood, could only support himself now by holding to the walls of the house; but nothing daunted, he tore a larger aperture in the wall and stuck his gun out in order to keep up appearances. The Indians, no doubt, thinking they would have a long seige, and many of them being severely wounded, left, taking with them all the horses belonging to the ranch.

It was now night, and Westfall remembers of crawling to his bed which was the last consciousness he had until Sunday evening, when he found himself lying on his bed, covered with blood that had come from the wound and from his mouth; but he was not able to come from his bed until Monday, when from the stench of the dead body in the room he found something must be done. With a great effort he succeeded in dragging the body about twenty feet, but could get it an farther. At sunset on Monday evening he started towards Fort Inge for assistance; but succeeded that night in getting only four miles—and on Wednesday evening he arrived at a house in the vicinity of Fort Inge, where he procured assistance and is still alive, and his physician has strong hopes of his recovery.

Mr. Westfall is a man of strong frame and extraordinary constitution, which accounts for his remarkable escape. He is a terror to the Indians, and is known on the frontier by the name of "Leather Stocking." The Indians without doubt were the Lipans, who commit their murders, plundering, etc., and then take shelter in Mexico.

The Texan has also the following paragraphs:

By a private correspondent, we learn that a boy by the name of Elshorn was closely pursued, near Dhanis, in Medina county, a few days since by a party of Indians, but he was so fortunate as to escape from them. A party was soon mustered and sent in pursuit; they took the trail, but the Indians had the start sufficiently to get to the mountains of the Hondo, where they could secure themselves, before they overtook them, and thus they escaped.

We learned a few days since, that a party of men from Medina county, who left in pursuit of the Indians that had lately been stealing horses and committing depredations there, followed them on the trail past the residence of Mr. Westfall, and there discovered the body of the unfortunate Louis some twenty feet from the house, where it had been left; they buried the body and continued the pursuit.

DESCRIPTION OF SIERRA LEONE.—A worthy weather-beaten old sea captain once gave a perfectly definite notion of Sierra Leone, in one little anecdote. "Sierra Leone, sir," he said: "I'll tell you what Sierra Leone is like. A black fellow, sir, goes into the market. It's as hot as, well—anything. He buys a melon for three farthings—and what does he do with it? The black fellow, sir, has 't a rag on. He's as bare as a robin. He buys his melon; cuts it in halves, and scoops out the middle. He sits in one half, covers his head with the other, and eats the middle. That's what he does, sir. I saw Sierra Leone in all its tropical glory, cheapness of produce, darkness of population, gigantic vegetation, and primitive state of manners."

The stone foundations of an ancient church, forty by sixty feet, have been found several feet below the surface of the ground, at Ypsilanti, Mich. The corroded and encrusted remains of a church bell were also found. Centrally situated within the foundation walls, were ashes and unburnt wood, where fires were probably kindled. The remains are regarded as those of an ancient civilization, though they may have been the work of the early French missionaries.

SONG OF THE RAIN.

Lo! the long, slender spears, how they quiver and flash,
Where the clouds send their cavalry down;
Rank and file by the million the rain-lances dash
Over mountain and river and town;
Think the battle-drops fall—but they drip not in blood;
The trophy of war is the green fresh bud;
Oh, the rain, the plentiful rain!

The pastures lie baked, and the furrow is bare,
The wells they yawn empty and dry;
But a rainbow leaps out in the sky;
Hark! the heavy drops pelting the sycamore leaves,
How they wash the wide pavement, and sweep from the eaves;
Oh, the rain, the plentiful rain!

See, the weaver throws wide his one swinging pane,
The kind drops dance in on the floor;
And his wife brings her flower-pots to drink the sweet rain
On the step by her half-open door;
At the inn on the sky light, far over his head,
Smiles their poor crippled lad on his hospital bed.
Oh, the rain, the plentiful rain!

And away, far from men, where high mountains tower,
Thin little green mosses rejoice;
And the bud-headed heather nods to the shower,
And the hill-torrents lift up their voices;
And the pools in the hollows mimic the sight
Of the rain, as their thousand points dart up in light.
Oh, the rain, the plentiful rain!

And deep in the firwood below, near the plain,
A single thrush pipes full and sweet;
How days of clear shining will come after rain,
Waving meadows and thick-growing wheat!
So the voice of Hope sings at our fears,
Of the harvest that springs from a great nation's tears.
Oh, the rain, the plentiful rain!

SAD OCCURRENCE.—We have already mentioned the circumstance of a woman and child being accidentally shot a few days ago at the camp ground of some New York troops, near Kingston, while a parade was going on. The Herald gives the following particulars:

The cry was raised—"A woman shot!—a woman shot!" whereupon a rush was made to a part of the field where a woman was seen to fall. She raised her self to her feet, when to the horror of all present, a young infant was found in her arms, wounded in the head by a bullet, and its blood and brains scattered over the face and person of the mother—as she afterward proved to be.

The greatest excitement ensued, and the females present manifested the utmost feeling for the unfortunate mother, and were profuse in their offers of assistance, and so affected were many of them that they shed tears. The wounded mother and child were taken to a tent and a doctor sent for. It was found the wound was caused by a bullet, which had first struck the breast of the mother, passing through the mammary glands, and then entering the frontal lobe of the child's head and passing out at the top, and again wounding the mother by breaking the bone of her arm. Nor was the course of the ball here stopped, for it struck a young man, but without injuring him much. The child, which was about ten months old, cannot survive, but the mother is pronounced out of danger.

The wounded woman is the wife of Jeremiah Cassel, a farmer, who lives about ten miles back of Kingston. The ball was found to be flattened, and had a piece of bone attached to it. How it got into one of the muskets is a mystery. It is surmised that it came from the Second company, (Capt. Shafer's,) who were directly opposite Mrs. Cassel when she fell. It further appears that they had been shooting at a target in the morning, and it is surmised that a ball cartridge, by some mistake, was mixed with the blank cartridges, and in the excitement of loading the firearms was not noticed by the person who aped the fatal bullet. The officers state that all the muskets were carefully examined, and they cannot understand how the disaster could have occurred.

The men are loud in their expressions of sympathy for the bereaved and wounded mother, and the affair cast a gloom over the gala day, which was progressing most pleasantly to all concerned.

In order in some way to atone for the mischief, a collection in aid of the woman was taken up, and nearly a thousand dollars collected. The ball, which was to come off in the evening, and for which great preparations had been made, was dispensed with, to the great disappointment of some five hundred ladies, who had come from New York and the surrounding country to participate in the festivity. The grand review was also postponed. Indeed, the unfortunate occurrence put a stop to all the pleasure the Guards anticipated.

STRANGE ACTIVITY OF AN INSANE WOMAN.—There is a woman in Whitney, who for the past ten years has been insane. It is not fully known what the cause was that led to this very peculiar state of her mind. About eighteen years ago she lost her husband, but since that time she has performed the duties of her household with as much care as is common—cooks, washes and does all the household work without assistance or guidance. But unlike most women she spends no useless time in door engaged on the nicer kinds of lace-work, or even at the toilet. She has a work to do, and all her energies are given to it. As soon as the dishes are washed and furniture set in order, she lights her pipe and starts for the field.

About six rods from her house are two small hills, which she is at work in leveling. They are about twelve feet high, and on the top contain nearly a quarter of an acre. During the past ten years all her leisure moments have been thus occupied. Early in the morning, with her hoe and crowbar,—which are the only tools she uses,—she starts for these hill-tops, and there works till night. She carries the small stones to the foot of the hill, rolls the large ones, and hoes the dirt down. In this way she has lowered one hill more than six feet, and the other four and a half.

The work she has performed is said to be more than any one man in this town could have done in the same time with the same tools. The stones alone she has carried to the foot of the hill, would now require the labor of five men and four oxen two months to remove. Notwithstanding this immense and continuous labor, she enjoys at this time the very best of health.

When in the house about her work, she is perfectly rational, never destroys anything, and is guilty of no cunning tricks, such as creazy people generally are. She uses her one's wood to heat up large rocks which she cannot remove without breaking, then pours water upon them, shelling them into small pieces to enable her to carry them into the valley. [Bangor (Me.) Mercury, June 21.

A New Hampshire paper states, that a little girl living near Gilmenton, in that State, has been detected in the practice of going a short distance from her home to play with black snakes. She was found with a large one coiled by her side, and another in her lap. Her fascination is complete that she told her friends if they killed these reptiles she knew of others that she could play with. This looks less incredible than many other absurd stories we have heard of the same nature.

The party of Kansas Indians who went to Washington a few days ago to obtain "a big heap of money," and have one of their number made a great chief, left on their return journey on the 12th, in high dudgeon, because of the failure of their mission. They were provided with clothing, and an employee of the Indian Bureau was detailed to accompany them to St Louis, whence they will be forwarded to Kansas.

DROWNED.—On Tuesday last, Charles, son of Mr. Barthelmi, was drowned in the river, while in swimming we presume, and his body recovered on Thursday. We learned no further particulars. Not a year passes that some one is not drowned in the river or bayou, generally boys. [Plaquemine Sentinel, 21st.

The London Times says: "Whatever delusion Ministers were in as to the duration of the war last year, we now know that it is wise to make up our minds to twenty years at least, and that we are much more likely to shorten the war by an even than an under estimate." Per contra, the Journal of St. Petersburg contains a long article, in a very pacific tone, as a rejoinder to the last circular of Count Walewski.

A CASE OF POISONING.—The Easton (Md.) Star says that Miss Mary Reed and two other members of her family, residing near Greensborough, Caroline county, were poisoned one day last week, by a negro woman employed as a cook in the family, who drugged their coffee with arsenic. Miss Reed has since died, and the others are not expected to live. The negro has been arrested and placed in Denton jail.

JOHN RANDOLPH "HEADED."—Of the many amusing anecdotes of this eccentric man of Roanoke, we do not believe the following was ever in print:

He was traveling through a part of Virginia in which he was unacquainted; meantime he stopped during the night at an inn near the forks of the road. The innkeeper was a fine gentleman, and no doubt of one of the first families in the Old Dominion. Knowing who his distinguished guest was, he endeavored during the evening to draw him into conversation, but failed in all his efforts. But in the morning, when Mr. Randolph was ready to start, he called for his bill, which, on being presented, was paid. The landlord, still anxious to have some conversation with him, began as follows:

"Which way are you traveling, Mr. Randolph?"

"Sir," said Mr. Randolph, with a look of displeasure, "have I paid my bill?"

"Yes."

"Do I owe you anything more?"

"No."

"Well, I'm going just where I please—do you understand?"

"Yes."

The landlord by this time got somewhat excited, and Mr. Randolph drove off. But to the landlord's surprise, in a few minutes the servant came to inquire for his master which of the forks of the road to take.

Mr Randolph, not being out of hearing-distance, he spoke at the top of his voice: "Mr. Randolph, you don't owe me one cent; just take which road you please."

MARY REDMOND.—Mary Redmond was the daughter of a patriot somewhat distinguished among his neighbors in Philadelphia. Many other relatives were loyalists; and she was pityfully baited among them "the black-eyed rebel." She was accustomed to assist several women whose husbands were in the American army, to procure intelligence. The dispatches were usually sent from their friends by a boy, who carried them stitched in the back of his coat. He came into the city bringing provisions to market. One morning, when there was some reason to fear he was suspected, and his movements watched by the enemy, Mary undertook to get the papers in safety from him. She went, as usual, to the market, and in a pretended game of romps, threw her shawl over the boy's head, and thus secured the prize. She hastened with the papers to her anxious friends, who read them by stealth, after the windows had been carefully closed. When the news came of Burgoyne's surrender, and the Whig women were secretly rejoicing, the sprightly girl, not daring to give vent openly to her exultation, put her head up the chimney and gave a shout for Gates.

The Vinton (Iowa) Eagle furnishes an account of a terrible storm of wind and rain, which passed over the country in the region of Marietta, Marshall county, Iowa. Much damage was done, houses blown down, etc. But the most incredible statement is that a man with a child in his arms was carried more than a mile by the wind, and landed safely, we suppose, as nothing is said of himself or the child receiving any injury.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.—Mrs. Daniel Warren, of 528 Commercial street, on Tuesday afternoon, missed her little son, eighteen months old, and found him at the eaves of the roof, sitting in the gutter with his feet hanging over the outer edge. The little fellow was screaming with all his might, and without for a moment thinking of the danger to which she was exposed, she slipped down the roof to the eaves, and seizing her darling boy, bore him in safety to the attic, when she instantly fainted, and it was with much difficulty that she was restored to consciousness. [Boston Journal.

FREAK OF A HORSE.—As a splendid team of horses, attached to a barouche, were being driven down Genesee street this morning, a boy unthinkingly fired a pistol near them, when one of the animals fell as if shot by a cannon ball, although the pistol was not pointing toward him when fired. He lay perfectly still—motionless—for a minute or more, then reared violently, till he regained his feet, when the driver used his arts to subdue the horse, and the barouche moved on as if there had been no interruption of its progress. [Utica Observer.

DISBANDING FOREIGN MILITARY COMPANIES. On the 12th, at Cincinnati, Gen. Sargeant made a formal demand on each of the military companies composing the Irish battalion to deliver up forthwith all the army appendages and accoutrements in their possession, which order was obeyed only by one company.

General Sargeant then sued out writs of replevin, and the Sheriff took possession of the entire accoutrements of the other companies. A similar demand is to be made on the German companies. The cause of these demands is alleged insubordination on the Fourth of July.

BEER VS. PORTER.—The New Haven Palladium says:

One of the colored porters that frequent the vicinity of the station-house, was this morning painted in a novel and indicrous manner. As the individual was leaning against the corner of the station-house tower, wrapt in contemplation of his surroundings, a band-truck was being trundled past, when one of the wheels struck the earth, and the hung of a half barrel of beer was started out by the shock. The contents took direct aim at the porter's head. He sprang into the air so as to take a splendid stream in his bosom—then turning directly about, received the remainder of the contents in the back—in the meantime making vain endeavors to lengthen the distance between his person and the turbulent fluid. The widened visages and hearty laughing of the bystanders, attested their appreciation of the labors of a porter with more business on hand than he bargained for.

☞ HEAL THE SICK.—Men of liberal education at the present day devote all their talents to discover the means whereby they may remove the painful maladies which assail the human frame. There is no nobler attribute, than being able, on ascertaining the members or diseases to which man is liable, and which may cause him to drag out a protracted life of distress, or suddenly cut him off in the bloom of his existence and manhood. We should gratify to an opposite extreme of counteracting their dreadful effects, or causing a removal of those clogs to happiness. In those cases where the Liver or the Stomach is the cause, we would highly recommend Dr. Hoofland's German Bitters, prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson. No medicine at this time stands higher than these Bitters, and to the one who are suffering from the horrors of indigestion, weak stomach, or diseased liver, they are the antidote. See advertisement. jy1 1md

☞ DR. HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS, prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson, are justly reckoned among our most valuable medicines. In cases of Dyspepsia it acts like magic, strengthening the tone of the stomach, stimulating the digestive powers, and giving ruddy health to the cheek and brightness to the eye. There are thousands in this community who can testify to their virtues and thousands will hereafter add their testimony. See advertisement. my4 1m

We invite the special attention of parents and guardians to the advantages here offered to young men desirous of a finished collegiate or business education. The location of the college, in a quiet valley, ten miles from a Lithia watha freedom, unsurpassed, from temptation to vice—the full and thorough course of study—the experience and ability of the Faculty—the wholesome discipline—the facilities for lectures afforded by ample apparatus, libraries and cabinets, and, withal, the cheapness of terms and healthfulness of position, cannot fail to secure to this college, as heretofore, a liberal patronage.

For further information, address
E. E. WILEY, President.

THE NASHVILLE FEMALE ACADEMY.

The next academic year will commence September 8d. This institution has enjoyed thirty-nine years of uninterrupted prosperity.

In regard to health, it is believed to have no equal in the United States. Cholera, chills and fever, typhoid and scarlet fever, and similar fatal diseases, have never occurred here. But three deaths of boarders in thirty-nine years.

In regard to maternal influence, claims equality with the best regulated private families, in all that relates to personal habits, moral and mental culture.

Employs, almost exclusively, Southern teachers. No Southern parent, who gives this institution a personal examination, will we think, find a reason for going further North. jy21—4t O. H. ELLIOTT.

Payment to be made at the close of each term. Board, including lodging, washing, lights and fuel, can be procured in the village and immediate neighborhood at ten dollars per month. Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would however, respectfully urge all parents or guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the institution, to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, for itating, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.

School books, stationery, &c., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the usual rates.

Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral department of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.

As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass into another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.

The government of the school is to be understood as that of authority—though parental and mild, yet decided and firm. The institution, in a religious point of view will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.

Pupils will be required to attend church at least once on the Sabbath, and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.

The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.

The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second session commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July. At which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.

All applications for admission of pupils, &c., to be made to the president of the College.

CENTENARY COLLEGE OF LOUISIANA

Centenary College of Louisiana is located in Jackson, La., 12 miles east of Bayou Sara. Its location is beautiful, retired and healthy. It has commodious buildings, a large library, a good chemical and philosophical apparatus, a well selected mineralogical and geological cabinet, and a full Board of Instruction.

As this section of the Southwest is but poorly provided with academics and preparatory schools, there is connected with the College a Preparatory Department, in which all necessary instruction may be received for entering College proper.

The College is now in a highly prosperous condition, and under the management of the present Board of Trustees and Faculty it promises permanency and extensive usefulness.

FACULTY:

Rev. JOHN C. MILLER, M. A., President, and Prof. of Mental and Moral Science.

Rev. WM. H. SCALES, M. A., Professor of Mathematics, Natural Philosophy and Astronomy.

Other charges the same as in College. In addition to the above regular charges a matriculation fee of $5 is paid by each student on first becoming a member of any regular College Class. College charges must be paid semi-annually, in advance. Tuition is refunded only in case of sickness.

Board and washing can be had at the Steward's Hall, or in private families, for about $11 per month, students furnishing their own rooms, wood, lights, &c.

Every student whose parent or guardian does not reside in the town of Jackson, or its immediate vicinity, shall have an academical guardian, nominated by himself, with the consent of his parent, or legal guardian, whose duty it shall be to take charge of the necessary expenditures of such student, and with whom shall be deposited such a sum of money as his parent or guardian may think proper. In the article of pocket money the strictest economy is recommended and requested.

If the above rule is not strictly complied with by the parent or guardian, the teachers cannot be blamed for injudicious expense.

The regular academic year commences on the first Monday in October, and ends on the last Wednesday in July, which is commencement day.

DOCTOR HOOFLAND'S CELEBRATED GERMAN BITTERS,

Prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson, Philadelphia, Pa., will effectually cure Liver Complaint, Dyspepsia, Jaundice, Chronic or Nervous Debility, Diseases of the Kidneys, and all diseases arising from a disordered Liver or Stomach such as Constipation, Inward Piles, Fullness or Blood to the Head, Acidity of the Stomach, Nausea, Heartburn, Disgust for Food, Fullness, or Weight in the Stomach, Sour Eructations, Sinking or Fluttering at the Pit of the Stomach, Swimming of the Head, Hurried and Difficult Breathing, Fluttering at the Heart, Choaking or Suffocating Sensations when in a Lying Posture, Dimness of Vision, Dots or Webs before the Sight, Fever and Dull Pain in the Head, Deficiency of Perspiration, Yellowness of the Skin and Eyes, Pain in the Side, Back, Chest, Limbs, etc., Sudden Flushes of Heat, Burning in the Flesh, Constant Imaginings of Evil, and Great Depression of Spirits.

The Proprietor, in calling the attention of the Public to this preparation, does so with a feeling of the utmost confidence in its virtues, and adaptation to the diseases for which it is recommended.

It is no new and untried article, but one that has stood the test of a ten years' trial before the American people and its reputation and sale is unrivalled by any similar preparations extant. The testimony in its favor given by the most prominent and well-known Physicians and individuals in all parts of the country is immense. The following, from your own State, is respectfully submitted, referring any who may still doubt to my "Memorabilia," or Practical Receipt Book for Farmers and Families, to be had gratis of all the Agents for the "Farmers Banner."

LETTER FROM BISHOP ANDREW.

NO. II.

There is room enough and work enough for us all in California

In a former number I urged the claims of California work on the ground that there was a large class of the population in California to whom the great body of the preachers of the Church, North, can have but little access, for reasons there stated. I purpose now to sustain our missions there on the broad ground that the necessities of California require it. These who suppose that the ground is all occupied, even when all the churches have brought their available forces to the field, are very greatly mistaken. The mining towns of California are scattered in all directions over the mining localities; and wherever gold is discovered in any promising quantity, thither the mineral flock from all directions, and a village springs up as if by magic, and as long as the diggings prove good and water can be procured, the town remains, and embraces, perhaps, several hundred inhabitants; and in many instances, when the bed proves a rich one, and promises permanence, the towns assume the air of more neatly established cities, respectable buildings go up, and the inhabitants increase to a few thousands. These little towns are scattered all over the mining districts, and the well being of the country, morally, spiritually and civilly, requires that the gospel be preached regularly, faithfully and perseveringly in all of them. The object cannot be attained by an occasional or casual visit; the Church must be established, and her institutions must have an abiding home amongst the people in their several localities, or but little good can be effected. The house of God must be there before their eyes; its doors must be opened, and the faithful warnings of the man of God heard from its pulpit on every Sabbath day. The minister of God must be among them, that he may visit them at their cabins, preaching Christ to them in private; he must be accessible to them, that they may know where to find him when sickness or death invades their circle, and that he may take advantage of every opening for good.

The mining population of California has been, and still is, to a great extent, peculiarly circumstanced. Many of them are men of early advantages and considerable mental cultivation, and in other days were accustomed to highly cultivated associations; but the prospect of retrieving ruined fortunes, in some instances, or in others of acquiring large wealth in a short time, has called them from all the influences of home association. To this distant land they came, dreaming of the easy acquisition of immense wealth, and have been disappointed. The golden vision which deluded them has vanished, and they have been painfully awakened to the conviction that stern, unfailing and toilsome labor is the price at which even bread was to be obtained. The associations into which they have been thrown are utterly adverse to social refinement or enjoyment; the voice of maternal love, which had so often checked their youthful aberrations, and the sweet influences of sisterly love, were far away; the influences of refined and virtuous female piety were not at hand. Under all these circumstances they too generally yielded to the seductive influences of vicious associations. The drinking saloon and gaming table, with all those accursed influences which invariably cluster about them, have done their work; and oh! what a fearful ruin has resulted! The Sabbath has been desecrated, and there was no house of God and no faithful and loved minister of the gospel to rebuke their wanderings and woo them back to the ways of virtue. For it is to be remembered that for many years, and even up to the present time, there are scores of places where the people have no gospel ministrations among them, except, perhaps, an occasional visit from some preacher whose field of labor is so extensive as to forbid more than a monthly visit, and that perhaps at night, when comparatively few may be expected to attend.

But besides these mining localities, there are scores of neighborhoods in the agricultural portions of the State which are very rarely favored with the visits of the ministers of Christ. This is, in part, attributable to the fact that the settlements are scattered over large tracts of country, separated considerable distances from each other, which demands of the preacher long and fatiguing rides to reach neighborhoods where small congregations greet his arrival. This may discourage him and lead him to abandon these sparsely settled neighborhoods, as scarcely sufficient to compensate him for the toil and sacrifices which they cost him. And yet now is the time to establish churches in these places, which may serve as so many nuclei, around which may cluster the institutions of religion as the population shall increase.

It may be proper to remark that the agricultural population is gradually increasing, and is destined to increase annually in proportion as the security of land titles becomes established. These lovely valleys must, beyond a peradventure, become thickly settled, and that with a population destined to be more permanent than any other in the State; and of this population a very large proportion is from Missouri, Arkansas, Texas and Tennessee. Among these farmers we must build up churches and form circuits which in a few years shall become respectable and self-supporting. I had several applications at the late Conference for preachers to establish such circuits, but the stock of preachers was exhausted, and these demands were of course not met. We did, indeed, arrange for the formation of several new circuits, and as far as heard from before I left California, the preachers were at their work with encouraging prospects of success.

Very few persons east of the Isthmus have any proper conception of the extent of the State of California. At the last session of the Legislature a committee was appointed to consider the propriety of dividing the State. This committee reported in favor of dividing the State into three States, to be called California, Colorado and Shasta. This division will probably take place, and each of these States will be very respectable for size.

And now let me ask my serious Christian, in his sober senses and the exercise of a godly judgment, whether he deems the sixty traveling preachers of the Northern Church sufficient to cultivate this vast and constantly extending field? If he answer yes, I give him up as an incorrigible sinner, on the principle that none are so blind as those who will not see!

I don't wish to tire your readers, and therefore close for the present, intending to continue the discussion of this subject, if you can afford me space in your paper, till I say all I have to say on the subject.

Yours, truly, JAMES O. ANDREW.

REPORT OF THE EXAMINING COMMITTEE OF CENTENARY COLLEGE.

Mr. President and Gentlemen of the Board of Trustees and Visitors:

The Committee to whom was assigned the duty of examining the students of Centenary College beg leave to report that the students in general here a creditable examination.

The Junior Class, in particular, received, as they deserved to receive, the compliments of the Committee and Faculty for the proficiency which a critical examination showed them to have made during the past year.

A considerable proportion of the Sophomore and Freshmen Classes were also clearly entitled to a like commendation; and it is but simple justice to all the classes to say, that in consequence of protracted illness among the Faculty of the College, the students in several of the branches pursued were not taught and examined by the same professor; for which, it is evident, some allowance should be made.

Your Committee have witnessed no attempt on the part of any member of the Faculty to screen a student from the most searching criticism; and it being the invariable custom for members of the Committee to assign the portion of any given subject upon which the student is to be examined, the possibility of collusion or any special understanding in this matter between the professor and student is completely obviated. Hence your Committee believe the examination just closed to be as thorough a test of real proficiency as could, under the circumstances, be furnished.

We would not be understood to represent your Faculty as being indifferent to what, in common parlance, is denominated the polish of an education; but they are evidently among the number of those who would never attempt to polish a vacuum. They believe there must first be something to polish; and hence their exertions in every department of instruction are directed mainly to the growth and development of mind—to the preparation of the student to act well his part in the great drama of human life—to take his position intelligently in the violent struggle which is evidently in progress between the old and the new.

Few will be likely to overrate the importance of a thorough and harmonious development of all the mental faculties as a qualification of honorable and useful citizenship; and your Committee feel no hesitation in saying that such has been the prominent purpose of the instructions which they have been called upon to test.

In conclusion, we congratulate you, Mr. President and gentlemen of the Joint Board, on the auspicious future which is opening up upon Centenary College. Will citizens of the South continue to send their sons from amid facilities like these to distant universities which acknowledge no sympathies with Southern institutions? We do not believe it, but are satisfied, on the contrary that the friends of Southern education and Southern institutions generally need only the assurance that every facility for ripe scholarship and every manly accomplishment is here in their own beautiful "Sunny South," and they are ready to embrace with alacrity the golden opportunity offered them.

THE PAST AND THE PRESENT.

NO. IV.

THE CONTRAST.

Bro. McTyeire—It seems to have been the custom of the patriarchs and prophets to call to remembrance interesting events and the dealings of God with the people, and especially his chosen people, in times long past, and which the generations following were prone to forget. The year 1800 forms an important era in the history of the Western country, and especially of the Methodist and Presbyterian Churches. The acquisition of what was called the Green River country opened the way for vast emigration and for the formation of numerous and extensive settlements. These settlements, bordering on new settlements in Tennessee, formed a vast field for missionary enterprise. The hardships incident to the formation of new settlements, and the scarcity of provisions, were seriously felt; but a cloud of divine mercy seemed to hover over these people, and the time to favor Zion was at hand. There were two brothers, John and William McGee, the former a Methodist and the latter a Presbyterian preacher, residing in older settlements in Tennessee. Fired with missionary zeal, they attended a sacramental meeting in the new settlements of Kentucky. The Spirit of the Lord was upon them, and a flame of revival influence burst forth which spread far and wide. A general spirit of inquiry was waked up, God wrought with and without apparent means, and large accessions were made to the Churches. This revival progressed and lasted for years, producing fruits that evinced its genuineness. There were then no newspapers to puff its achievements, or to eulogize the eloquence or talents of the instruments. This work of God was deep and thorough—very unlike the straw fires now-a-days, which blaze up for a few days, and leave scarcely a trace of their effect.

The name of John McGee appeared in the Annual Minutes in the year 1788. He traveled extensively for several years, located, and settled in the bounds of How River Circuit, N. C. Here I shared the hospitality of his house and his useful counsel in the years 1796-'97. He removed to Tennessee; and although located and in moderate circumstances, his keen, shrill voice reached the ears of multitudes all around him, and his pathetic exhortations and commanding sermons moved many hearts. His labors were bestowed without fee or reward; but little was said in those days about money; and although he labored in the Lord's vineyard more than some of the drones of this day of depreciated itineracy, he neither sought nor obtained earthly reward.

In the year 1801, John Page was appointed to Cumberland, the name by which the country now called Middle Tennessee was then designated, and the only circuit then west of Cumberland Mountain and south of Green River, in Kentucky. The name of this plain, devoted and useful minister appeared in the Minutes of the Annual Conferences in the year 1792. He had braved the dangers of the wilderness and endured the hardships incident to travel in the Western wilds, the frontier settlements of Kentucky, and the mountain regions of East Tennessee and Western Virginia. He was a Bible student, and, in accordance with the custom of Methodist preachers in those days, carried his small Bible in his pocket. He was a biblical scholar, mighty in the Scriptures. He was reappointed to Cumberland in the year 1802, with the excellent Thomas Wilkerson for his colleague. These two real itinerants labored together like true yoke-fellows, and the revival went on gloriously. Their field of labor was large, and the fields were white unto the harvest, and the laborers were few. Two or three appointments to a circuit, preaching on the Sabbath, and resting or attending to secular affairs all the week, and getting five or seven hundred dollars for the service, (this is no fiction,) was not then in vogue. Page and Wilkerson preached every day, and often at night, and met classes, and it is doubtful whether they received one hundred dollars each. The state of religious excitement, the scarcity of preachers, and the pressing demand for ministerial effort, proved too much for the physical strength of the ardent Wilkerson. His lungs gave way, and he sunk down unable to preach. Brother Page married; a new district was formed, called Cumberland, in October, 1802, and he was appointed Presiding Elder. "Bodily weakness and family concerns," however, prevented his rendering much service in the district. He located in the fall of 1803, but not to be idle or useless. He supported himself and family by manual labor, preached the gospel with power in the region round about, adorned the Christian ministry in a local sphere, and when his health and temporal circumstances seemed to justify it, reentered the itinerant connection, labored usefully for many years, and, as I have seen an account of his demise, probably stands on the superannuated list in the Tennessee Conference. He was succeeded on the Cumberland district by the writer, in the fall of 1803.

METHODIST MALE COLLEGE.

The Commissioners appointed by the Alabama Conference of the M. E. Church, South, at its last session, to select a location for a male College within its bounds, met according to appointment at Summerfield, Ala., on the 4th of July, 1855. The following members of the Commission appeared, answered to their names and took their seats:

Thos. W. Dorman, E. Baldwin, George Shaeffer, J. J. Hutchinson, C. C. Calloway, A. H. Mitchell, Charles Strider, Jas. S. Lane, S. F. Tilley, O. R. Blue, E. Hearn, A. S. Dickinson, R. A. Baker, D. W. Goodman; B. N. Glover, H. W. Foote, A. A. Coleman, L. Q. C. DeYampert, Wm. M. Byrd, J. L. McClanahan, J. E. Groce, Wm. Garrett, N. J. Scott, David Clopton, E. R. Flewellen, J. W. Portis, A. C. Ramsey, H. V. Smith.

The meeting was organized by the nomination and election of Hon. R. A. Baker, as Chairman, and Duke W. Goodman, Esq., as Secretary. The Chairman addressed the Board in a few appropriate remarks relative to the object of their meeting, and proposed, in view of our dependence upon the Divine Being, to invoke His blessing and direction. Whereupon, Rev. George Shaeffer was called upon by the Chair to open the deliberations with prayer.

Greensboro' and Auburn being in nomination, some desultory debate ensued as to the manner of procedure, when it was moved and carried that a committee of eight be appointed to take the matter into consideration and to report to the Board.

L. Q. C. DeYampert, C. C. Calloway, H. W. Foote, B. N. Glover, N. J. Scott, O. R. Blue, D. Clopton and J. E. Groce were appointed said committee.

The committee immediately retired, and after consulting the claims and prospects of each location, returned and submitted the following report:

Whereas, Commissions were appointed by the Alabama Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at its late session at Talladega, Ala., to locate a male college within the bounds of said Conference; and whereas Greensboro' and Auburn have made propositions so noble and generous—to wit: Greensboro', a subscription and donation of $113,000, and Auburn a subscription and donation of more than the $100,000 required by the resolutions of said Conference, that the Commissioners cannot find it in their hearts to mortify or disappoint their brethren and friends at either place; but there being some doubt as to the legal authority of said Commissioners to make an absolute location at each place, the Commissioners have determined and agreed to the following resolutions, to wit:

1. That a college be located at Greensboro', Ala., according to the terms of the resolutions of the Alabama Conference of the M. E. Church, South, adopted at their annual meeting, held in 1854.

2. That a college be located at Auburn, Ala., and that the Alabama Conference is hereby requested to adopt the same on equal terms.

A division of the vote on the two resolutions was called for. The first resolution was then submitted by the Chair and unanimously adopted. The second was then submitted, and adopted with two dissenting votes; after which the preamble and resolutions were adopted as a whole.

Hon. John Erwin, of Greensboro', Ala., was called, who came forward and laid upon the Secretary's table the propositions and subscriptions from that place, accompanied with appropriate and forcible remarks, much to the gratification of all present.

He was followed by Hon. H. W. Hilliard, of Montgomery, Ala., approving of the action of the Board and urging the establishment of a similar institution at Auburn, as not conflicting with each other, but binding our eastern and western interests in the common enterprise of education, and without opposition or rivalry, in harmonious emulation, meeting the wants and wishes of each locality.

The speeches of both the gentlemen were in their happiest manner, and received the warmest approbation of all present.

It was then moved and carried that we accept the propositions and subscriptions made by the citizens of Greensboro' and its vicinity, and that a committee be appointed to take charge of and close up the subscription as proposed by the subscribers. The Chair appointed L. Q. C. DeYampert, C. C. Calloway and John Irwin said committee.

A similar motion in reference to the propositions and subscriptions from Auburn was passed. N. J. Scott, Isaac Hill and Samuel Armstrong were appointed said committee.

It was further ordered that the Chairman lay the proceedings of this meeting before the Alabama Conference at its next session, and that they may be published in the Greensboro' Beacon and Auburn Gazette.

On motion, the Board of Commissioners then adjourned.

LAGRANGE COLLEGE, AT FLORENCE.

Annual Examination—Commencement—&c., &c.

Dear Advocate—I lately attended the first Examination and Commencement of La Grange College, at Florence; and as education is at present a theme of absorbing interest, especially to our Church in Alabama, I have concluded to write and ask you to print a few facts I became acquainted with at the said Commencement.

The examination was conducted in writing, in a manner very satisfactory to the committee from the conferences and other visitors, and evinced a determination on the part of the Faculty to make education at LaGrange a thorough work.

One of the richest parts of our entertainment was found in attending the examination of the smaller boys, in the Preparatory Department, and in listening to their tiny speeches. There were scores of the bright eyed, beautiful little fellows, and I thought of one like them in South Alabama, and just wished he was there. God bless the little boys! and may all who have them in charge hear continually the voice of Jesus, saying, "suffer little children to come unto me."

The services of the intervening Sabbath lost much of their interest by the necessary absence of Rev. L. D. Huston, of Nashville, who had been chosen to preach the Annual Sermon. The pulpit was occupied in the morning by Rev. J. Barker, of the Alabama Conference. In the evening and at night we listened to excellent sermons—one preached by Rev. Mr. Nixon, of Limestone county, Ala., the other by Rev. A. R. Erwin, of Nashville, Tenn.

The speeches by the members of the Junior and Sophomore Classes, on Monday and Tuesday, were very creditable; and such was the verdict pronounced from the gallery by the ladies, for they rained such a profusion of flowers upon the rostrum, at the conclusion of each speech, that we exhausted our minds for having wandered from this feast of reason to

"The Feast of Roses, in the Vale of Cashmere."

That verdict from the gallery, what Junior or Soph. ever appealed from or despised? Here was explained the cause of some of that good conduct I heard the President praise the boys for—they had respect unto the verdict by flowers. The Good One bless the Ladies! They know how to lead us, don't they, dear Advocate?

The Graduating Class (numbering eight young men) made their exit from college cloisters and their entrance upon the great world gracefully, and with sufficient eclat. The college and the class were mutually honored by their thoughtful speeches, admirably spoken. Some of those speeches would stir the blood of thinking men, if read in the retirement of their studies; and I took leave of them on the way to the deep of forgetfulness by sighing out the good old line—

"Full many a gem of purest ray serene
The unfathomable depths of ocean bear."

The Literary Societies of the college were addressed by Rev. A. R. Erwin, of Nashville, and the Society of the Alumni by Mr. Key, of Montgomery. These addresses I need not criticise or praise. They are to speak for themselves; and my thought is, that they will do it right eloquently. They are to be published, I understand, together with the baccalaureate address of President Rivers; such being the desire of the trustees and students of the college, and of the citizens of Florence. That baccalaureate of Dr. Rivers reminded me of the times when the floods were out, and of—

"The Pontic Sea—
Whose steady current and compulsive force
Never knows retiring ebb, but keeps right onward
To the Propontic and the Hellespont."

We will read that and its fellows when they are printed.

The future of this college is full of promise. The citizens of Florence are building a noble edifice for its use, which will be completed by the close of the next session.

The Trustees have elected a Professor of Modern Languages, and he has accepted the place. They have also determined to establish a law department in the college, and have it open for students by the beginning of the next session.

Before I close this rambling letter, it is proper that I should state that there is one very serious cause of complaint against the Faculty. Four of the five gentlemen who have heretofore composed that fraternity have been living in single wretchedness, notwithstanding they have arrived at years of responsibility some while ago; utterly refusing patronage to the firm of Cupid, Hymen & Co., and thereby giving all the influence of their high position against the firm aforesaid. I had only felt the above complaint when one of the parties assured me that reformation was in progress that would satisfy any reasonable demand. "Under the rose," Mr. Advocate, before the beginning of the next session of the college, one of the Faculty, worthy of a better fate, will be left alone in his glory, with "no one left to advocate the cause of the wicked one."

Among the honors distributed by the college at its late commencement was the degree of LL. D., conferred upon the Hon. John S. Bryant, Esq., of Nashville. Rev. J. B. Walker, of New Orleans, and Rev. T. W. Dorman, of Mobile, received the degree of D. D.

In conclusion, I must have room to say that the princely hospitality extended to visitors was just such as would be expected from the intelligent and refined society of Florence. May the great God abundantly bless the citizens and the college, and grant them the baptism of fire and the Holy Ghost, that piety and learning may be their abundant, best of blessings for all time to come.

July 24, 1855. SUMTER.

Further Foreign News.

From the Paris correspondence of the New York Times we extract the following:

PARIS, Thursday, July 5, 1855.—The dispatch of Gen. Pelissier, giving a detailed account of the assault upon Malakoff and the Redan, was published in the Moniteur yesterday. From this, and from reliable private sources, I gather the following points, from which it will be seen that the defence was conducted with immense ability and address, while the attack was both slovenly and confused.

First. The Russians were aware of the precise moment at which the assault was to be made. The nature and the vivacity of the bombardment indicated clearly enough that an assault was to follow, but we are not told how the Russian commanders learned that the hour was three in the morning. This shows conclusively that the Allies will never find the enemy off their guard.

Second. Gen Mayran mistook a fusee discharged from the Mamelon, for Pelissier's signal, to be sent up from the Lancaster battery. His division therefore marched to the attack before the other two, and the Russians consequently had a divided and successive assault to resist, instead of a united and simultaneous onset.

Third. Gen. Brunet was not ready when the genuine signal was given, and was notably twenty-five minutes behind Mayran, who was himself a quarter of an hour in advance.

Fourth—Malakoff and the Redan, the two works especially to be assaulted, had protended the evening before, to be so badly used that they could no longer reply to the enemy's fire. Both Pelissier and Raglan were completely deceived; the former says: "It is possible these works had not really suffered as much as we had the right to suppose they had, from the effects of our artillery." The armament of Malakoff had been changed during the night, and pieces adapted for grape had been substituted for the long range cannons of the day before.

Fifth—During the night the Russians had sunk the ditch lining the exterior of Malakoff a couple of feet, and the French scaling ladders were found at the critical moment, to be considerably too short!

Sixth—The Russian fleet locked up in the harbor, which Pelissier had given us to understand was radically damaged, did the Allies the most serious injury. One letter says that there were spoke in part of Malakoff, which the fleet rendered positively impassible; nine men out of ten were swept away by its plowing fire."

Seventh—There were 20,000 men under arms behind Malakoff alone, with 30 field pieces, besides the armament of the bastion itself.

Eighth—A battery of terrible power was unmasked upon the assaulting columns.

Pelissier recognizes and acknowledges all these errors and misconceptions. He says that "with Spartan coolness and ensemble in the attack, the object might have been attained; but an inconceivable fatality defeated our plans." He speaks of the success and the address of the movements of the Russian fleet. Lord Raglan never saw in his life such discharges of grape, and that, too, from works that had been reduced to silence the night before! The Russians, having learned that 23,000 men were to be employed against them, were ready to send 40,000 of their own into action.

Thus, the assault has been made; and at the moment of commencing the attack, not a single individual in the Allied camp doubted for an instant of its success. What are the inferences to be drawn from its failure? In answering this question we must remember that the death of Lord Raglan seems to have been hastened, if not determined, by the defeat, and that Louis Napoleon, having withdrawn to a country seat near Versailles, is living in isolation, and, as may be easily believed, in alternate fits of rage and despondency.

The inferences are, evidently, that the Russians can never be taken unawares; that, as the London Times declares, they have agents in the heart of the Allied camp; that they are more than a match for the French and English in those fusees de guerre which neutralize the best advantages of valor, number and position; that their resources are still exhaustless; that their invention is yet lively; that there is neither lack of provisions nor of ammunition; and that the regular fortifications of the city will be defended with ten-fold the vigor which characterized the defence of the exterior works, or of the heights of Alma or the Valley of Inkermann. The Allies have suffered a severe defeat; have undergone a sudden and violent check, and are laboring under a natural disappointment, and under what is much worse—the consciousness that they have overrated themselves and underrated their enemy. Pelissier was never famous for prudence, and he has now lost a portion of his credit for sagacity. Another charm has also been destroyed—the happy influence of famous anniversaries. Louis Napoleon is especially superstitious on this point, as is well known. The 18th of June was the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo, and was chosen, and indeed waited for, in order that a victory gained in common, might obliterate all old grudges, and dissipate, at least for present purposes, any yet active prejudices. The anticipated victory was a disastrous and even disgraceful defeat. A Russian asked an Allie during the truce for the burial of the dead, if the English and French Generals were not drunk during the assault.

It is unlikely that we receive any further tidings of import from the Crimea under three weeks at least. Indeed, it is more than probable that during the entire months of July and August the heat of the season will condemn the invaders to forced inaction. Lord Raglan received this last honors day before yesterday. From the wording of Pelissier's dispatch it is impossible to tell whether he was buried or sent home. There have been no obituaries, no elegies, or even eulogies upon the deceased General in the French press; he was not very highly appreciated and is not very deeply regretted.

The Hango Affair.

The following is a translation from the French in the Journal de St. Petersbourg of the letter addressed by Admiral Dundas to the Commander-in-Chief of the Russian troops at Helsingfors:

ON BOARD HER MAJESTY'S SHIP DUKE OF WELLINGTON, OFF SVEABG, June 15.

Sir: I take advantage of the first opportunity to communicate with you respecting what I have just learnt from the commander of her Majesty's ship Cossack. His complaint is to me that the officers and crew of one of the Cossack's boats, while landing with a flag of truce with the intention of putting on shore some Russian subjects, whom we did not wish to retain prisoners, having captured them on board some coasting vessels which the cruisers under my orders had taken and destroyed, were easily put to death on the 5th instant, at Hango-Udde by the troops stationed there.

The Cossack arrived there with the said intention on the morning of the 5th, and kept at a distance of from two to three miles from the landing place. The boat was sent from this vessel at that distance, and pulled for the shore with three officers and thirteen other persons, besides the prisoners they wished to liberate. The flag of truce was not hoisted on the prow of the boat until she was within a mile of the coast. From the investigations I have made, I have every reason to believe that care was taken that the flag should be distinctly visible. In such manner the officer in charge of the boat approached the shore. The troops on shore made no signal nor any objection until he neared the landing place. Finding no one there authorized to communicate with him, he thought he might land, never ceasing to display the flag of truce, of which he himself was the bearer. The prisoners, who were to be set at liberty, commenced removing their things on shore; in this they were assisted by some of the sailors, who landed for the purpose, but without arms.

I may add that all the arms of the crew were placed at the bottom of the boat. Thus situated, they were suddenly surprised by a superior armed force, which rushed upon them from the houses in the neighborhood, and attacked them indiscriminately. Our men did what they could to explain the object of their mission, and offered no resistance, for resistance under such circumstances was out of the question. I know myself positively that one of the Russian prisoners understood the English language, and the Russian officer seems to have been able to reply in the same tongue when addressed in the two languages, calling his attention to the flag of truce, which he refused to recognize. A free musketry was opened upon the inoffensive crew of the boat, and upon the prisoners we had come to set at liberty. Wound after wound was inflicted upon them in the most cruel and savage manner. The firing continued, until all were killed, or supposed to be so. One man only, severely wounded, and who was thought dead, succeeded in making his escape on board the boat, when a few hours afterwards he was picked up by the vessel. Four of the crew were found dead in the bottom of the boat.

Their wounds prove that they must have been fired at more than once, which fact is confirmed by the testimony of the survivor.

I have only to add that the entire crew of the boat might have been made prisoners without difficulty, and that the murderous attack of which I complain was in no wise provoked, and not at all necessary.

In calling your attention to these facts I hope I shall not be making a vain appeal to your honor as an officer, to give me such explanations as you may deem entitled under the actual circumstances, and I am happy to take advantage of this circumstance to afford to you the means of defending the character of your flag.

It is to the parents only of the unhappy victims of this affair, that any reparation can now be made, and it would be a certain consolation for them to know with certainty, either that all are dead, or that, if there are survivors, there is hope that they will recover from their wounds.

I send you, therefore, annexed, a list of officers and sailors supposed to have been killed, and I shall feel grateful to you for any information you can give me respecting this unhappy affair.

I have the honor to remain, etc.,

R. DUNDAS.

Rear Admiral, Commander-in-Chief of Her Britannic Majesty's Squadron in the Baltic.

To this letter the Journal de St. Petersbourg publishes the following reply:

HELSINGFORS, Tuesday, June 5, (17th.)

MONSIEUR L'AMIRAL: Before replying to the letter of your Excellency of the 3d (15th) of June, I must observe with regret that the vessels of the English fleet hoist Russian colors the more easily to capture any Russian vessel they come across. The journals have sufficiently made known how, from the commencement of the war, the flag of truce has been abused in every sea to take soundings and make military observations. The hostility displayed against inoffensive towns and villages, inhabited by peaceful populations, has been but too well proved by all that has taken place in the Baltic.

On the 14th (26th) of May, a cutter, I do not know from which ship, landed with a little white flag near the village of Twerminne. Not finding any troops stationed near the village, the crew of the cutter wantonly set fire to some huts and boats, despite the white flag.

On the 20th of May (5th of July) another cutter belonging to the corvette Cossack made for the Hango coast. This boat had the British flag flying. The officer in command of her pretends to have hoisted a little white flag in her prow on a stick. Neither the men on duty at the telegraph on the neighboring heights, nor the military post on the coasts, perceived this pretended white flag. It was, consequently, quite natural that they should attack the cutter and his crew as soon as the latter landed.

Lieut. Louis Genaste pretends that a servant carried by his side a stick with the white flag on it. The soldiers and officers of our advanced posts, questioned as to the existence of the flag, affirm that they never saw it at all.

M. Genaste pretends that he was sent with a flag of truce to give up some of the crew of merchantmen captured during the fortnight. If such had been his intention it would have been a much simpler plan, as the Cossack came from the neighborhood of Cobstrand, to have sent them to Sweaborg, or to have landed them on some island, from which they could easily have reached the coast.

The Captain of the Cossack ought to know that the bearer of a flag of truce cannot and ought not to be received upon the first landing-place, promontory or rock it may suit him to select.

My outposts see, and will continue to see, in such missions, only military reconnoissances, which use similar pretexts to make explorations and secure prey below.

The hostile and by no means truce-like character of this mission is, moreover proved:

1. By the loaded arms seized. Three muskets show by their exploded caps that the crew of the boat made use of them in the struggle.

2. By the care shown in providing the cutter with 300 cartridges, and a chest full of incendiary articles, which is exactly in our possession.

On the following day the Cossack kept up a heavy fire during an hour against the village of Hange and its peaceful inhabitants, and a few days later, the 1st (13th) of June, the attack was repeated, to set fire to the telegraph, and to destroy some houses, instead of going to Sweaborg to demand explanations.

Despite the superiority which steam and screws give to your vessels, they do not cease to hoist the Russian flag to seize our sailing vessels.

In the same manner some yards of white canvas have evidently been turned to account to take soundings and make explorations.

I am willing to believe, M. l'Admiral, that all is done without your knowledge. Allow me to express the hope that you will in future prohibit the missions of such pretended flags of truce. The crew of Lieutenant Genaste's boat were caught in their own trap. Seven men were killed, four wounded, and the remainder made prisoners, as the list I enclose will inform you. The affair only lasted a moment. It was impossible to distinguish the English from the prisoner sailors they brought with them. One of them, Lundstrom, who spoke English, was the first man killed, and two others were wounded.

The responsibility of the whole affair rests with the irregularity with which missions of this sort are made.

It appears to me that it would be more suitable to make communications to Sweaborg, and intrust them to some vessel sent there, in the same manner as you sent your letter of the 3d (15th) of June.

The Cossack should not have deviated from the rule. Vessels wishing to enter into parley should hoist a white flag at large dimensions, and anchor beyond long range, and await a boat to receive their message in writing. We will never receive any other. The Cossack did nothing of the sort. It seems to me that the honor of your flag ought to exact the most strict and scrupulous observance of the rules established on such occasions.

The honor of my flag will never permit me to depart from them.

I can assure you that the wounded are well taken care of and the prisoners well treated.

I have the honor to be, Monsieur l'Admiral,
Your very obedient servant,

DE ROSEN,

Aid-de-camp-General of His Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, AUGUST 4, 1855.

HEALTH.—Our friends in the country had better not visit us, for a while. According to the following rule, yellow fever is now epidemic in the city:

"Mankind at large, as well as the medical faculty, have agreed, by common consent, to denominate as epidemic any disease, the number of deaths from which, in a given time, exceeds all other diseases of disease."

WATERS' WATERMELONS.—Messrs. Waters, 92 Camp street, have given us knowledge of the most satisfactory kind, that on their plantation, near Amite, on the Jackson and New Orleans Railroad, they can raise a first rate quality and quantity of melon, cabbage and green corn. The orange melon peels off like a genuine yellow rind, is delicious and well named.

AN ALIBI.—In our absence, a paragraph of last week's paper made us speak of Oak Bowery Mills, as of having been there lately. The paragraph was clipped from the Southern Times, and intended to be so credited.

IMPOSTOR.—Assuming, last, the name of Sparks, and passing as a Methodist preacher, in Calcasieu Parish, La. Why will people be imposed on so easily? Demand of these strangers their credentials, and take no idle stories about trunks lost, left in coat pockets, &c. Mr. Bilbo, of Lake Charles, thus describes the man:

"Sparks is a man of ordinary stature, built rather on the dandy order, with a clear though somewhat foreign accent, and humbugs the credulous fluently in French, English and Spanish. He has black hair, grey eyes, (one of them cocked or sexed, which gives a singular effect to his preaching,) and he is remarkable for the enormous size of his proboscis. His foot, too, boasts the same unenviable dimensions."

BISHOP ANDREW'S LETTERS.—We hope the Bishop's port folio will favor us with more of its contents. A few hours of his conversation gave us a more graphic picture of California, socially and religiously, than had been received from all other sources before.

DER DEUTSCHE CHRISTICHE APOLOGETE.—The first number, August 4, is on our table; quarto form; $1 subscription. Too cheap; its typographical execution would do credit to the Publishing House.

READING SERMONS.—The antipathy of the Scotch people to read sermons is very well known. At Kirkcudbright, at an "inauguration," an old woman on the pulpit stairs asked one of her companions if the new minister was a reader. "And how can he read, woman?" was the reply; "the man's blin'." To which the first made answer, "I'm glad to hear't—I wish they were a' blin'."

ALABAMA UNIVERSITY.—At the late Commencement the Graduating Class numbered twenty. We are happy to say that it is described, too, as the best prepared. The class is as follows:

W. A. Parker, J. J. Jones, M. H. Yerby, W. G. Gamble, J. W. Monette, O. T. Richardson, C. Manly, W. S. Kennedy, R. Perrin, T. J. Scott, G. Little, J. A. Jones, O. Parker, J. P. Clark, R. H. Cobbs, W. H. Gladney, B. W. Jackson, R. R. Gaines, N. Friend, J. G. Cook, W. Tate, and R. H. Pratt.

The vacancies in the faculty were filled by the election of Prof. Garland to the Presidency, Prof. Tuomey to the chair of Chemistry, George R[illegible] to the chair of Mixed, Rev. J. H. Foster to the chair of Pure Mathematics. President Manly announced his retirement from the post he has filled so well, and was complimented by a set of resolutions couched in grateful language, passed by the Board of Trustees.

CUI BONO?—The Universalist Herald says: "We are rejoiced to learn that the Universalists of Springfield, Sumpter county, Ala., are engaged in erecting a church building." Friend, what is the use of it?

OUR MISSIONARY SECRETARY.—The Lynchburg Virginian of the 18th ult. has the following notice:

Rev. Dr. Soben, Missionary Secretary of the M. E. Church, South, preached on Sunday at both the Methodist Episcopal Churches in this city, and made good collections at each. His sermon at the Third street Church, at night, is spoken of very highly for its eloquence and power."

LITTLE MEN.—Speaking of diminutive men who were among the most eminent in the world, Sydney Smith instanced his friend Jeffrey, and added that there was another (name not given) who had "not body enough to cover his mind decently with; his intellect was improperly exposed."

A TAKE NOTICE.—The Boston Pilot has a funny idea, which is worthy of being written in letters of tin on every priest's back:

"Peter was a married man. So have been many holy bishops and priests of the [illegible] he was separated from his wife [illegible] election to the sublime office now [illegible]."

The Churches.

It is the part of a religious journal, however devoted to the body to which it ministers, not to ignore all other Christian people. A portion of its duty is to give to its readers due information respecting other branches of the family of Christ; and this may be for comfort, for instruction, or for admonition. It may be to increase love, to awaken apprehension, or to call forth our sympathy; for incitement, for caution or for imitation.

M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH.

The Kansas Legislature met on the 2d ult., and Rev. Thomas Johnson, of the Church, South, was elected President of the Legislative Council of Kansas. Mr. Johnson is Superintendent of the Methodist Mission.

The Minutes of the Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, South, for the year 1854-'55, are out. Price, 10 cents.

The Texas Christian Advocate, 28th ult., says the proof sheet of the German paper was issuing. Further:

"Our German paper has been changed in name, from 'German Reformator' to 'German Christian Apologist.' This has been done for various good and substantial reasons. One is, that Apologete (that is the way it is printed in German) is the German for our English word, Advocate. So that the title of Brother Moelling's paper, anglicised, is 'German Christian Advocate.' And we think all our Methodist papers ought to maintain the family name. Another reason is, that it was found, from various letters from German preachers, that 'Reformator' was not an acceptable title. And as we could not take the simple name 'Christian Apologist,' because Dr. Nast's paper had that name, we added the word 'German' to it.

We understand that some complaint is made in high quarters at the North about this prefix, 'German.' We have simply to say, in reply, that Bro. Moelling had nothing to do with it. He, indeed, determined to change from 'Reformator to 'Apologist,' but he had nothing to do in choosing the prefix. We understand our friends at the North wish it called Southern Christian Apologist. Will they put the prefix, 'Northern,' to theirs?"

The Book Agents have brought out new and handsome editions of Mrs. Cross's "Bible Gleanings," price 25 cents; "Driftwood," price 25 cents; and Mrs. Martin's "Day Spring," price 25 cents. These are beautiful gift books, as well as books for the Sunday School and family libraries. So is "Youthful Christianity," price 25 cents. Of this book the editor says, in the preface, "This volume was written by Rev. Samuel Martin, who knows how to write for young people."

Package No. 4 of "Methodist Pamphlets for the People" is an excellent temperance series; 152 pages, price 25 cents.

M. E. CHURCH, NORTH.

Bishop Baker writes from California that the Conference has taken Honolulu into its regular work, and sent Rev. W. S. Turner to that charge. The Bishop found "a class already formed there, and they were anxiously entreating the conference to supply them with a preacher. They propose to support him. Brother Turner has been there, and is favorably known. I had an interview this morning (May 23) with a member from our Church at Honolulu, a merchant, who is very much pleased that we have sent them a preacher."

A new Methodist college, it is stated, is to be established at Troy, N. Y., for which $100,000 has already been secured.

The Pittsburg Conference, at its late session, approved of a plan to locate a new college at Barnesville Ohio. Its endowment of $100,000 is to be raised by the sale of perpetual scholarships. The Richmond College has also been placed under Methodist patronage and control.

The going zeal, as well as the giving, has not yet attained perfection. The Mission Com. says:

"This is the third year the General Mission Committee has provided the money for the commencement of a mission in India, and yet the bishops have not been able to obtain a minister of suitable age, health and habits as founder and superintendent of the mission."

METHODISTS IN CANADA.

The Methodists of Canada West, at their late meeting, made two important changes in their Church polity. They have consented to extend the period of a minister's residence on a circuit from two to five years, in any case where a request to that effect emanates from a quarterly meeting of a circuit. They have also consented to admit an equal representation of clerical and lay members at the annual district meeting.

Dr. Ryerson, who, a year ago, withdrew from his connection with the Wesleyan Conference in Canada, has returned to the Conference. His departure originated in some difference respecting discipline. He addressed a letter to the President, in which he stated that his views remained unaltered respecting the points of difference between himself and the Conference, but expressed a desire to resume his ministerial duties in the Church. The communication was accompanied with a verbal assurance that his own peculiar views on the questions at issue would be held in abeyance in deference to the determination of the Conference to maintain inviolate those parts of the Wesleyan discipline to which his communication referred. With this understanding he was readmitted. There is an after-clap, however. He is not disposed to admit the binding obligation of the "verbal assurance," and the aspect of the subject, as presented in the last Guardian, looks to agitation.

BAPTIST.

A Southern Baptist Publication Society has been organized at Nashville, Tenn., and the Christian Index states the following in reference to its origin:

"The great object which we had in view in the formation of the society was the securing for the South a religious literature not tinctured with Northern abolitionism and fanaticism."

The Bienville (La.) Times, 19th ult., says:

"The Louisiana Baptist State Convention has just closed its Seventh Annual Meeting. The delegation was larger than had been expected, and the contributions sent up by the churches perhaps double what was expected, in view of the very unfavorable condition of the finances of the country. We feel, for our own part, rejoiced in believing our work is onward.

The Convention was sumptuously and cordially entertained by the citizens about Mount Zion and Vernon, notwithstanding all the apprehensions about the scarcity of corn and provisions. We saw no scarcity, and supposed no one else did; for the good brethren had been thinking about their Convention, and had provided for five times as many. There is much intelligence, piety and liberality in Jackson parish.

Thirty-three churches and four associations were represented. The business was transacted in harmony and love."

The Baptist Mission in New Mexico is succeeding as well or better than any other. The missionary writes:

"On the 30th December last, there might have been seen in Peralta, New Mexico, a small collection of Christians, comprising all the Missionaries of this territory, numbering four and one colporteur, together with some few recently converted Mexicans. We had assembled to hear the Christian experience of some who had asked for baptism. After a season of prayer and praise we listened with tearful eyes and joyful hearts to their relation of God's dealings with them, and four, three of Peralta and one who had come more than sixty miles to attend the meeting, were received for baptism and church membership. These are among the first gatherings of the New Mexican vintage."

PRESBYTERIAN.

In the New School, it appears, by their statistics, that 10,700 persons were added during the ecclesiastical year ending in April. During the same year the removals by death, certificate and other causes amounted to 9,104. Net increase of the Church, 1,552.

The statistics record an increase of one synod and five ministers, and forty candidates more than were reported a year since. The licentiates are three less, and the churches two less than last year.

The Old School Presbyterians have a missionary at Bogota, New Grenada, and a converted Spaniard is distributing tracts in Venezuela.

Their Board has just sent out four strong men for California.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL.

The Journal of the Seventeenth Convention of the Diocese in Louisiana reports up to May last: Parishes, 23, of which 7 are in New Orleans; missionary stations, 7; baptized during the year, 600 infants, of which 213 were returned by Rev. C. W. Whitall; added to the communicants, 138; died or removed, 71; present number, 1,254; confirmed, 227; S. S. Scholars, 781; contributions for religious purposes, $9,950.

It is proposed to endow the Episcopate with a sum yielding $4,000 annually. This fund has reached $12,000. A church for the free people of color has been organized in this city. The salary of the bishop is made up by assessment on parishes, at the rate of 15 per cent. on pastors' salaries. Nine have been added to the list of clergy, three from New York, two from Pennsylvania, and two from Connecticut, the other two from Kentucky and Mississippi. As Methodists would say, "transfers" are the main dependence. This sugar soil does not raise native preachers. We see and record it with pleasure that this branch of the Church is prospering.

We were present a few hours of the May session, and much interested in a discussion on concurring in the action of the General Convention that communicants only, hereafter, should be eligible to that body. Rev. Mr. McCoy's remarks pleased us. He thought it a movement—timely and necessary—for drawing the lines more plainly between the Church and the world. But the majority of speakers insisted that such a rule would cut off good delegates and withdraw the Church from sympathy and influence upon the world! Mr. Duncan asserted that one-third of the lay delegates to the General Convention were not communicants—i. e., not members of the Church for which they legislated. Action on the concurrence was postponed a year.

New Publications.

THE ESCAPED NUN.—DeWitt & Davenport: New York, 1855; pp. 344.

Here are disclosures of convent life and confessions in the public ear, of a sister of charity. Like all of the sort, it is so out of the way of corroboration as to have an air of weakness. Our opinion of conventual establishments stands expressed. They are a dark and cruel fraud—unauthorized jails. Their toleration, with high walls, iron bars, unexplored cells and exemption from Grand Jury visitations, is an outrage.

We have the book through T. L. White, Canal street.

Stevenson & Owen, Nashville, 1855, have laid on our table the following imprints of the M. E. Church, South:

POWELL ON APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.

Contents carefully indexed and edited by Dr. Summers.

BUDS AND BLOSSOMS—2 vols.:

Very readable compasions for the family library. Roses without thorns.

The violet grows low and covers itself with its own tears, and of all flowers yields the most delicious and fragrant smell. Such is humility.

Editorial Notes.

A crowd at Jackson, La., that caontchouc village. Very literary withal, having three high schools and Centenary. Eager and anticipative visitors on the ground by Saturday, July 21, were entertained by "testimonies" conferred on the young ladies of the Feliciene Female Institute; delightful music, flowers and compositions accompanying. Miss L—— delivered the valedictory. We had notes of this very pleasant affair, taken confusedly—reckon they would be agreeable—but they are lost.

The Joint Board of Trustees and Visitors transacted considerable business on Monday and Tuesday. The Building Committee reported plans and progress of the centre; had contracted for a million and a half of brick, on the site, two-thirds of which are kilned. The plan presents a handsome front elevation, between the ranges of present buildings. It will contain society, library and recitation rooms, and a large chapel.

Hon. E. T. Merrick, among other eminent persons from the adjoining States and Conferences, participated in the deliberations of the Board. His election to the Chief Justiceship of Louisiana is an event of good significance to the ministry of law. He is yet young, a man of spotless integrity, a close student. His features are marked with an expression of legal acumen. The ermine will become him and he it.

On Monday night a capital prelude to graver exercises was put forward by our judicious friend, Rev. A. G. Miller, principal of the Preparatory. He drew out the best talent of his pupils and showed it to advantage.

Tuesday, 24th—The address before the Literary Societies had for weeks been advertised as by Hon. Pierre Soulo, Mr. S. was prevented attendance. As good fortune would have it, there was no disappointment. A correspondent of the Crescent speaks:

JACKSON, LA., July 21, 1855.

Ed. Crescent—Our little town is all agog—this is the commencement of Centenary College of Louisiana. Examinations were completed last week. I am told they were thorough and satisfactory. The State has a lively interest in this Institution, and appoints annually four or five members of the Examining Committee. Being under the auspices and control of the Methodist Church, the college at this time is favored with the presence of many of the distinguished clergy of that denomination. Distinguished citizens of the country are also in attendance, and a perfect overflow of the people. I don't know when and where I have seen so many handsome ladies.

The ball was opened, in a religious way, with the annual sermon on last Sunday morning, in the College chapel, by Rev. J. B. Walker, of your city. It was earnestly addressed, mainly to the young men, on—"Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" The eloquent minister besought those choosing their course of life to consult the highest motives of duty and aims of being. What doth Providence indicate? Where is a strong arm and earnest soul needed? Which grand interest of humanity most requires to be helped? Pregnant questions! If honestly followed, without the prejudices of parental weakness and sectional bubble, overcrowded professions would not receive accessions of needless laborers, while others open to ambition and practical usefulness are passed by. Instead of impatient lawyers and patientless doctors, starving in respectability, we might have clever machinists, engineers, teachers and such like. Sound sentiments, Messrs. Editors, and a man can hardly turn round without seeing their illustrations.

Hon. P. Soulo had engaged to address the literary societies to-day—Tuesday. We were all hoped for his eloquence. But a few days before Commencement, Mr. S. notified them it would not be in his power to me, and the public announcement failed—only in name, however. Rev. G. K. Marshall was on hand; you have heard tell of him. I saw your conferee of the Baton Rouge Advocate—Jenkins—looking sedate. Hope he'll print them. Since Preston is dead, our sister State of Mississippi holds not his Marshall's equal, as a popular orator. He fascinated, electrified, astounded, confounded, enlightened and carried away his audience—a vast one it was too. He questioned with boldness the progress of the age. Progress is rife; but not all in such progress that progresses. True progress tends to elevate the race—ameliorate its condition—refine its sentiment—put it on a path onward and upward. Much of ours was material—much downwards. With action, there was evacuation and reaction. He explored the paths along which young energy might aspire—the paths most inviting, not for indulgence, and achievement—recommended self-respect, self-reliance and self-denial, and with an encouraging peroration set our Southern youth upon the only royal road.

The Juniors represented the talents of their respective societies—six of the Franklin and six of the Union. These societies are no small part of their education. Here the men of the future cross swords and learn to fend and thrust before they get at the business in earnest. Being fresh when these speakers stepped out, we took notes more freely than can be prized. Expecting another pace at them, we let them pass now with the following generalities.

Allusions to Greece and Rome rather plenty; those respectable old dames are cited on all sides of all questions. A heerer hears it well enough for a few speeches, but after awhile is willing to let them off. It was refreshing to hear the orator of "Plato's Dream" introduce so modern an illustration as Sebastopol.

The verdict of the audience and the rostrum covered with flowers, was favorable, and in some instances must have satisfied the largest ambition. The healthy moral tone pervading the speeches was especially gratifying. Solid thought and argument were dealt out over and anon. Patriotic sentiment welled up heartily.

Wednesday, 25th—College band discoursed stirring music. Ladies well nigh filled the large chapel; verandah, aisles and platform giving gentlemen such accommodation as they could find.

1. LATIN SALUTATORY (second honor)—J. S. Young, Arkansas.

This speaker is always sacrificed to the dignity of the occasion. Though not understood, no one gets a closer hearing; attention is fresh, and moreover, no one wishes to give out so publicly that he or she is not learned. Manner was good; pleased to learn that he is retained for Homer College.

2. FAME—Man's Motive Power—J. G. Carney.

A better speech than subject.

3. NATIONAL RECOLLECTIONS—A. P. Brown.

Patriotic sentiment; imagery extravagant.

4. THE CELESTIAL EMPIRE—Paul Goarrier.

A subject to be read upon and studied; which done, the speaker had not only to say something, but had something to say. China, its early history, revolution and future was served up as relishably as a birdseed pie. Model speech.

5. EDUCATION WITHOUT MORALITY—M. J. Bowman.

6. DIVINE INSPIRATION TEACHES MAN TO BE FREE (first honor)—C. W. Carter.

Listening to such sentiments, one is impressed with the worth while. The Church, in controlling education, labors not in vain. Moral sentiments, breathed freely and naturally, emanating from students after passing through and about to quit her institutions, are a reward and a comment. Such were these two.

7. TRIUMPHS OF THE SOLDIER AND PHILOSOPHER—C. P. Delcc.

The speaker took one side, and his voice the other. He was for the triumphs of peace, but his voice was for war. A specimen of distinct, emphatic, rousing declamation, not equaled by any other.

8. TRIBUTE TO NATHANIEL GREEN—M. A. Dickson.

Brimfull of '76.

9. MAN AND CIRCUMSTANCE—E. J. Delony.

A neat argument, readered in neat style, to prove that great circumstances make great men. Some of our critical neighbors remarked on his voice having that rare element of power, suppressed emotion.

10. SOUTHERN LITERATURE—T. C. W. Ellis

Unanimously carried, its necessity. And on the walls of the chapel, in evergreens, the bold letters, "Southern Education."

11. THE PATHS OF GLORY LEAD BUT TO THE GRAVE—J. T. Davis.

Warmly applauded.

12. ENGLISH POLICY—Ernest Gourrier.

French hatred to England added its piquancy. Like his brother Crébles, of French descent, he gave John Bull blows with a will.

13. THE HERO OF 1803—T. W. Mioure.

Poor Emmet would have died easier had he known that American youth would celebrate him with such eulogies.

14. EUREKA, NEVER ATTAINED—J. Moore.

Working out the poet's thought:

"Man never is, but always to be blessed."

15. POLITICAL CONSERVATISM (first honor)—W. B. Spencer.

Triumphant! Audience longing to hear just such sentiments, some of the orators having squinted at annexing Cube and the rest of mankind, and indulged in a vein of filibusterism—the United States one grand locomotive, able to carry all that could be hitched on to it—Mexicans, Cubans, Spaniards and what not. Spencer claimed bounds for empire, limits to policy, and finiteness for statesmanship. Principles of universal application, as Democracy, cannot be administered under one universal empire. Gravitation is a law, yet there is a point where "gravitation turns the other way." Bold jobbers at pulling down, but not at putting up—the advocates of growing, instead of improving—the spreadouts—the prophets of political millenium close at at hand, got a sound drubbing. With manly vigor and soberly finish it was done. Applauded to the echo.

16. PIL TRY—J. D. Nettles.

17. GOLDEN AGE NEVER PRESENT—W. F. Norsworthy.

18. PROGRESS—G. F. Sanderson.

A trio of creditable performances; the last dashed with poetry and matrimonial allusion that brought down all the bonquets the ladies had.

19. REFLECTION—S. L. Singletary.

20. THE LOST WONDERS OF THE WORLD—W. N. Tigner.

A note taker, in foreign jargon, wrote opposite—bien, muy bien.

21. LIFE IN THE FUTURE (first honor)—Wm. W. Wall.

A hopeful, trustful, yet sober estimate of the chances. Thread of discussion well maintained, with classical allusion chaste, original, and pat as ofcons. The literature of his speech purer than any. Delivered with a gentle and genial fire.

22. VALEDICTORY ADDRESSES (first honor)—R. L. Pugh.

This honor appears to have been divided among four; but to Mr. Pugh was assigned the distinction of primus inter pares. Two years ago we had occasion to speak in high but deserved praise of his brother, also the valedictorian of his class. Lafourche bears off the honors. His position showed Mr. P.'s scholastic diligence and success—his address physical and emotional fitness for a public speaker. No maudlin brimness overran the vales. All was neatly, tastefully dispatched.

Diplomas given by President Miller. The President, whose indisposition, it was feared, would prevent his performance of this interesting duty, was happily able to be present, and prefaced his act by solid counsel on Decision of Character.

"A noble band of young men!" was oft exclaimed. Less than a Saviour's heart, looking on them, might have loved them, and breathed a prayer for their direction and success in life. May they be polished shafts to do good!

The degree of A. M. was conferred, in course, upon Hon. Mark Boatner, J. J. Lane, A. C. Huff, Charles Spencer, W. E. Montgomery, D. C. Montgomery, W. L. Nugent, and M. T. Carter.

Divinity was, in no instance, thought worthy or needy of medication. So no D. D. nor any other D.s were conferred. A right wholesome abstinence.

We do not congralulate him, but the University of Alabama, upon his accession to its Presidency. It is not often that the highest position in the State for developing its mind, secures the fittest man in it.

Dr. Garland is a Virginian by birth, and a graduate of one of her colleges. First and last, he has filled every chair in a liberal college course, with marked ability. The student of chemistry, mathematics, astronomy, languages or English literature would judge from his thorough science of the subject and all germen to it, and also from his easy perspicuity of instruction, that he was out out for whatever chair he happened to be in.

It is a privilege of the highest kind for the youth of the land to have set before them such a model of the Christian gentleman, the modest but profound philosopher, and the patient, thorough student. From building railroads through mountains to brushing an eggshell in an air-pump he is equally at home, exact, successful. We would walk five miles to hear him lecture on constructing catapults or raising gourds—the Greek text of Homer or Paul's Epistles—Horace's Falernian or the differential of xy, &c. He fixes zenith and nadir points in the heavens, and the sights on his amateur rifle—calculates the orbit of a planet or a cartwheel—the proper angle for a horse collar to work or the parallax of a star, with equal facility and practicalness.

The alma mater of Dr. Garland is old Hemden Sydney; but it matters not where he graduated. Colleges do not produce such men. Graduation is only their starting point. He is not a minister, but a Methodist layman. His occupation has been teaching, and his immediate associates in the noble toil of education such men as Olin, Parks, Hardy, Sims, Duncan, Doggett and Manly.

Few public speakers are more to our mind than Dr. G. Winning and quiet address, convincing speech, eloquent thought; in manner finished, of matter full. He is now in the prime of life.

We had hoped that Dr. Garland would continue diverting himself with projects of N. E. and S. W. Railroads till some of the Methodist colleges in the Alabama Conference got under way; but the State has forestalled the Church.

Protestantism Proscribed in Portugal

A clergyman, named Gomez, who is a Protestant, has for some time past endeavored to instruct the miserable inhabitants of Lisbon in the truths of the gospel. His proceedings at length attracted the attention of the House of Peers, and the Marquis of Vallada, selected for the purpose, called the attention of Government to the advertisement of Gomez, who proposed to preach in his own house.

"It appears to me," said the Marquis, "that the name of the advertiser is Portuguese, although they tell me that the individual is a foreigner; but whether he be or not, that is nothing to the point. The fact is, that an individual here presents himself, publicly offending against the laws of the country, by announcing that he will give lectures in his house on Protestantism; and not in his house with closed doors and very privately, but in public and his door open, inviting all to go and hear him, in order to convince them of the advantage of abandoning our religion and embracing Protestantism."

The laws in force in Portugal are as follow:

ART. 130. He who fails in respect to the religion of the Kingdom, the Romen Catholic Apostolic, shall be condemned to imprisonment from one to three years, and a fine proportioned to his income, in every one of the following cases:

1. Injuring (or insulting) the said religion publicly, in any dogma, act or object of its worship; by deed, or words, or publications in any form.

2. Attempting by the same means to propagate doctrines contrary to the Catholic dogmas defined by the Church.

3. Attempting by any means to make proselytes or conversions to a different sect, condemned by the Church.

4. Celebrating public acts of worship not that of the said Catholic religion.

ART. 135. Every Portugnese who, professing the religion of the King, shall fail in respect to the same religion of the Kingdom, by apostatizing or renouncing it publicly, shall be condemned to the loss of his political rights.

If the guilty person under Art. 135 be a foreigner, the punishment, instead of fine and imprisonment, shall be banishment from the Kingdom.

It is affirmed that these articles were inserted in the penal code in pursuance of a concordat between the Pope and the late Queen of Portugal, in direct breach of a recent treaty between the Queens of England and Portugal, which guarantood to British subjects the liberty of worship. Such is the morality of the Pope, encouraging a direct violation of treaty stipulations, and such the honesty of a Polish sovereign.

LAGRANGE, AT FLORENCE.—Our correspondent, "Sumter," whose interesting report of the late Commencement appears elsewhere, says, in a private note:

"I have not said as much as I could, justly, for the college. It is really doing first rate, and we had a fine time there."

We add an item which does not therein appear, and of which he has not informed us. The honorary degree of A. M. was conferred on Rev. J. Barker, of the Alabama Conference, and right worthily.

The diamond, fallen into a dunghill, is not the less precious; and the dust raised by high winds to heaven is not the less vile.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

AN INCIDENT—RESIGNATION.

A few mourners were assembled around a little new made grave. Jesus had taken another lamb to his bosom, perhaps to call the parents upward. Millard was gone; and we were gazing for the last time upon his sweet face. The mother of little Millard, worn out with midnight watchings with her darling, was not able to attend the funeral. The young father stood there alone, with no kind comforter near. He seemed perfectly heart-broken. He was not religious, but he seemed to feel that the hand of God had chastened him, and with a look of anguish at the little coffin he fell upon his knees, with clasped hands and streaming eyes upturned to Heaven. He prayed with much fervor the prayer our Saviour taught us, and was enabled to say, "Thy will be done!" I knelt by his side and silently implored "Our Father" to give him grace to bear his affliction, blot out his sins and seal him a child of God.

After he had prayed he arose, and a calm smile played upon his countenance. I have seen Christian parents resign their children to God who gave them, without murmuring, and say, "Thy will be done!" but never did I witness such resignation in the ungodly. Never did I witness a more affecting scene than the one I have tried to describe. Oh! may that young father never forget that hour, but "let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon."

Missionary Reports.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South.

BOGUE CHITTO COL'D MISS., ALA. CON.:

Dear Brother—At the last session of Conference I was appointed to organize a mission named as above; and as this field has never been occupied before as mission ground, it may not be amiss to give you a detailed account of the country in which the work is embraced and the state and condition of things generally.

This territory, which we desire wholly to occupy as missionary ground, lies on the north side of the Tombigbee River, and embraces the extreme northern portion of Sumter county, the western part of Pickens county, Ala., and the eastern part of Noxubee county, Mississippi. This body of rich prairie, which extends many miles north and west, has induced a great many wealthy and intelligent planters to settle upon it, and hence this has become a wide field for missionary enterprise.

The spiritual wants of the negro population has been supplied so far by our Baptist Protestant Methodist and our own preachers. Our Baptist brethren, however, with their settled pastors, and owing to their peculiar doctrines, with their wealth and influence seem to have been most active, and have succeeded in gathering to their churches and their communion much the largest part of these persons.

But owing to the policy pursued by our Church, in the frequent cutting up and placing together, dividing and subdividing the territory into small, unimportant circuits, and then throwing them all together again and again, besides many other things unnecessary to mention now, has resulted the neglect of our black population to a alarming extent.

With these facts staring me in the face I entered upon my work—immediately on my reception of my appointment—the work of organizing a negro mission among a people many of whom did not understand the term of operation, and fewer still could appreciate it fully to appreciate it.

By the assistance and with the blessing of our Heavenly Father, I take pleasure in stating that we have, in some sort, begun the work. Another mission is now added to the number; and we report the Bogue Chitto Mission in successful operation. It is made up of eight appointments, seven of which are on plantations, one at the church; but we preach to two white congregations, at one of which I fill every four weeks. I have also catechal instruction about 500 adults and children; have taken under my charge members previously reported from the Tuscaw Circuit; joined on probation, 21, many whom have found peace with God; have baptized 25 children. I could say more, a great deal more, but the I have communicated lengthily, this shall suffice for the present.

GREENSBORO', ALA. CON.:

Dear Brother—I report from the Big Creek Mission, for the third quarter: I received into full connection, 33 on probation, 60 baptized, and 50 conversions. The Lord is with us, and "doeth great things whereof we are glad."

Revival Intelligence.

BIG SANNY CT., ALA. CON.:
July 24, 185[illegible]

We have just closed a most interesting meeting at Centre Church, which began on Saturday, 21st, holding three days. The season of rejoicing with the people of God has not been witnessed at this church for years, if ever. All professed to have the spiritual strength renewed. The last two services will be remembered long by those who were present, because of the bountiful pouring of the Spirit.

Sixteen souls were converted, and seven persons joined the Church; all from the interesting youth of the land.

Bro. McLeod, of Alabama Conference, Bro. Green, from Columbiana, rendered efficient aid. Honor to the Lord.

UNION CIRCUIT, ALA. CON.:
July 21, 185[illegible]

God is reviving his work in this part of his vineyard. We have just closed a meeting of seven days continuance at Union Church, which resulted in the accession of thirty probationers and a good number of conversions. The meeting was very interesting. There was a general revival in the Church. Rev. John C. Ardis labored with us very much and faithfully all the time. There is a general [illegible] influence throughout my circuit. The Church is looking forward with great anxiety to the approaching camp meeting near Mount Hilliard, Pike county; a new camp ground embracing the second Sabbath in Sept[illegible].

WHY CHILDREN DIE.—We have seen persons who gathered from the parterre the choicest flowers, just as they began to open into full bloom and fragrance, but the passer-by should tear them from the stem and destroy them. Does not God sometimes gather into Heaven young and tender children for the same reasons—lest the rude hand may despoil them of their beauty?

The tardy worshiper may not be a few minutes too late, but late enough to lose the devotions of the congregation.

Deaths.

DIED—In New Orleans, August 2, Dr. FRANKLIN SHAW, of yoliow fevor.

DIED—June 21, 1855, Rev. ELI HIGGINS, after suffering sixty days with inflammation of the lungs; leaving satisfactory evidence of the power of that religion he had recommended to others.

He was a plain, old fashioned Methodist preacher, of ordinary talent, but a man of faith and of good works; useful in his day, and, so far as the writer knows, had the confidence of all who knew him.

He was a native of South Carolina, born August 27, 1800.. Professed religion in early life and joined the M. E. Church, and some time after was licensed to exhort. Emigrated to Jasper county, Ga, early in the year 1826, and on the 25th of October, in the same year, was married to Miss Julietta Davis. Some eight or nine years afterward they moved to Sumter county, Ala. The next year after coming to Alabama he was licensed to preach this gospel under the ministry of E. Callaway, P. E., which position he retained until death.

While his body sleeps in the bosom of the earth we trust his spirit rests on Mount Zion. His house was always open as a home and resting place of itinerant preachers.

E. M'MEANS.

Mrs. AMELIA GLOVER, daughter of Col. Wm. Walton, and wife of Williamson A. Glover, Esq., was born in South Carolina, December 2, 1803, and died at her home in Greene county, Ala., July 15, 1855. The numerous friends of this lady concur in testifying to her superiority in intelligence, prudence, amiability, usefulness and piety. In her youth she made a profession of religion and became a member of the M. E. Church, and it is believed by those who were well acquainted with her that hor whole life after her conversinn was uniformly productive of holiness. Nature endowed her with a good mind and sound judgmeat; education stored her mind with rich and abundant instructions, and the grace of God sanctified the whole. So that she attained very high rank in the elevated and extended sphere in which she moved, and exerted great influence over her family and friends. This influence was felt daily and acknowledged, and it was always on the sido of truth, purity and heaven. The correctness of her judgment, manifested in her decisions and counsels, the extraordinary modesty and prudence with which those decisions and counsels woro expressed, and the tenderness and love which softened all her reproofs and beautified all her deportment, compelled many persons to regard her with admiration and recoiicot her with veneration. In her conversation she was truthful, chaste, fascinating and instructive. In her manners she was natural and graceful, and uniformly so digalfied as to command the respect of strangers and the commendation of friends. Her charity was seen in her efforts to minister to the happiness of all who were around her, in shielding and oncouraging those whose modesty, gentleness and sensitiveness made them the victims of severe criticism or inoartloss teazing—in carefully seeking evidence before believing evil or pronouncing judgment, and in her sweet persuasive counsels against asperity, revenge and cruelty. She was known extensively and admired greatly as a peacemaker. The beauty which she cultivated was not that which is manufactured by outward ornaments, such as "plaiting the hair and wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel;" but it consisted "in the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price." During hor last illness, which continued one week, she was blessed with "the peace of God, which passeth all understanding." As death approached, her dread of his presence and power diminished, and she expressed her wonder at the tranquility with which she viewed her proximity to the tomb. She said to her family, "Publish to all my friends at my funeral that I am at peace with God and all mankind." She leaves a husband, nine children and many servants, who grieve much on account of their loss, and who veaernte her as a model in the relations of wife, mother and mistress.

The writor of this notice requests her numerous friends to ponder these two questions: What made Mrs. Glover so superior in loveliness, usefulness and happiness? Could she have been so lovely and useful if she had neglooted experimental religion?

MANUFACTURE OF COTTON.

At last some of the Northern people are beginning to understand that the North is not wholly independent of the South, and that the South is altogether too valuable to be trampled on and thrown aside to pioese fools, knaves and fanatics. From these indications of returning common sease we infer that the time is not very far distant which will witness a revivol of national patriotism, and a resurrection of the good, old fraternal feeling that reigned paramount in the bosoms of our honored and noble ancestors.

As proof of this, we will merely state that we frequently come across, in Northern journals, articles advocating and sustniuing grounds respecting Southern industry, resources and prospective grandeur, which we have supported and illustrated for years. This may seem singular, but it is nevertheless true. We can only account for this remarkable change by one process of reasoning. The recent estrangements between the North and the South, the successes which unbridled fanatioism has achieved, and the spirit of disnfiootion, threatening the stahility of the Union, which lins been growing broader and deoper for months, have induced conservative and moderate men who would, otherwise, have taken neither lot nor part in the matter, to investigate the mighty interests involved and to throw their influence on the side of right. Hence, they have gone to work, both with tongue and pen. They have commenced wisely, although the most influential portion of their argument is addressed to the self-interest of their readers. Self-interest, it is true, is not a very exalted emotion, but then it rules the world; and when self-interest can be invoked to sustain the cause of patriotism, in the name of all that is holy, let it be brought in roquisition.

These writers are discussing the value of the prodnotion of cotton and the profits which flow from its manufaoture, as well as the vast interests sustained by it, directly and indirectly. They, also, are calculnting the consequences, to them, by indirection, which would follow a dissolution of the Union, rather plainly foreshadowing the opulence and power of the South, should the Southern people become the principal manufnoturers, as they are now the main producers, of the raw material which clothes the world.

We have before ne the prodqotion of an able Northern writer who utters his sentiments independently and dispassionately. At all events the article to which we refer appeared in an influential Northern periodical. The writer argues, boldly and truly, that the Southern States ought to manufacture, as well as produce cotton, for the world. Such is our opinion, and we have reiterated it time and again. From the statistics furnished, it would appenr "that the cotton manufacture makes up nearly one-half of the exterual trade of the British Kingdom. The United States furnish four-fifths of the six hundred millions of pounds imported into Great Britain. The writer proves by statistics and figures thet the British manufacturer receives five timcs as much for converting the cotton into cloth, as the farmer for producing the raw material, and both employ the same amount of capital. It seems that the same disproportion exists between the profits of the Southern planter and the Northern manufacturer. The writer then sets forth the greater advantages possessed by the Southern planter for manufacturing, and showe that the more saving in the transportation would go largely to the payment of the manufaoture. He urges that instead of increasing the product, already too great, the true Southern policy is to enter largely into the manufaoture, and thus withdraw a portion of the labor engaged in the production and employ it in the more profitable mode of manufacturea."

True and sound doctrine is the foregoing, and we hope to live to see the day when it will be adopted and carried out in the South, to the fullest possible extent. When that auspicious period arrives, there will be no danger from Northern encroachmeate or Northern aggressions. The North will be entirely occupied in taking care of its own business.

THE WAR TO BE ENDED.—The Nantnoketern have been favored with a glimpse of a warlike invention in the shape of a cannon, which, according to the sanguine owner, is at once to demolish any thing that faces its terrible power. If the Allies obtain it, down goes Sebastepol. If the Russians, the Allied cake is dongh. The Nantucket laquirer says:

"The oannon has been tried, and will throw a ball ten miles, a fact which insures greater accuracy in aim, and certainly unlimited execution at a distance of three or five miles. It will throw a shell as well as a solid ball; the latter, and probably both, will be of an oval, or pyramidal form. The brolher of the inventor is about to leave New York for Europe, with a model of the gun carrying a ball of six pounds, and fatends disposing of the invention to the Allies or the Russiaes, and he confidently anticipntes that the purchaser will preve victorious. Twenty-five small pieces, constructed on the same principle, have been sold to the Mexicen Government. Of ocurse, tha prinoiple upon which it works was not fully communicated, but our readers may rely on the verncity of the above stetement, as the gentleman is of the highest respectability."

THE "CHARMED" GIRL.—The New Hampshire Statesman intimates that this affair is an imposition, plenned hy the child's father tu make money. A correspondent at Gilmanton writes to it that, instead of there being n spontaneous and friendly feeling betweenthe child and the reptile, there was, he says, the utmost repugnnnce botwesn the two, at the time the father commenced his work. The neighbors of the father, Hill, are so well persuaded that the little girl had been compelled hy him to act the repulsive part assigned her, that they came near interfering, and by force obliging him to abandon his cruel fraud.

A CURIOSITY.—At the corner of Calaboosa alley and Chestnut street, St. Louis, may be seen a solid mass of iron, weighing 1,700 pounds, taken from Pilot-knob mountain, and which was intended to he forwarded to the World's Fair, held in London in 1852. It is of the purest ore, and although it has remained exposed to the elemonls for three years past, there is not a spot of rust upon its surfoce.

SOUTHERN RAILROADS.

It is loo late in the day now to introduce an argument as to the usefulness and efficacy of railroads. They have been tried in all civilized countries, under all circumstnnces and conditions, and there has been but one verdict as to their use and utility. Our Northern relatives, ever prompt and ready to avail themselves of any invention or instrumentality that will put money in their purses, increase their trade, benefit their commerce and give fresh value to property, early took hold of railroad enterprises, and have so steadily and zealously gone ahead that at present they have in their own hands the trade of all the Northern States east of the Mississippi and much of that of the Middle States. New England and New York are literally braided over with a netting of iron, while in the South comparatively nothing has been done—no general interest awakened—no great exertions put forth in a department where every exertion should be used, and on which not only the equnlity hut the existence of the South depends.

To show the comparative interest taken by Northern and Southern States in those valuable internal improvements oreatod by railroads, let the number of miles built and the amount of money expended in the Free States be compared with that in the States below Mason and Dixon's line up to the beginning of 1855. It sums up as follows: Massachusetts, 1,197 miles of road, constructed at a cost of $53,443,069; not completed lines of railroad, or in process of construction in New England, 438 miles; railroads in operation in the State of New York, 2,224 miles in length, built at a cost of $100,963,663; railroads in process of construction in the same State, at the sume time, 1,204 miles, at a probeble cost of $2,490,000; in New Jersey, 308 miles, costing $12,000,000; in Pennsylvania, 1,393 miles; in Delaware, 22 miles; in Maryland, 514 miles; in Virginia, 935 miles; in North and South Carolina, 927 miles; in Georgia, 1,054 miles; in Alabama, 222 miles; in Florida, 26 miles; in Mississippi, 67 miles; in Louisiana, 231 miles; in Kentucky, 190 miles; in Tennessee, 217 miles; in Ohio, 1,817 miles; in Indiana, 1,027 miles; in Illinois, 740 miles; in Michigan, 593 miles; in Wisconsin, 115 miles.

By this computation, taken from official returns up to the beginning of the present year, the total distance of running railroads in the United States amounts to 17,1461 miles, of which only 4,363 miles, or about one fourth, belonge to slaveholding States! The distances given above will not do for the present time, as many roads have been completed and more started, since those returns were published; but from that which was, our people may learn something as to what is, since it is every way probable that 10 miles of road have been built in the North to one in the South since that time.

Some convictions concerning the necessity of increased exertione in the way of railroad huilding and inter-communication seems to have reached the Southern mind within the last year or two, and influenced the putting forth of efforts hitherto unknown. Georgia has become emulous of New York, and Alabama of Georgia. Even Louisiann has started and brought out magnificent projects—has commenced two grant roads, on one of which about 60 miles has been laid and on the other 88 miles. There are schemes for railroads in Mississippi, in Arkansas, in Tennessee, and in almost every other slaveholding State, which, if carried into execution and made practical, would add so much to the wealth and prosperity of the country and so greatly enhance the incomes of the propertyholders as to astonish every one. Our own State, with its Jackson and Opelousas roads, is doing something towards following the wise example of other States, but Alabama and Mississippi are ahead of us by long lengths. They not only plan, but execute, and are carrying out so well concerted and complete a scheme of railway improvements as should put us to the blush. A late number of the Tuscaloosa (Ala.) Monitor contains a report concerning the Northeast and South-west Railroad, running from the Mobile and Ohio Railroad to Chattnnooga—a distance of 295 miles—and showing conclusively that the road will be built. The inhabitants of Mississippi and Arkansas are stirring. Why should not we, more deeply interested in railways than any others, come forward and work for our own prosperity, if not our own existence?—[Daily Crescent

MOSCOW, Russia, June 1855.

In my last letter I promised you an account of the Imperial Treasury at Moscow. It is contained in five ronms, through which we were escorted by no less than twolve servants, in addition to the director and his attendant. I cannot forbear mentioning the attention which we, as Americans, received, not only here, but throughout all Russia, from those in official capacity, and the bare mention of "Americanc," produced an open scsnne everywhere. In the Imperial Treasury are carefully preserved the platters and salt cellers upon and in which bread and salt are given to the Emperer on his arrival at Moscow; also a ginse, blown by Peter himself, with a ducat blown into the bottom of it. In one room are fifteen crowns, including those of the captured countries, Poland, Siberia, Arstrachan, Georgia and the Crimea. Peter the Great and his half brother, the foolish Ivan, who were crowned together, have each a crown of wonderful magnificence. They contain respectively 887 and 841 fine diamonds, besides some of the largest rubies and emeralds known. The Imperial crown contains more than 2500 fine diamonds, and the ruby under the cross, the largest one known in the world, alone cost 120,000 silver roubles. Peter II was the first monarch orowned with this, and Anne added the ruby bought by her ambassador at Pskin. The crown of Poland (so called) is here, but it is merely a crown, made at Warsaw, to be used in the funernl ceremonies at the burial of Alexander, in 1825. The sogptre of Poland is a single piece of aqua marine, two feet long, and by some strange fatality it was broken in the middle. There is also a throne here, which is studded with more than 2000 turquoises, and is covered with pure gold. The double throne of Peter the Great and his brother, Ivan, is of solid silver. A curtain hangs behind it, under the concealment of which their ambitious sister, Sophia, dictated their answers. Here are also two saddles of the Empress Cuthnrine, given her by the Sultan at the peace of 1735 and 1775. The first is all diamonds, the horse shoes silver, and the stirrups gold, (for she sat astride). One topaz, in the martingale, alone cost 10,000 rnhles. The two are a perfect mass of diamends, and altogether my eyes ached with magnificence.

The Shreveport Southwestern of the 18th has the following paragraphs:

Red River continues to decline, and it is now almost too low for steamboat navigation.

We understand that a quantity of cotton is now being hauled from Lake Bisteneau to this port, for the purpose of being shipped down the river.

The long continued dry weather has cut short the corn crop in this and the neighboring parishes. Four weeks ago the young corn appeared to be unusually promising, and it was confidently predicted that the yield would be unprecedented in this section of country; but now there remains no hope for even an ordinary crop. The cotton is also suffering greatly.

Building of flatboats has become quite a business of late at this port. A number, loaded with cotton, will leave during the week for Alexandria.

GONE SUMMERING.—As we were jogging down Charlroe street in an omnibus the other day, some outsider shouted, "Stop, steamboat!" in response to the shout, the omnibus stopped; the door was pulled open, and there were thrust in upon the sent, first, a handkerchief filled with old hooks; next, a roll of colored prints, portraying Russian military tactics; then, a comical-looking little spaniel, with long moostaches, a sore foot, and a red ribbon round its neck; after that, a hand-haskot containing an infinity of odds and ends, most prominent among which were an anoleat hair-knapsack, a black-handled sabre, the hindo wrapped in a rag, a dull baby in a state of nudity, a bundle of cigars, and sundry memorandum books, with pens, pencils, paper and other trifles too numerous to mention; and finally appeared, the owner of all the forogoing—no less a person than the Chevalier Dieudonne Bohy le Kerlenin—the Polish Count, Hungurian Colonel of Hussars, hero of the Canada Rebellion and the Seminole War—the elegant horseman, expert swordsman, mirnculous smoker, sublime spouter, and king of loafers—laughed at by the mob, pitied by the women, and loved by all the children and dogs in the Second District—the everlasting, always-moving Bohy, or Bo-bee, as he is called—who makes love to all the ladies, spouts Shakspeare and Kossuth in the bar-rooms, with snatches of operatic and histrionic ecstacies, and denounces things in six langnages—who has been the astonishment of strangers and the admiration of the natives for years past, vibrating between St. Louis and St. Philip streets as regular as the old Cathedral pendelum in its tower, or the old Wizard Guardian who haunts its shadows—the better part of whose being has forever fled, leaving behind it the brilliancies of a military education, and the spice of a life of advonture—this renowned Bohy, we say, entered and seated himself amid his baggage. He had on two hats, three coats, several vests, one pair of pants and a pair of slippers, and his bosom was stuffed full of French newspapers, which kept falling out, as often as he would stuff them back. His coat pockets also pouched out as if ready to burst, with mysterious parcels of some kind or other.

"Go ahead, steamboat!" he shented, gathering his plunder up in him on one side, and his dog on the other; at the same time restoring to its concealment beneath his oriental moustache, an uelit cigar-stnmp an inch long.

"Take that dog off that satol" shouted John, looking through the hole, "and pay yer fare now!"

Boby tried to stuff the dog into his besom with his papers, hut couldn't; so, when he handed up his dime, he edded an extra half-dime, saying, "Take that and drink my long life!" The driver then discovered that his passenger was Boby, and with the kindness which the world ever uecords to eccentric characters, objected no more to his dog lying on the seat. Seeing that a lady in the omnibus got as far from him as possible, with an uneasy countenance—for ladies don't generally fall in love with Boby at first sight—he took off his hats, laid his head on the bundle of papers over his heart, rolled up his eyes and begged her pardon, in thet muto and killing manner which has osused so many of the down-town ladies to pity him from their hearts. The lady, we observed, was quite composed during the rest of the trip. Boby informed us that, in pursuance of his annual custom, he was going over to Mandeville for a little summer relaxation, and entertained us with the spice of his eccentricity until we reached Esplanade street. "Stop steamboat!" he sheuted; the boat stopped; and we helped him out with his plnndor. He presented a most ludicrous appearance, as he marched down to the depot with his multiplicity of hats, parcels, and his little dog limping after him. It is to be presnmed that Boby's arrival each year creates a sensation nmong the Mandevillians.

Boby's oddities, and the funny stories that are told of him would fill a book. We will devote just a little space to give some idea of him. Once upon a time he was arrested and taken before the Recorder on a charge of steeling a lady's mantilla. The article was produced in evidnce against him. It was wofully crumpled up; for Boby had been sleeping with it beneath his pillow. When asked what he had to say in answer to the charge, he denied having stolen the mentilla, but admitted that he had taken it from the lady's house.

"What indaced you to take it, Boby?" asked the Recorder.

"Your honor," he replied, crossing his hends on his breast and rolling up his eyes with an enthusiastic smile, "I love that lady—I ADORE that lady! I love everything that belongs to that lady! And as I could not get the lady herself, I took her mantilla!" The spectators "went off" incontinently at this, and the lady's looks seemed to indicate that she would have given forty mantilles, more or less, to be away from there.

"Well, Boby," said the Recorder, "the act was still dishonest, and I shall have to send you to prison for twenty-four hours."

Boby responded with redoubled enthusiasm, "Twenty-four hours! Your honor, I will go to prison forty-eight hours for that lady!—a week—a MONTH for that lady!" As he was led out of court, he smiled and pantomimed the most agonizing love to the almost fainting lady. Whether Boby ever bothered her afterwards we have not learned; but it is quite certain that the lady has not bothered him since.

A week or two since, Boby was imprisoned for twenty-four hours by Recorder Ramos for spouting and ranting in front of his office so loudly as to impede the flow of justice. When Boby got out, maybe he didn't talk some! His harangues on American liberty and the freedom of speech resounded through that neighborhood with an intensity compared with which his first offeece was a child's whisper. He exhausted the Polish, German, French and English languages on the subject, and the Recorder concluded to "let him rip." In like manner he denounced the chain which Judge Cotton had stretched across St. Peter street. Sarcasm shines in Boby at times. It is still his delight to style a certain ex-judge of the First District Court, not the Judge of the Criminal Court, but the Criminal Judge of the Court!

Altogether, though Boby is considered a nuisance by some, we consider him a pleasant study for a leisuro hour, and hope he may live long to astonish the strangers and tickle the children down town.

CROPS IN THE INTERIOR.—We have seen within the last few days, letters from intelligent planters in various portions of Middle and Southern Alabama and the corresponding region of Mississippi, in which it is stated that the late rains have done, and are doing very serious injury to the growing crops of cotton. The cotton plant, is just now in the condition most subject to suffer from the effect of unfavorable weather.—[Mobile Register.

TENACIOUS.—"Does your razor take hold well?" inquired an agonized sufferer of the tonsorial operator. "Yes," was the consoling reply, "it takes hold first rate, but it don't let go worth a cent."

LOCAL SKETCHES.

AN OLD PIONEER.—Israel Donaldson, now 90 years of nge, paid a visit to Hillsboro', Ohio, a few dnys ago, to see some friends. It is stated that he walks about actively, converses with animation, and reads without glasses. He emigrated from New Jersey 67 years ago to Ohio, when it was a wilderness, and was subsequently taken prisoner by the Indians while on a surveying expedition with Gene. Massie and Lytle, the two latter making their escape on foot. The Hillsboro' Citizen says:

Donaldson suffered all the horrors incident to this species of savage life, and finally, one night, whilst lying tied between two Indians, each of whom was up one ont of the rope, he managed to release himself without awaking them, and escaped to a small prairie near by and concealed himself in the grass, as it was just daybreak when he found himself free. The Indians almost immediately discovered their loss, and with loud yells, commenced the pursuit on the back track. Donaldson remained concealed in the grass till they all got out of sight, and then struck in a different direction, towards the Ohio river. He spent several miserable days and nights in the woods, but finally, just as hope had almost abandoned him, he heard the sweet music of a chopping axe, which he soon discovered to be that of a settler at Fort Washington, now Cincinnati. He was carried to the huts and kindly ministered to, until he recovered his wasted strength and found his wounds and bruises healed, when he returned to his former residence, greatly to the surprise and joy of his friends.

SINGULAR PHENOMENON ON THE RIVER.—The officers and others on the Mouphis packet Tishomingo, on her trip on the Ohio Thursday evening, saw a singular and frightful upheaving of the river or hinok water-spout just ahead of them, near Alton or Wolf Creek. The river, which is very deep at that point, was in great commotion just about the middle of the river, and a dense mass rose from the surface, having the appearance at first of a couple of coal boats suspended in the river and sunk down again. This great black mass, as it appeared to be, rose from ten to twenty feet above the level of the river four or five times, and then sunk down again. In the meantime the boat was approaching near the scene, and the last time, covering a space of, thirty or forty feet, it rose or belched forth a huge volume of black slime and froth, fully fifteen feet high, all of which were seen by the officers of the boat. As soon as it subsided the river was covered with great patches of black looking slime and filth, which spread widely over the surface of the water, in some instances, while other portions sunk immediately. The weather was clear and calm. No emotion, jar or shaking was felt on board the boat, and nothing unusual perceived on the shore. The cause of this black spout or water quake, we leave to philosophers to explain.—[Lou. Courier.

EAST INDIA SQUADRON.—Advices have been received at the Navy Department from Commodore Joel Abbot, who commands this squadron, to the 2d of May, when the Macedonian, his flag-ship, was at Shanghai. She left Hong-Kong on the 9th of April, reaching Shanghai in fourteen days, beating the fast-sailing Amerioan clipper-ship "Mandarin," although the latter had three days the start. The United States steam-frigate Powhatan, Captain McCluney, was at Shanghai at the same date; bound in a short time to Hong-Kong, touching at Amoy on her passage thither. The Vandalia, Commander Pope, had been ordered to proceed to Guam, one of the Ladrone islands, to make a rigid investigation into the truth of certain allegations of oppressive treatment by the governor of Guam towards a portion of the passengers and crew belonging to the American bark "Sarah Moore," wrecked on Massa island.

Official information has been received of the death of William Whiting, boatswain of the Powhatan. He was killed by the accidental discharge of a musket in the hands of one of the marine guard of the ship, on an expedition to Woosung after some deserters on the morning of the 1st of April. Captain McClunny speaks of Boatswain Whiting's death as a serious loss to his ship and the service, being one of the best officers of his grade in the navy. He was buried at Shanghai with sultable military honors.—[Wash. Union.

DANTE A BUNGLER.—At Mr. Roinilly's there arose a discussion on the Inferno of Dante, and the tortures he had invented. "He may be a great poet," said my father, "but as to invention, I consider him a mere bungler—no imagination, no knowledge of the human heart. If I had taken it in hand, I would show you what torture really was, for instnnce (turning merrily, to his old friend, Mrs. Marcet) you should be doomed to listen, for a thousand years, to conversations between Caroline and Emily, where Caroline should always give wrong explanations in chemistry, and Emily, in the end, be unable to distinguish an acid from an alkali: Yon, Macaulay—let me consider—oh, you should be dumb. False dates and facts in the reign of Queen Anne should for ever be shouted in your ears; all honest opinions should be ridiculed in your presence; and you should not be able to say a single word during that period in their defense." "And what would you condemn me to, Mr. Sidney?" said a young mother. "Why, you should for ever see those sweet girls of yours on the point of falling down stairs, and never be able to save them. There, what tortures are there in Dante equal to these?"

EPISCOPAL COMPLAISANCE.—Queen Elizabeth being once tormented with the toothache, and yet afraid of having the tooth drawn, Bishop Aylmer being present, to encourage her Majesty, sat down in a chair and called to the operator, "Come," said he, "though I am an old man, and have but few teeth to spare, draw me this;" which was done, and the queen, seeing him make so light a matter of it sat down and had hers drawn also.

M. BONAPARTE HAS TAKEN KERTCH!—The Paris correspondent of Le Progres is epigrammatic on "Monsieur Bonnparte." It says, speaking of the Crimean Vandalism: "Thore were, in the Crimea, two cities, a seat of war and a seat of art, Sobastopol and Kertch. The one terrible and ready for combat, the other charming and open to hospitality. At Sebastopol ten thousand pieces of cannon, a fleet, and a heroic garrison; at Kertch a port crowded with merchantmen, elegant promenades, an old temple of Esculapius—women and children. M. Bonnparte has taken Kertch."

COAL MINES.—We have just been informed, says the El Dorado (Ark.) Union, by a gentleman who attended a fish-fry near Champagnolle on Thursday last, that as a party of ladies and gentlemen were descending the river in a pleasure boat, to attend the fish-fry, they accidentally picked up a piece of coal from the bed of the river, and upon examination it was ascertained that the whole bed of the river was nothing but a solid mass of coal; after the coal had been out of the water sometime, it was placed in the fire, and it burnt equal to any he had ever seen. The gentleman who informed us, thinks there can be no doubt of its being the genuine article, and is inexhanstible as to quantity.

ABSENCE OF MIND.—The Niagara Falls Gazette says that one day last week, as the night express train from Rochester arrived at that place, the brakemnn, discovered a child about two years old lying asleep on one of the seats. The child was taken oare of by the conductor, Capt. Bromley, until the father arrived from Suspension Bridge. It appenred that the father of the child, when the train arrived at the bridge, forgot his child, and also his hat, so great was his hurry to get off. When he discovered his loss his grief knew no bounds; but whether his grief was for the loss of his hat or his child is not related.

FOR THE GOLD REGIONS!—Judging from the bustle and preparation which characterized our streets on yesterday, one would suppose that the gold fever was raging to some extent in this community. A party of gentlemen, including some of our oldest and best citizens, have formed a company and are about to proceed to the head waters of the Arkansas, to seach for gold.—Vicksburg Sentinel 20th.

CITY IMPROVEMENTS.—We never saw building operations progressing more energetically in New Orleans than at present. Though the levee is nearly deserted, the commercial resorts dull and sleepy, and our entire floating population dispersed throughout the country—creating the feeling with many that the city is in a state of general stagnation—the mason's trowel rings a merry tune, with a saw and jack-plane chorus, to every quarter of the city. In our daily rambles we encounter many beautiful structures, public and private, in different stages of creation; a complete catalogue of which it would be out of our power to give.

Already the Verandah ruins begin to look mathematical; though it is said to think that the famous old hotel will never be rebuilt. Six sumptuous stores—five on St. Charles and one on Common street—are arising upstead. When they are complete and in operation, however, we suppose the stately Verandah will soon be forgotten. We hope, in view of the increased patronage, which must in reason flow to the St. Charles in the absence of its rival, that it will put on the cupola which gave its predecessor such a fashionable air, and, at least if the street must be hopelessly changed, restore to the city its ancient appearance at a distance.

Splendid stores are rising on the two corners of St. Charles and Hragler streets which were destroyed by fire a few months since. We notice a very beautiful building just completed on State-house square, at the corner of Dryades and Canal streets, and the foundation of another is being laid on the opposite corner.

A handsome block of stores, rapidly nearing completion, occupies the site of the old synagogue, on Canal street. That will be a great square for the ladies when those stores are complete and thrown open to the public.

That one of the Medical College buildings, on State-house square, next to Baronne street, has put on a clean shirt of white sance, and exhibits the neighborhood considerably. If the Mechanics' Institute—still in ruins on the Dryades street side of the square—could be rebuilt, that square would be the grandest in the city. We could, if we had the time, enumerate many beautiful stores and private residences that are rising in the different quarters of the city.

The church of the Christian Brothers on Barcons street—which promises to make a great show when complete—is being thickened at slowly. It seems to be running a slow race with the Custom-house.

The ruins of Dr. Scott's church and of the old American Theater still glower at each other across Lafayette Square as they did in life. We know not what is contemplated in respect to them.

A great many people are always croaking that New Orleans is "going down," but in the very season which might be supposed most appropriate for that "going down," the city goes up more and more every year.

THE SMELSER MURDER.—We were mistaken in stating that the Coroner took no notes of the testimony in the investigation of the death of Mr. Lori Smelser. He did take notes, and from them we compile the following elucidation of the poisoning mystery:

Mr. Smelser married, about three years since, the woman who had been housekeeper under his first wife. He provided for her liberally, and the only cause of unhappiness known to have existed between them, was his contributing to the support of his two sisters in Pennsylvania, against which she continually remonstrated, by this leading to occasional quarrels.

About nine months ago, Smelser took into his employ Adam Scott, a young man of about twenty-two, whom he had long known and esteemed, and who was at that time a clerk in the dry-goods store of Huntsbuyen & Co., on Magazine street. At his own request, Scott was taken as an apprentice to learn Smelser's business, of tin and copper smithing. He was a superb accountant, and in a short time became entrusted with nearly all the clerical business of the concern. At the same time, he boarded with Smelser at his residence on Josephine street; where he had not been long before an unholy flame sprang up between Mrs. Smelser and himself. Their amours soon became apparent to the neighbors, and to other persons in Smelser's employ; amours of such a nature as to leave no doubt of Mr. Smelser's complete dishonor.

At last, as is inferred, Smelser became aware of his dishonor; for he removed Scott from his situation as cash deutbl clerk, and sent him out, under Mr. Haller, one of his workmen, to assist in roofing the Medical lodings, with instructions to Haller to keep him busily at work. Scott smarting under what he considered a disgrace, said to Haller—"I will not quit, but I will have satisfaction. I know how I stand. Mrs Smelser would rather part with her husband than me"—or words to that effect. Haller also boarded with his employer; and one day overheard Scott say to Mrs S.: "The only way to get rid of him is to give a dose of arsenic." Mrs S replied, "I will have nothing to do with it; you may do as you please about it." To which Scott rejoined, "I will give him a dose." On another occasion Scott told Haller that he had torn up a certain paper which would have left Mrs Smelser penniless; he having broken into a chest for the purpose. This paper was Mr. Smelser's will disinheriting his wife and dictated by him after the discovery of his dishonor.

Some time previous to Mr. Smelser's death, Scott went to the drug stores of Messrs. G. N. Morrison & Co., on Magazine street, and purchased a quarter of a pound of arsenic, representing that he wanted it to use in preserving the skins of some fowls. Mr. Reeves, the principal clerk judged from his appearance, that he might belong to the museum, and so ordered Mr. Lagrange, another clerk, to let him have it. The paper of arsenic given up by the slave woman Kitty, to Mr. Morehouse, was identified by Mr. L. as the one put up by him, and about an ounce of it had been used or taken away.

On the evening of Sunday, the 27th of May, Dr. Batchelor, the family physician, was sent for. He found Smelser vomiting violently, and supposed it was in consequence of eating some nuts. He had previously been troubled in his bowels with something like the painter's colic, which was attributed to the use of water from a cistern lined with lead. He prescribed for the vomiting, and solicited his patient to send for him should his bowels become worse, and left—Scott took the prescription to Mr. Hastings, the druggist, on Magazine street, got the medicine and left.

Between 12 and 1 o'clock that night, Scott went to Dr. Hasting's store and purchased six ounces of chloroform, which he directed to be charged to Smelser, as it was intended for him. A short time afterward, Scott called on Dr. Batchelor, and told him that Smelser was very ill and about to die. He left hurriedly; and before the Doctor had got left his house, he returned and told him that he need not mind coming, as Smelser was dead.—The Doctor went around anyhow—being much astonished at the news. He found his patient dead, with a sheet over his face; asked Mrs. Smelser, who was lying quietly on a sofa, how her husband had died, whether he suffered much pain; to which she replied, that he had not suffered much; that he had merely remarked he was going to die, and after two or three spasms, expired. The Doctor, in his astonishment, thought of opening the body, not, however, from any suspicion of foul play—but was deterred from it out of respect to the widow's feelings. He was much surprised upon discovering that Scott had purchased chloroform; as he had never prescribed any such thing. He left a certificate that Smelser died of convulsions; the body was buried; and Scott continued to reside with the widow, and undertook, or was about to undertake, the settlement of the estate. Charles White, another workman in Smelser's establishment, testified that Scott told him that if Smelser's body were opened, arsenic would be found; but that he had taken it himself; he having purchased it at his request, in a store on Canal street; also that if Smelser was poisoned, his wife was poisoned too.

A month and a half after Mr. Smelser's death, his slave woman Kitty astonished Mr. Morehouse, in the Fourth District, coming to his house and telling him that her master had been poisoned, and that she had just escaped from a several days' captivity, she having been kept in the house hand-cuffed. In the fear that she would go abroad and make mischief. She handed him a paper containing the residue of the arsenic, and gave a circumstantial narration of the poisoning and death of the late master; stated that Scott had bribed her to secrecy in relarance to his amours with Mrs Smelser; that Scott and Mrs Smelser both promised that if she would be silent about her master's death, they would set her free; they could not smuggle her here, they said, but they would get her a pass to Kentucky, whence she might escape to a free State. Such a pass was procured of Mr. Graham, the notary public. Kitty however, had reason to suspect that she was being deceived; that her mistress had made out a bill of sale transferring her to Scott, and that he was making preparations to ship her off to Texas for sale; one indication of which was, his putting her in irons. Such a bill of sale was made out by Mr. Marshall, of the Fourth District. A great part of Kitty's story was corroborated by legitimate witnesses and circumstantial evidence. Her account of the poisoning, of which there is no legal confirmation, exculpates her mistress; it was, that Scott put some of the arsenic into a pitcher of water, and told her to take it up stairs; that she was prevented doing so by her master coming down and taking the pitcher up himself; that he drank a glass of the water and gave his wife a glass, after which they were both seized with a violent sickness and vomiting; that Scott gave Mrs. S. some antidote, and went for Dr Batchelor; and that when he brought the pills which the Doctor had prescribed, he threw them away, and gave Mr. Smelser instead some pills which he himself made out of a white powdery substance, that he af

"Will be all the Same in a Hundred Years."

Will be all the same in a hundred years!
What a spell-word to conjure up smiles and tears!
O, how oft do I muse, 'mid the thoughtless and gay,
On the marvelous truth that these words convey!
Must it be so? Must the valiant and free,
Have their measure of life on this frail decree?
And the temples they've reared and the glories they've wrought,
Only emblems of frail work, confronting the sun,
And must all that is joyous and brilliant to view
Be a midsummer dream, to be perishing too?
Then have pity, ye proud ones—be gentle, ye great,
O remember how many beneath your feet
Are the victims of time-month the sword of the brave
Is eating the chain of the enslaved slave,
And the conqueror's frowns and his victim's sighs
Will be all the same in a hundred years!

Will be all the same in a hundred years!
O most mystical fountain of smiles and tears!
To think that our hopes, like the flowers of June,
Which are here so much, should be lost so soon!
That what wakeneth the sense after phantom joys?
Or to feed, like all human hearts, to toys?
Or the ... of ... ?
Or the closing of ends that we never can open?
Or the deadly aversion of man for man?
What availeth it all? O, ye sages say—
Or the miser's joy in his brilliant clay?
Or the lover's zeal for his matchless prize—
The love-meeting mouth with the starry eyes?
Or the feverish conflict of hopes and fears,
If 'tis all the same in a hundred years!

Ah! 'tis not the same in a hundred years,
Nor clear heaven the cares oppress;
For know ye not that beyond the grave,
Where the wicked cease from wrong and crave
On the Syrian mountains, or where the stars
Come glittering forth in their golden cars,
Where blossoms a land of perennial bliss,
Where ere smile to think of the tears in this?
And the pilgrim reaching that radiant shore,
Has the thought of death in his heart no more,
Or hopeth his step and mien to adorn,
For the victim's pallor, and the mourner's scorn.
And the mother meets, in that tranquil sphere,
The delightful child she has wept for here;
And the warrior's sword that protects the right
Is bejewelled with stars of undying light;
And we quaff of the same immortal cup,
While the orphan smiles, and the slave looks up
To be free, my brother, and forget the years
For 'tis not the same in a hundred years!

By the arrival, Saturday morning, of the steamship Nautilus, Capt. Lawless, we have dates from Galveston to the 26th, and files of papers from interior Texas.

Heavy rains have fallen recently about Galveston, and the News expresses the fear that they have extended into the interior and damaged the crops.

The Columbia Democrat says:

During the past week we have had more rain than during the previous weeks. Some apprehensions are felt lest the rains may be injurious to the cotton crop. If, however, they should be less abundant from this out, but little apprehension need be felt. Many of our planters are beginning to pick out, and others will so in next week.

From nearly all sections of the State we have advices of good crops. Considering the backwardness of the Spring and little rain that has fallen, there probably never was a better year for farmers. In our own county, the yield is, as we have before remarked, larger than it ever has been. The corn on the flat side of the river looks remarkably well, the rains which fell some two or three weeks ago having proved very serviceable, whilst that on the west side is not so good, but a fair yield will be made. [Dallas Herald.

The prospects continue to improve, and planters inform us that although the picking season in several weeks later than usual, the prospect was never better for a full crop. In a great many fields from five to twelve bolls have opened on a stalk throughout the field. [Houston Telegraph.

We are informed, by a gentleman, who has just returned from a visit to the upper Trinity country, that the corn crops on the west side of the river are rather inferior, but on the east side they are very good. The wheat crop is a fair one, and is now being rapidly ground into flour, which is selling at the mill for six dollars per hundred pounds.—[Brenham Inquirer.

The Palestine Advocate says a difficulty occurred on the 7th inst. on Hall's Bluff, on the Trinity river, between a ... named John Knorp and E. B. Wallace—both living at or near the Bluff. The difficulty originated about some pigs belonging to Knorp getting into the field of Wallace. They met at the Bluff, and after a few words being exchanged between them, they walked off together out of sight of any one, and after search was made for them, the body of Knorp was found, with the skull and breast bone broken in, as if with a large bludgeon. Wallace could nowhere be found. Knorp was somewhat intoxicated at the time of the fatal occurrence.

The Austin State Times gives a long account of the Indian depredations on the frontier. It says Maj. Neighbors entertains the opinion that the Indians on the Reservation could be made available in detecting and capturing the marauding bands which attack the frontier settlers. There are now 249 Comanches on the Reservation. They are never left without men to look after them, and they are under regulations which allow them little opportunity to steal. The Times says:

Maj. Neighbors will offer every facility to aid in punishing a party of Indians who have made forays upon the settlements. He will furnish guides and information. It is shrewdly suspected there are others besides Indians engaged in the late murders and thefts.

There are a number of German traders among the Comanches, from whom stolen horses have been taken. They supply the Indians with powder and lead, and cause a great deal of trouble.

The U. S. mail steamship Crescent City, J. McGowan commander, left New York July 17th, at 3 o'clock P. M.; arrived at Havana, July 23d, at 6:35 P. M., and sailed for New Orleans July 24th, at 9½ A. M. Left at Havana American sloops-of-war Cyane and Falmouth, and English men-of-war Enrydice and Arab. The clipper ship Sky Lark arrived with 650 Coolies. July 25th, at 2 P. M., lat. 26:18, lon 85:26, passed bark Fernandina beating to the S. E. July 26th, at 5 A. M., passed ship Oliver Putnam, from Boston for New Orleans; also, steamer Black Warrior hence for New York; arrived at the bar at 8:45 P. M. A list of her passengers and consignees will be found in their proper place.

We have received by this arrival files of Havana papers to Tuesday last, but they contain no news.

We have also received files of the Panama Star and Herald to the 14th, but they say nothing of the defeat of the Walker expedition; the news probably not having reached that point.

The dates from San Francisco by this arrival, are to the 1st inst.

The Democratic State Convention was in session at Sacramento when the steamer sailed. Bigler had received the nomination for Governor, and 22 delegates had withdrawn from the Convention in consequence. Mr. Chas. Bryan, of Yuba, had received the nomination for Judge of the Supreme Court for the short term, and Mr. Myron Norton, of Los Angeles, for the long term.

The U. S. District Court in San Francisco, has declared the decision in the Tremont case applicable to all grants made under the colonization laws. A motion by the U. S. District Attorney to modify the decree, so as to locate the claim upon vacant lands, and in no body, was denied.

Suit had been brought against A. A. Ooben, Receiver of the firm of Adams & Co., on a charge of incorrectness in his accounts, and frauds to the amount of $126,000.

A ship load of railroad cars, locomotives, etc., arrived at Francisco on the 20th ult. June, for the Sacramento Valley Railroad.

The reported massacre by the Indians on the Klamath river is contradicted.

A tax collector in Mariposa county recently shot three Chinamen who resisted him in the discharge of his duty.

Large quantities of gold have been discovered in the immediate vicinity of Sacramento city.

Yankee Sullivan had a difficulty in San Francisco with a fellow named Mulligan. They adjourned to a room for the purpose of fighting it out, when soma one knocked Sullivan down with a weapon and Mulligan fell upon him, beating, kicking and biting him in a shocking manner. Sullivan was confined to his bed by his injuries.

The Herald informs us that a detachment of U. S. troops numbering 183 privates and officers had sailed from that city for Puget's Sound on the way to Fort Steilacoom, Washington Territory.

A bold murder was committed recently in El Dorado county, three miles from Georgetown. Five men, while sleeping in a ... cabin, were fired upon just before daylight, and one of the number, Wm. Coppers, was instantly killed. Two others were wounded. The perpetrators of this deed were supposed to be Indians.

The Humboldt Times, of the 23d ult., has the following:

The Indians in this vicinity report that four white men were killed at or near the upper crossing of Mad River, on the trail from Bucksport to Weaverville, and that their cattle (eight head) are ...nuning loose in that vicinity. Several squaws of different tribes tell the same story, and a partial credence is given to it, from the fact that Mr. Hull and three other men, with that number of cattle, left Eureka some four weeks ago, and have not since been heard from. The soldiers at the barracks instead of being sent out to hunt up Indians, if for nothing else than to preserve them, are kept at the barracks doing nothing, unless it be to cater to the appetites. For any benefit they are to the people, in protecting their lives and property, they might as well be in Kamschatka.

It will be remembered, simultaneously with the receipt of news of an Indian outbreak on the Klamath river, we had accounts of Indian disturbances in Illinois Valley, just on the borders of Oregon. In reference to these the Crescent City Herald says:

Up to the time of our last date, the Indian difficulties in that section had progressed in an alarming extent. Volunteer companies were in search of the Indians, who had left the Reservation on Rogue river. Judge Peters, Mr. Roseborough, and others on their way to this city, were indeed to secure a ... ville. Mr. T. A. Jackson came through accompanied by a guard a short distance of the route, and two days after his arrival a letter was received, written by Mr. Shondy, and dated Applegate, June 10th, from which, by permission, we make the following extract:

"Yesterday Mr. Jackson and Mr. J. Dyer and Mr. D. Mellnes to guard him to ... Mooney's Ranch. On returning home they were ... by the Indians and both killed, one having received seven balls and the other ten through the body in various places. Some soldiers who passed along this morning found the bodies and buried them. This of course causes considerable excitement, and families are obliged to move to places of safety. Travel has for the moment almost ceased, and there is but little doing in the diggings here at Jacksonville. It has rained all this afternoon, and two or three trains have just come through without experiencing any trouble."

These statements are fully corroborated by Mr. Cornwall, the Ethiopenician, who came in a few days after.

MASSACRE OF THE DIEGAN.—Lewis J. F. Jaeger, Esq., furnishes the San Diego Herald with the following particulars of a cold-blooded murder committed on the Desert, some twenty miles westward of Jaeger's ferry, during the night of the 1st of June. About 2 o'clock on the morning of the 2d, a party of three Americans and two half breed Cherokees awoke Mr. J., and demanded to be ferried across the river in a hurry, the which he declined doing, and they passed on. About two hours afterwards, a Mexican by the name of Tunigo galloped up to Jaeger's, and informed him that while he and his brother were journeying from Los Angeles, of which place they had been residents, they were overtaken at Vallecitos by the five men alluded to; and that they traveled in company together till that night at 10 o'clock, when one of the Americans, without provocation or previous intimation, deliberately drew his pistol and shot the brother in the back, from the effects of which he expired in fifteen minutes. The three Americans were severally named "Bill," "Pete" and "John." It seems that upon being refused ferriage, they proceeded upthe river bottom and concealed themselves for five days, when they swam the river and went over into Sonora. From the person of the murdered man the murderers took some five hundred dollars in Mexican silver, which leaves no doubt that cupidity was the incentive to the foul deed.

MORE GOLD EXCITEMENT.—Mr. Francis Debar, says the San Diego Herald, who has just arrived from San Bernardino, says that quite an excitement has been prevailing among the Mormon brethren, from discoveries lately made of gold deposits in the San Bernardino mountains. Several parties of the fullest were out prospecting, so we may hear more of the bubble in a few days.

WHALING ALONG SHORE.—A crew of Portuguese whalers, says the Monterey Sentinel, captured on the 16th inst., a calf whale. In fighting with ... the same day, one of the men had a leg broken and one of the boats was stove in. We always maintained the opinion, that Monterey is one of the best points in the Pacific for establishing a whaling depot, and for the manufacture of the oil and the various products of the animal. Shore bay is open, safe and deep; well protected from storm, and easy of entrance with all winds. Supplies and provisions can now be laid in at very moderate rates—water and wood are both to be had at reasonable charges. Besides the whale of different species found in the vicinity of our coast, the sea Hog, elephant, seal, fur otter and several other valuable animals of marine hunting, are common. What it now wants with us capitalists and men used to the business, who are only to be had in New Bedford and Nantucket.

From Oregon.

NEW GOLD DISCOVERIES—Burning of a Steamer.—Files of papers have been received at San Francisco from Portland to June 23, and from Crescent City to June 27.

The Standard in its issue of June 21st, announced that there were rumors to the effect that gold in considerable quantities had been found up the Columbia river in the region of Fort Colville, situated in latitude 48° 16 north and longitude 118° west, about two hundred miles in a direct line from the Dalles of the Columbia.

The Standard has the following paragraphs:

Mining operations in southern Oregon are almost entirely suspended for the want of sufficient water. It is said there has been less rain during the last winter and spring than ever before.

We hear good reports of the crops throughout the Territory. The late warm and fine weather has added much to their appearance. Grass this year never more luxuriant, and the wheat and oat crop will be abundant.

RATTLESNAKES.—These venomous reptiles are found in great numbers in southern Oregon. We were told that three men recently went to the mountains where dens of these snakes were known to exist in large numbers, and killed seven hundred. In our recent tour through the southern portion of the Territory, we killed five, which we found in the road while riding along. We saw several others which had been killed by persons who had preceded us.

The steamship America left San Francisco on the 21st of June for Puget's Sound, and on the afternoon of the 24th came to anchor at Crescent City. Shortly afterwards smoke was seen issuing from her hold, and in a few hours, despite the exertions of her crew and the citizens of the town, she was entirely destroyed by fire. Much of her cargo was saved by means of lighters, and no lives were lost.

FROM BRAZIL.—Dates have been received from Brazil to the 5th of June. They bring the important intelligence that the imperial government has refused to ratify the terms of the convention recently entered into between their chief ... squadron, Oliviera, and the Paraguayan ... Oliviera is superseded in command, and ... is summoned to court to render an account of his stewardship. The probabilities, therefore, are ... the hostile demonstrations of the Brazilian fleet will be renewed on the Paraguayan territory. The policy of Brazil tends to the acquisition of territory, and it is not unlikely that the renewal of hostilities will end in the absorption of Paraguay.

[From the N. Y. Evening Post.]

SHIPWRECK OF THE KINNEY EXPEDITION.

GRAND TURK, TURK'S ISLAND, W. I., June 27, 1855.—It was three weeks ago yesterday evening, when Col. Kinney, with eighteen other passengers, set sail in the Emma, a fast sailing schooner of about one hundred and thirty tons, under command of Captain B. L. Norris, from New York for Kingston, Jamaica, and for San Juan de Nicaragua.

Our companions on the voyage were mostly young, unmarried men, mechanics and merchants, with a sprinkling of western frontiersmen, who had been more inured than the rest to the hardships of out-of-door life. Altogether they were a very fair collection of emigrants, and not at all likely to bring discredit upon the Colonel's enterprise. I presume, however, that you will be more anxious to know the events of our voyage and causes of our being brought to the harbor of Grand Turk, than to have a description of our passengers, and therefore postpone it to another time.

We left New York with a south-east wind, which continued, with rather rough weather, till the 14th inst., when we were off Bermuda. The wind then hauled to E. S. E., being the winds of the "Horse Latitudes," (so called from the necessity, to which sailors of the islands thereabouts are frequently exposed, of throwing their cargoes of horses overboard,) blowing in that direction till the 19th, when at two o'clock P. M., we saw land ahead, bearing south-westerly, which proved to be the north part of the Cayoos Islands, a group of three, forming the east side of Turk's Island Passage.

Through this passage, which is considered by navigators a very safe one, the captain should have run his vessel, but in consequence of losing his reckoning, he took another direction, steering westerly before the wind down the island towards the Cayoos Passage, which is...lized for forty or fifty miles with dangerous reefs, extending a long distance from shore. At 4 o'clock, P. M. we were startled by a shout of "breakers ahead!" and sure enough, on looking over the bows, we found ourselves within a half cable's length of the breakers of St. Philip's Reef, and sailing at the rate of six knots an hour directly upon it. The captain was in the cabin writing down the observations which the mate was taking with his quadrant, and the breakers which we were, with the green shallow waters revealing the coral rocks beneath and the breakers whitening and roaring almost under our bows. But a short distance ahead lay an anchor, probably left by some wrecked vessel, protruding from the foaming waves upon the reef. Fortunately, however, by the exertions of the passengers under command of Capt. Swift, we were saved from running aground, but the vessel made a most narrow escape.

Heartily thankful for the rescue, we once more steered off down the coast, the sky being clear, the weather fine and the blue hills of Cayoos in full sight. There was, nevertheless, a general feeling of uneasiness among the passengers until about a quarter before eleven o'clock, when we were roused from our berths by a tremendous jolting and cranching against the keel that told the whole story. It was a moment of intense excitement.

We had struck the same reef on which the vessel had run in the afternoon, some forty miles to the westward, and with sails all spread, were going right ahead on the crest of the reefs. In vain the captain shouted "hard up the wheel," and gave orders to haul in the main tack. It was too late. The crew and passengers tugged and pushed off the main boom with the energy of desperation, but the schooner still went on jumping and thumping over the hard reef in a manner that left no other resource than to haul down the sails, which was done almost instantly.

Amidst all, the Colonel preserved his self-composure; and proceeded at once to secure a supply of provisions for the boat. Some came to him with proposals, to sail in search of land, and to return with a report of their success. "No," said the Colonel, "There is not the least danger of the ship's going to pieces before morning; the tide is ebbing and the land is not far off. The first man who attempts to escape by the boats shall be shot." This explicit declaration put a stop to any further agitation of the project, though there were quite a number who still thought that there time for this world was up. In truth, there seemed some reason to fear, as every lurch of the vessel grated along the keel, and shook her timbers from stem to stern. The hold also began to hilge, and as the schooner careened, her mainmast strained as if it would go over.

About four o'clock a faint light illuminated the horizon, and all hands gathered upon the windward side to watch the signs of land. The ugly grating and thumping still continued among the coral reaks, which were plainly visible at a depth of three or four feet under the bows. The vessel now lay upon her side, and it was clear that nothing could get her off the reef until her cargo should be carried ashore. The life-boat was accordingly lowered with a view of ascertaining the nearest place of landing, and the mate and three sailors who were in it tugged at the oars, using their best efforts to row her over the breakers into the smooth water which lay a few rods beyond, and at last pronounced the attempt out of the question.

The Colonel then stepped in and declared they must try again; and again they were baffled. But he was not to be put off in this manner. Standing at the bows, towering a head above us all, and with the energy of an old Roman written on his weather beaten visage, he threw off his coat, and letting himself down by a rope into the dashing waves, which nearly reached his breast, he waded out to the boat, and fairly pushed it over the breakers into a safe harbor, whence it carried a store of provisions to the shore about three miles off. The Colonel then ordered timbers to be thrown overboard, and with the aid of Captain Swift and others of the passengers who followed, among whom Mr. West, of Washington, and Mr. Westbrook, were distinguished, proceeded to form a raft and take on board the ship stores, of which a large supply was on board.

By nightfall almost everything had been taken off either by our men or by the wreckers, three of whom boarded us almost at the same time, and commenced stripping the rigging and sales in good earnest, and by a sort of divine right. They were all from Turk's Island whither they proposed to take their plunder, a little more unceremoniously than the captain, Col. Kinney were disposed to allow.

About six o'clock in the afternoon the last boat load of passengers, among whom was the Colonel, left the schooner, and it was with no little pain that we viewed the beautiful craft lying on her side among the rocks, the helpless victim of the winds and waves, or our more merciless assailants, the wreckers. To the Colonel especially, who had struggled against every embarrassment, and had expended over fifty thousand dollars in hard money to promote his darling undertaking, the wreck was distressing indeed.

We have been very kindly treated by the American Consul, Mr. Nelson, in whose building most of our men have found comfortable lodgings, and by Mr. B. Everett Smith, his predecessor, now a merchant on the Island. We are also under particular obligations to his Honor, Mr. James Misick, the Vice President of the colony of Turk's Island and the Cayoos, as well as to other members of the Government, whose courteous attention to Col. Kinney were doubly welcome in consideration of the circumstances under which he arrived.

We leave to-morrow, by a British vessel for our port of destination in Central America.

W. S. T.

A PROBLEM SOLVED.—Simon Pierson, an early settler in Genessee county, N. Y., in his "Reminiscences," tells some amusing anecdotes. Here is one: "About four miles west of the river we came to a log tavern, kept by Major Smith. Says Major Smith to the small man, "Is that your wife?" "Yes, sir," was the reply. Says the major: "How did you get across the river? I should suppose that wife would have sunk the old canoe." "Oh," said the little man, "I went twice for her."

Greenwich Hospital has just received the relics lately brought to England of Sir John Franklin and his companions. They are placed next to the coat in which Lord Nelson received his death wound at Trafalgar.

Michael W. Closkey, of Washington, has been appointed Secretary of Legation of the Hawaiian Mission to this Government by the Minister from that Kingdom.

Later from the Rio Grande.

By the steamship Nautilus we have received a file of the Brownsville Flag up to the 25th. The paper, under date of the 17th, says of the revolution:

No action has as yet taken place between the contending forces on the opposite bank of the river, though at last accounts they were manouvering quite near each other. Letters were received here last evening from the camp of the insurgents, stating that the commander, Vidarui, hearing of the approach of a reinforcement of government troops, had countermarched with a portion of his command to Monterty to meet this new enemy, while Gen. and Governor de la Garza, remains at the head of the insurgents on the river to watch the operations of Gen. Woll, who is also in the field with all his available force. The letters state there is no fear of the ultimate success of the insurgents, as the people from all quarters are flocking to their standard, en masse, filled with the greatest enthusiasm. Their numbers are said to have already swelled to three thousand of the best men of the frontier. Many of the most wealthy and influential men of Northern Mexico, inspired by that love of Liberty which actuated our fathers of '76, are said to have abandoned their homes, contributed their means and joined the ranks as private soldiers.

But will the change now about taking place establish a permanent Government, or better the condition of the people. We fear it will not. Already have the germs of discord discovered themselves in the insurgent camp, and is like to lead to conflict between the States, after their sovereignty has been restored, and if so, then will come chaos and another if not a final dissolution.

In our last number we stated that Caryajal was second in command. This has turned out to be incorrect. This gentleman has withdrawn himself from the movement, and is now on this bank of the river. He took offence at what he conceived to be the assumption by Vidnuri of what he construed to be the rights of the people of Tamaulipas, and hence his withdrawal. Jose de la Garza now fills his place as second in command of the insurgents. Caryajal is having published the correspondence which led to this result, and which he thinks will justify him in the eyes of his friends.

It is rumored that fifteen or twenty of our soldiers, from one of the artillery companies at Ringgold Barracks, had deserted and joined the insurgents, taking with them their side arms and accoutrements.

The following is seven days later:

The revolution still gains strength on our frontier. Gen. Woll has fallen back from Reynoso upon Matamoros, and a considerable number of the rebels are now, at the time of our going to press, close upon his heels. We have it from good authority that three several parties are encamped near Matamoros, one at Guadalupe, about three leagues distant, one at the rancho of Agapito Longoria, about eight leagues off, and the third party at some other point close by. These parties are, we learn, commanded by Capistran, Tijerina and Sayas. They do not contemplate an attack upon the city, as yet, we believe.

A rumor, said to be well authenticated, says that Gen. Vidauri, having regulated matters at Monterey, was again marching on Matamoros with a force of twenty-eight hundred men. It is also said that the forces now around the doomed city have orders not to engage the enemy until the arrival of Vidauri's reinforcements. In the meantime Gen. Woll, and those subaltern to him, have grown worthy to desperation. During the absence of General Woll, the command of the city is said to have devolved upon the famous Donna Lucinda, his reputed wife, and her first use of authority was to command the inhuman treatment of one of her own sex, which not even the tears of the ladies of Matamoros could prevent. The disgraceful proceeding is fully described in Spanish in another place.

It is impossible to say when Matamoros will fall, but its fate is inevitable, and then terrible will be the reckoning. We have much to say on this subject, but our limited space will not permit.

The lady alluded to above as having been inhumanly treated was named Hernandez. She had crossed the river to Matamoros, and had been persuaded by her brother to deliver a letter to an official of that city, named Barbarina, asking an interview. This, and the fact that she had not a proper passport, caused her to be arrested and thrown into prison. On the following day she was taken into the public square, and her hair was cut off, look after look, by the hands of different malefactors of the prison. Her family witnessed this shameful punishment in the deepest distress, while she implored the authorities to put her to death rather than anhmit her to such disgrace. She was afterwards sent to Vera Cruz.

TERRIFIC PLUNGE.—A large mastiff dog was carried over the Genesee Falls, at Rochester, on Friday. He emerged in safety, and was very soon seen wagging his tail on the flats in exhilaration. The height is 92 feet.

HEAL THE SICK.—Men of liberal education as the present day devote all their talents to discover the means whereby they may remove those painful maladies which assail the human frame. There is no better antidote of healing the sick, considering the numberless diseases to which man is liable, and which may cause him to drag out a protracted life of distress, or suddenly cut them off in the bloom of his existence and usefulness. We should gratefully seize upon every means of counteracting their dreadful effects, or causing a removal of those clogs to happiness. In those cases where the Liver or the Stomach is the cause, we would highly recommend Dr. Hoofland's German Bitters, prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson. No medicine at this time stands higher than these Bitters, and to those who are suffering from the horrors of indigestion, we say they are the antidote. See advertisement. jy7 1md

DR. HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS, prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson, are justly reckoned among our most valuable medicines. In cases of Dyspepsia it acts like magic, strengthening the tone of the stomach stimulating the digestive powers, and giving ruddy health to the cheek, and brightness to the eye. There are thousands in this community who can testify to their virtues and thousands will hereafter add their testimony.

We invite the special attention of parents and guardians to the advantages here offered to young men desirous of a finished collegiate or business education. The location of the college, in a quiet valley, ten miles from a town—the freedom, consequently, from temptation to vice—the full and thorough course of study—the experience and ability of the faculty—the wholesome discipline—the facilities for lectures afforded by ample apparatus, libraries and cabinets, and withal, the cheapness of terms and healthfulness of position, cannot fail to secure to this college, as heretofore, a liberal patronage.

Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would however, respectfully urge all parents or guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the institution, to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, for it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.

School books, stationery, &c., may be had at any of the ...rious stores in the village at the usual rates.

Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral deportment of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.

As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass into another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.

The government of the schools is to be understood as that of authority—though parental and mild, yet decided and firm. The institution, in a religious point of view, will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.

Pupils will be required to attend church at least once on the Sabbath, and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.

The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.

The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second session commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July. At which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.

All applications for admission of pupils, &c., to be made to the president of the College.

THE GREAT REMEDY FOR BOWEL COMPLAINTS, and DISEASES OF THE LUNGS.

DR. T. MCGOWAN'S ESSENCE OF TAR, which has never been known to fail in over 10,000 cases. It is the only medicine that is known to have supreme control over Diarrhœa, Dysentery or Bloody Flux, Cholera, Cholera Morbus, etc., and Coughs in consumption, Cold Bronchitis, Typhoid Pneumonia, etc.

Many hundreds of certificates from Physicians, planters, lawyers, ministers, and others who have used it, might be given, shewing with what certainty it may be relied upon, constituting a new era in medicine. Thousands will hail it as one of the greatest blessings of the age.

RICHARD ANGELL, M. D., HOMŒOPATHIC PHYSICIAN, 118 St. Charles st., corner of Lafayette Square, New Orleans, takes this method of acquainting his friends and former patrons with his location as a medical practitioner in New Orleans.

Thirty years' experience in general and hospital practice has confirmed his confidence in the superiority of Homœopathy in the treatment of both recent and chronic diseases. He would especially ask the attention of those who have long sought in vain for relief from chronic ailment in other systems of practice, to the happy results of Homœopathic treatment and proffers his services to such as desire to avail themselves of the resources of our system.

Communications from patients asking advice and treatment will be promptly attended to. Terms moderate.

WOULD YOU BE YOUNG AGAIN?

Would you be young again?
So would not I;
One tear to memory given,
Onward I hie.
Life's dark flood forded o'er,
All but at rest on shore,
Say, would you plunge once more,
With home so nigh?

If you might, would you now
Retrace your way—
Wander through stormy wilds,
Faint and astray?
Night's gloomy watches fled,
Morning all beaming red,
Hope's smiles around us shed,
Heavenward—away!

Where are those loved ones,
Our joy and delight,
Dear, and more dear, though now
Ittidden from sight?
Where they rejoice to be,
There is the land for me,
Fly, time, flyspeedily—
Come, light and life!

THE PAST AND THE PRESENT.

NO. V.

THE CONTRAST.

Bro. McTyeire—"'Tie greatly wise to talk with our past hours." We are often reminded that "this is the age of progress." Well, who doubts it? But the remark of an aged and wise man is significant. It was, in substance: "The people's heads go so fast, there is danger of leaving their bodies behind." One who has been observant of passing events for sixty years, especially in the Mississippi Valley, the progress in civil and ecclesiastical affairs is matter of wonder and congratulation. The sober, reflecting mind inquires, what was "the Great West," politically, sixty years ago, when Kentucky was a frontier State and harrassed by savage warfare? And what was the Methodist Church, in said valley, when the minutes of conferences issued, in 1794—when the traveling preachers numbered 21, and the membership 1,629? The progress has been vast in point of numerical strength, popularity and influence; but whether vital religion and ardent piety has kept pace with this progress, is a grave inquiry. Aged men perceive the contrast, and deplore what they cannot remedy. He who looks scrutinizingly into the volume of Minutes of the Annual Conferences can form some idea of what Wesleyan itinerancy was in its early stages on this continent; only a vestige of which remains at present. Change and interchange was the order of the day. To keep up a lively interest in public ministrations and to promote the cause of ardent piety, a frequent change of preachers was deemed indispensable. Mr. Wesley somewhere remarks, in substance, that if I were to preach to the same congregation a whole year, I should preach both myself and them to sleep." And yet few men enjoyed a greater variety of useful knowledge. The practical operations of itinerant Methodism on this continent, in its early stages, cannot be sponded with these views; and hence we see in the Minutes that preachers were often changed every three and six months. Not were these interchanges confined to small circles. They were from State to State, from North to South, from East to West, and from one extreme of the field of labor to another. It was a leveling plan; for though there was a diversity of talent, there was no exemption from hard labor and laborious stations. The quarterage or annual allowance was the same to a graduate or preacher on trial as to a presiding elder or bishop; and if deficient at the end of a year, there was no redress. The writer was favored with practical experience in the operation of this plan of interchange and sacrifice: admitted on trial in Kentucky, April, 1794; appointed to Green Circuit, East Tennessee—a savage wilderness of some two hundred miles to pass through; after six months, sent to Holstein Circuit, in Western Virginia; next to Clinch Circuit, in a mountainous region, exposed to savage warfare; after six months, called to go to the Virginia Conference; thence to Orange Circuit, near the Blue Ridge; thence to Haw River Circuit, North Carolina; thence to Cotentney, in the swamp regions of the same; then to Portsmouth, Va.; then to Gloucester Va.; then to Greenville Circuit, Va.; then to Lexington Circuit, Ky.; then to Danville Circuit, Ky.; then to Cumberland District. The scenes through which he passed were indeed variegated. Sometimes in dread of tommahawk and scalping knife, then among the peaceful societies of Old Virginia; sometimes in the hovels of the poor, and occasionally in the mansions of the rich. The pleasure of doing good and the gratification of seeing good done, was the principal and often the only solace.

There is a striking contrast between such changes and interchanges as were practiced in days gone by and the local, circumscribed and partial itinerancy now in vogue. The same man (not overstocked, perhaps, with variety or holy unction) preaches to the same people for twenty or thirty years; his sermons become stale, and spiritual langor, religious decline and dull formality is the result. The work of awakenings, conversions and growth in grace is at a stand still, revival influence is seldom felt, except at a protracted meeting, and then it is often evanescent. The time was when there were revivals all around the circuit—revivals or displays of saving grace every day in the week, in class meetings and prayer meetings. The preachers were "wholly devoted to God and his work," and they carried the flame of living religion into the class room, into families and social circles, when, instead of levity, frivolous chit-chat and fashionable etiquette, the songs of Zion, religious conversation and devotional exercises enlivened the hour.

We hear complaints of "scarcity of preachers," and we see the sentence, "to be supplied," often repeated in the "stations of the preachers." Moreover, the people are urged to "pray the Lord of the harvest to send forth more laborers." "Is there not a cause?" Suppose a husbandman has large possessions, lays off his grounds, computes the amount of labor to be done and the number of laborers necessary to its performance, provided all the laborers are "wholly devoted to the work;" but the laborers consult their own ease, convenience or interest, subdivide the fields of labor, contract the sphere of action; some labor one-fourth, some one-sixth or one-seventh part of the usual or stipulated time, while others, who promised to be wholly devoted to the work, seek other employment. No marvel if the crop is a failure, if some fields suffer or remain "to be supplied," and the cry is raised, "More laborers!" The reader may make the application.

When the itinerant plan was in its pristine purity and its practical efficiency, one laborer preached on a four weeks' circuit to twenty-five or more congregations, in as many different neighborhoods, in a month. The change, the contraction, the delinquency, is too visible to need comment. Much labor and little pay, as formerly, and little labor and much pay, forms the contrast.

My plain articles may not suit the taste of the fastidious, or the friends of dereliction in duty, or the advocates of progress. I may, however, be allowed to say, "For the hurt of the daughter of my people am I hurt." I dread the consequences of innovation and deterioration—always insidious, often ruinous.

A SUPERANNUATE.

Mississippi, July, 1855.

WHY SHLD I GIVE?—Where God is forgotten, it is pitiful to see how riches harden the heart of him who gains them. Sometimes, the man who was liberal while he was poor becomes niggardly as he becomes rich. The tendency of gain is to nourish selfishness, if the hand that bestows it is overlooked, and the thirst of selfishness can never be slaked. The reservoir of the covetous never overflows. Recognizing no obligation, he yields to no claim. A man of this sort once said, "Others never give to me, why should I give to others?" Infatuated man! is there none that ever gives to thee? What hast thou that thou hast not received? Has God given thee nothing? Who gave thee reason, life, success? Who prospered thy plans? Who gave thee power to get wealth? Who has kept thy dwelling safe? Who has warded off from thee a thousand calamities which have overtaken thy fellows? And art thou, then, indebted to none—has none a right to thy bounty? Wilt thou rob God? Shall he have no share of what is his own?

EARTH'S GLORY.—How glorious a spot is earth! Over it are spread the shadows of the cross and crown of Jesus. The sun and stars shine to let us see where Christ lay. This nook of the mighty universe is covered with a kingly lustre, but kingly eyes alone can see it: The image and the superscription of Christ are traceable on all beauty and preciousness below. It is the glory of the earth that he found a cradle and a grave in it; it is the safety of earth that he reigns and rules over it. How blessed will be that promised restoration of all things, for which humanity groans, when the reclaimed earth shall emerge from the smoke of the last fire, fresh and fair as when the morning stars sang together; when the usurper shall be cast out and all rebel elements calmed and subdued, and sin shall be expunged, and death dead, and life alive forever, and the wilderness be made glad, and the desert blossom as the rose?—Plumer.

PAY YOUR DEBTS PROMPTLY.—A gentleman who owed a neighbor $50 noticed that he appeared very thankful at the payment of the bill, and was informed by him that he was also in debt to another person who needed the money. Seeing at the outset that $100 had been paid with $50, he followed up the payment of debts by this one note of $50 until he traced it to the amount of $3,750.

LETTER FROM CHINA.

SHANGHAI, May 1, 1855.

Bro. McTyeire—Months have elapsed since my last communication. The house in which I was then stopping is now in ashes. When I penned those few hurried lines, the house trembled to its foundation on account of heavy discharges from the city and returns from imperial batteries. Many changes have taken place since then. The Imperialists, with the assistance of the French men-of-war in port, have succeeded in expelling the rebels. Many were captured, and heads severed from their bodies to the amount of seven or eight hundred. Their heads were suspended from the city wall on bamboo poles, to be observed by every passer-by. They remained suspended for more than a week. Their bodies were horribly mutilated and beets taken out. I am told that this was done by people from the country and elsewhere, for the purpose of making medicine.

I was in the city the second day after it was taken, which was Monday, February 19, third day of the Chinese new year. The bodies of dead rebels were seen about the streets in almost every direction. Some who were confined in their houses from sickness and wounds were taken out and horribly cut to pieces. Coffins were torn open, bodies taken out and heads severed after they had been dead months. This I saw myself, with others. In this way the bodies were left. But the Imperial soldiers continued their search in every coffin, in every nook and corner of the city, for these poor fellows, upon whom they had no mercy. I saw several bodies half consumed by fire, and some partly burned and then cut to pieces by the broadswords of the Imperial soldiers.

Half the city was consumed by fire on the night of the 17th February, but not a church in the city was touched. I witnessed this fire from 12 till 3 of the same night. It was a grand sight, but carrying with it destruction. There was a continual firing kept up all night, at the same time savage yells, while the rebels were escaping in every direction.

But now peace reigns and harmony prevails in Shanghai. Still we hear of war and bloodshed in the south, interior and north. The end is not yet. May God interpose, put an end to all this strife, and establish His kingdom in those ends of the earth.

Will our brethren pray for us who have been called, as we trust, by the grace of God to preach to this people, that we may have access to them, and that the Word of God may not return unto Him void.

WILLIAM LAMBUTH.

NO VENTURE.—The late Rev. Dr. Simeon, who for many years was tutor in Huxton College, after many years spent in the service of Christ, as he drew near to death, spoke with great disapprobation of the phrase used by good people, "venturing on Christ." "When," said he, "I consider the dignity and all-sufficiency of Christ, I am ashamed to talk of venturing on him. O that I had ten thousand souls, I would at this moment cast them all into his hands with the utmost confidence."

Instances are cited of earnestness in preaching and of persistent labors in the gospel that appear, at the present day, astonishing and almost incredible. Hooper, bishop of two dioceses, preached daily. Tobias Matthews, Bishop of Durham, eighty years old, preached daily. John Wesley is said to have preached forty thousand times in fifty years.

PORT GIBSON COLLEGIATE ACADEMY.

The Trustees of the Port Gibson Collegiate Academy deem it due to the public, as well as to the President of the college, to state that the examination of the different classes on the late Commencement occasion, has given the amplest satisfaction to those who attended, and secures for the institution a high position of rank among the best female colleges of the South.

Dr. Capers and his excellent lady took charge of the Collegiate Academy at a time when its most sanguine supporters and friends had ceased to hope for its success. From its then prostrated condition it has been elevated to a position of unrivalled popularity, and we feel no hesitation in saying that in our judgment it is one of the best, if not the first female college in this or any of the adjoining States. In the ability manifested at the recent examination of the pupils, and the energy and zeal displayed by the President and his assistants, we see a guarantee of success not hitherto anticipated by the most sanguine friends of the institution.

Dr. Capers is most eminently qualified for the station he fills, both as an instructor of the youth of our country and as a disciplinarian. In the internal regulations of his school we observe great evidences of tact and skill in all that pertains to good government, in a rigid adherence to the rules and regulations so essential to success in an enterprise of the kind; and whilst these rules are rigidly enforced there is exhibited that parental regard for the welfare of the students that at once enlists their affections for the entire faculty, and excites a spirit of emulation to learn which we have rarely seen equaled. We feel authorized to say that no exertions will be spared to place the Collegiate Academy in a position of permanency, and to secure for it so high a rank among the institutions of learning in our Southern country as will gratify all the friends of education and free our people from the enormous burthen of taxation and privation attendant upon having to send our children beyond the reach of our Southern climate and Southern influences to secure an education. We rejoice over the fact we have established, that the time has come when we feel relieved of this feature of our dependence upon the North, and freed from the baneful influences of schools, which we have hitherto been compelled to support, so uncongenial to our Southern feelings and principles.

Whilst we have no prejudices to gratify, we have great principles to maintain, and our happiness and safety as a people depend, in a great degree, on the gradual growth and eventual success of every Southern enterprise having a tendency to free us from moral, political and commercial vassallage to those whom every day demonstrates to be our enemies. We feel it to be due to our political institutions, now assailed with unusual virulence, to place ourselves in a position of independence, and to this end we hope to secure the co-operation of the friends of education, in building up Southern schools and patronizing Southern teachers. The education of our children at home is the only true safeguard to the protection of our rights; and in thus guarding the threshold we preserve the citadel.

The success that has crowned the efforts of Dr. Capers and his lady, and the able corps of teachers, in their labors for the past year, places the college under their control beyond the contingencies of an experiment, and gives us reason to believe that we have at last secured what we have so long striven to obtain—a female college at home equal in all respects to the wants of the country, and so perfect in all its arrangements as to satisfy the wishes of the most fastidious. The Trustees intended making a full report of the examination of the different classes, witnessed during the commencement exercises, but in this we have been so fully anticipated by the Board of Visitors, that we take pleasure in laying their able and comprehensive report before the public, and we add with confidence that, while it may seem too flattering, it conveys only the truth as to the success attendant upon the unremitting exertions of the President and his assistants.

The next session will begin on the third Monday in September. Ample arrangements are in progress for the accommodation of one hundred boarders, and the Board of Trustees sincerely hope to receive the aid and co-operation of the friends of Southern schools in their efforts to place this institution on solid ground.

By order of the Board of Trustees.

D. C. HUMPHREYS, President.
J. S. MASON, Secretary.

The Visiting Committee invited to attend and witness the examination of the classes in the Port Gibson Collegiate Academy, have individually and collectively endeavored to discharge the duty assigned them, and feel highly gratified with the result of their observations and labors. The occasion, the momentuous character of the interest involved, the posture of public affairs, the admonitions of the past and the future of the young around us, unite to urge upon our attention many considerations which we must well weigh and properly appreciate.

A sound and thorough system of female education has long been felt to be one of the chief necessities of the age. The conservative power, which, stronger than constitutions and more effective than senates, found in the educated mind and cultivated heart of woman, is the only great reliance for our national safety, and the development and maintenance of our domestic, civil and Christian economies. Experience and philosophy have proven to us that no nation or people can rise to true or lasting eminence unless woman is elevated, refined and honored with an enlightened companionship with man. Providence has been pleased to honor woman with such extraordinary gifts and capabilities, that when she is in the ascendant man goes up to meet and join her; and when degraded below his level, he goes downward to adapt himself to her condition. Such is man, whether savage or semi-civilized. True civilization finds woman on the summit of refinement, equality and usefulness. In a less perfect civilization woman is neglected—an offence of such magnitude that nature and Providence never fail to visit it with a terrible avengement. Consequently, too high an estimate cannot be placed upon the obligations we owe to those whom God and nature so truly honor; nor can man bestow too much care, labor and solicitude upon their claims to culture and development. These fundamental principles of sociology are taking a wide range, and will soon become the fixed and universal convictions of all enlightened minds.

As an evidence of the rapid diffusion and force of these truths, we observe everywhere a course of studies prescribed for females of a higher and more varied classification than was formerly assigned to the young men of our colleges. Female seminaries, female colleges, institutes, high schools and academies, of the highest grade, are springing up all over the land, inaugurating a new age, which will outstrip all other accomplishments heretofore attained in the highest walks of literature and science.

The Southern States have been slow to enter upon this noble enterprise. Content, hitherto, to send their daughters to cold and inhospitable climes, where hundreds have been hurried to early graves, and satisfied with the childish notion that schools far away were better than home schools, they have allowed their own institutions to languish—often to perish. For years together they have lavished their wealth by unknown thousands upon those who esteem it a condescension to teach Southern pupils, and spurn their parents and guardians as graceless barbarians. But the South at last recognized the delicate hint, and set herself to improve and educate her own sons and daughters. And now the time has come when a Southern youth, educated in an abolition atmosphere and trained by the traducers of our homes, our parents and our rights, will pass through life trammelled and burdened with social and political embarrassments too great to resist or overcome. Southern youth must be educated at home. Self-respect, parental love, economy, health, the claims of posterity and the claims of home demand it. We can and we must have our own institutions. We can and must have our own native teachers. We can and we must have our own text-books, the fruit of native scholarship. We can and we must print, publish and teach our own books. We must not permit our foes to frame our songs, only reserving to ourselves the feebler power of framing husky statutes. Education for the South, in the South, by the South, is the Archimidian lever of our elevation, the bulwark of our defence, and the indissoluble bond of our equal and honored Union with the sisterhood of sovereign States. These are our necessities. They must be realized.

The almost unexampled success of this Collegiate Academy, the brilliant display of maturing mind, the wonderful perfection attained by every class, and in every branch of their studies, the triumph of native teachers, the exquisite taste and eloquence of the compositions, the lady-like manners of the pupils, the love and affection exhibited between teachers and pupils, as well as their quiet submission to rigid discipline, have all combined, to an extent heretofore unknown amongst us, to convince the Visiting Committee, and, we believe, all impartial witnesses, that this school deserves to rank among the foremost seats of learning in our State.

It is a school evidently so conducted as not only to do the simplest justice to the pupils, but also to meet the expectations of many who cherish unreasonable notions of the capabilities of such means of youthful improvement. A school so governed and taught, so thorough in its course of studies, so satisfactory to patrons and parents, must concentrate a large and growing patronage and meet the cordial support of this entire community. And surely the citizens of this loveliest of all the towns our State can boast, in the unselfish magnanimity of their zeal for the cause of true learning and sound morals, will not prove so recreant to their own interests and responsibilities as not to God-speed the efforts of its Trustees and Faculty and lend a helping hand to give it all the ability it demands, and make it as useful as it is worthy. It is a distinction of which many cities might well be ambitious, to wear such a gem upon its brow. And while it is the chief monument of prosperity and beefulness, linked with the town of Port Gibson, it now bids fair to impart a brighter lustre to that name than it has previously enjoyed.

While such success attends upon the efforts of home teachers to expand and improve the native mind, this academy will prove a monumental refutation of the monstrous untruth that the genial clime of the olive, the fig, the vine and the magnolia is unfavorable to the improvement of the mind of the pupil or the abilities of Southern faculty. It will do its part in the sisterhood of Southern schools to show that long, dreary winters—snowful, hailful, ice engirdled winters—are not more essential to the growth of mind and the highest achievement of intellect now, than in the days of Homer, Isaiah and Pericles. But while we indulge in these remarks, we do it not so much from sectional feelings, as from the intense desire we cherish to arouse our own people to the importance of providing for themselves all those means of social independence and usefulness which never fail to command respect, and ensure a just regard for the public and private rights of all parties concerned.

In conclusion, we rejoice that we are able to say that the course pursued by Dr. Capers, the distinguished President of the institution, together with the Faculty, their system of teaching and the almost unexampled diligence displayed in their respective departments, meet with our entire and hearty approval and commendation. Moreover, we feel assured that the public will concur with us when we say that a more satisfactory examination could not have been given. Nor do we ever expect to witness anything superior to it. The uniform excellence attained by every class and in all the scholastic departments, renders it impossible to make distinctions; consequently we can only speak of the recitals and evidences of improvement of the school in general terms.

We have been gratified to witness the evidences of the most perfect health prevailing amongst the young ladies. Nor can we forbear the expression of our hearty approval of the entire absence of all sectarianism, leaving the most unscrupulous of their religious tenets entirely unmolested in the enjoyment of their creeds.

It is too commonly the case that the manners and habits of the young ladies are neglected while they are being taught the principles of science and literature. But this important branch of female culture could not be neglected or imperfectly attended to where the accomplished wife of Rev. Dr. Capers devotes herself as she has done to the refinement and gracefulness of the young ladies under her charge. Her attention, her kindness, her gentle and loving care, have emblazoned her name and memory in the hearts of all the pupils of the institution and awakened a grateful and generous regard for her in the bosoms of their parents, which of itself is a large and lasting reward.

With such a Faculty, and the blessing of a benignant Providence, the future of the Port Gibson Collegiate Academy is destined to accomplish a great work in the cause of education, and we heartily commend it to the notice and regards of all the friends of home education in the South.

The Atlantic's Mails.

DETAILS OF EUROPEAN NEWS.

The steamship Atlantic arrived at New York at nine o'clock on Wednesday evening last, 25th ult. She sailed from Liverpool on the 14th instant. Her political news is interesting but not important. The market for cotton and breadstuffs show no marked change from previous quotations.

The Ministerial Crisis in England.

Lord John Russell figures this week as the principal feature of the news. The circumstances which lent him this pre-eminence were the disclosures he made in his speech of Friday, the 6th, respecting the want of unanimity between himself and his colleague on the subject of the war; in other words, that he, Lord John Russell, as British plenipotentiary, expressed himself at Vienna in favor of the peace proposals mooted by Count Buol and approved of by M. Drouyn de L'Huys, but that on returning to England, he either did not communicate those sentiments to his colleagues in the Government, or swallowed his peace opinions, and retained office in a ministry pledged to war; while M. Drouyn de L'Huys, with a finer sense of honor, resigned. The case against Lord Russell is forcibly put by Mr. D'Israeli, thus:

"I do not see that the explanations since made by the noble lord at all change his situation with regard to the House, and as regards the narrative he made on Friday night. What did startle the House and greatly disquieted the public mind was that it came out, not by hazard, but from notice formally given, and evidently in a manner well matured on the part of Lord John Russell, that he had returned to England with a project of pacification which he approved, but which the great majority of the House and of the country, neither at that time nor at this moment would sanction; that he had recommended this project to his colleagues; that, in consequence of their refusal to adopt it, he had felt he was bound to consider whether it was not his duty to retire from the Government; and, though influenced by other considerations, he remained a member of the Administration, and shortly afterwards came down to the House and made a speech which conveyed to the country the impression that he was an uncompromising advocate of the war, and conveying also to the House the idea that he was convinced, from his experiences in the conferences at Vienna, that any attempt at negotiation with any reasonable hopes of success was impossible—thereby conveying to Parliament and the country an impression utterly inconsistent with the facts of the case."

The feeling of this matter had grown so high that the existence of the Palmerston Ministry was put to the vote by Sir E Bulwer Lytton moving "that the conduct of the Minister charged with the negotiations at Vienna, and his continuance in office as a responsible advisor of the Crown, have shaken the confidence which the country should place in those to whom the administration of public affairs is intrusted." Nor is this the only attack to which the Ministry is exposed—Mr. Roebuck having moved for a call of the House, July 17, on which occasion the whole force of all sections of the Opposition will be brought to bear.

Contradictory rumors were afloat as to the course Lord Palmerston will pursue in this dilemma. Some surmise that he will try to weather the storm by throwing overboard Lord John Russell, whose resignation he is said to have had in his hands for some days.

LIVERPOOL, July 14.—The expected debate on Sir E. Lytton Bulwer's motion did not come off last night. It is now set down for Monday.

LIVERPOOL, July 14.—A telegraphic despatch from London, received just before the departure of the Atlantic, announces that Lord John Russell has resigned his seat in the Cabinet.

France.

On the evening of the 6th the members of the legislative corps, headed by their President, presented to the Emperor the votes for the new loan of $750,000,000 francs, and for the enrollment of 140,000 men. The Emperor replied to the address:

"I thank the Legislature for the readiness with which they have voted these two bills. I know how burdensome are the charges and taxes imposed by war, but I hope they will be only temporary, and I am confident that the spirit and patriotism of the country will enable us to surmount every difficulty, and to obtain an honorable peace."

Paris correspondence continues to adduce proof that the Spanish insurrection is fostered by Russian influence. Much anxiety is manifested in the German courts to ascertain the progress of the revolt.

Queen Victoria's visit to Paris is now fixed for August 17.

Spain.

Madrid letters of the 11th, mention that the Cortes had adopted the bill authorizing the loan of 230,000,000 reals, and that, should the loan not be voluntary subscribed, it was at the end of each month to become compulsory.

A telegraphic dispatch from Barcelonu, dated 11th, to the French Government, announces that "order reigns" in that city, and some of the manufactories have resumed work. Nothing is said respecting the other disturbed districts, excepting in vague assurance that the movement is suppressed.

M. Turgot, the French Minister, wounded by Mr. Soulé, has been recalled from Madrid.

Austria.

The Austrian official journals strive to allay the anxiety caused by the Emperor Napoleon's recent speech, and to explain that there is no likelihood of an open rupture between Austria and the Western Powers. A new Austrian circular is spoken of, intended as Buol's reply to Napoleon's innendoes. In this circular Austria maintains that she has kept all her promises to the Western Powers; that she has performed all she undertook to do; that her sympathies are still with France and England, but that she remains the sole judge as to the suitable moment to take part in the conditions of the ultimatum—the absolute rejection of which would, however, force her to extremities.

The Baltic.

The Allied fleets continue to send cruisers to destroy property left exposed on the coast. A dispatch from St. Petersburg of the 6th, states that British ships bombarded Krasnala Gorka for five hours on the 3d, and destroyed the telegraph stations and barracks. A French flotilla of eight mortar-vessels and gun-boats left Kiel on the 11th for the Baltic. The London Official Gazette publishes dispatches from Admiral R. S. Dundas, giving an account of the bombardment of the small fort at Rotsinsholm and destruction of the Russian barracks at Kotka.

Prince Gortschakoff's Address.

The following is Prince Gortschakoff's address to the garrison of Schastopol the day after the affair of the 18th:

"HEROES OF INKERMAN, June 19.—Comrades! the bloody combat of yesterday, and the defeat of our enemy has again crowned our arms with immortal laurels. Russia owes you her thanks and will not refuse them. Many of our companions-in-arms have sealed with their blood the oath which they took, and so have kept sacred the promise which I gave to the Emperor, our father. Comrades, I thank you for it.

My brothers! Large reinforcements are marching from all parts of our sacred Russia. They will soon be with us. Oppose, as you have hitherto done, your manly breast to the fire of our impious enemies, and vie as your comrades have died, with arms in your hands in an honorable contest—man to man, breast to breast—rather than violate the oath which you have sworn to your country, to preserve our Sebastopol!

Soldiers! the enemy is beaten—driven back with enormous losses. Your commander again thanks you in the name of the Emperor and of holy Russia. The time is near at hand when the pride of the enemy shall be overthrown—when his army shall be swept from the territory like straw before the wind. Until then have faith in God, and fight for your Emperor and country.

GORTSCHAKOFF."

The Late Lord Raglan.

Lord Raglan was several days laboring under a disease which nearly resembled cholera, without having all the symptoms of it, but the physicians on the very morning of his death had given it as their opinion that he was better, and that his state no longer caused uneasiness. His voice had regained its strength; he had been able to eat, and during the day hopes were entertained that his indisposition would soon disappear. Lord Raglan himself said he felt nearly well; but about six in the evening he was seized with a sudden faintness, and without suffering the slightest pain, gradually sank, and in two hours expired, calmly and tranquilly.

Various Items.

An Imperial ukase orders the Governments of South Russia to reinforce, as much as possible the army of the Cossacks of the Don, admitting volunteers of all classes.

Lord Raglan's last dispatch was announcing the death of Gen Estcourt. A postscript by General Simpson announced Lord Raglan's own decease.

A difficulty had occurred on board the American ship Arlington at Balaklava, in which one of the seamen was shot by the mate.

The Turkish contingent is daily increasing, and at present numbers 8,000 men, who are encamped at Rasapden, an elevated position between Bayukdere and the Black Sea.

The Paris Moniteur states that the total number of deaths from battle and disease in the French army since it left France, thirteen months ago, are 14,200 up to June 1, and the number of killed since then at not more then 2,300; figures manifestly much under the mark.

English papers state that a mutiny of a dangerous character had broken out in the (Russian) Siberian regiments. The assertion is founded on a sentence of court-martial published in the St. Petersburg Journal degrading four officers to the ranks for "insubordination."

A St. Petersburg letter of the 25th of June mentions that the Czar intended to visit the South, but his precise destination was not known. Prince Michael, they say, is to assume the government of Poland, and the Duke Nicholas is to join the army in the Crimea. Prince Paskiewitch is said to have declined the active command of the army on the plea of age. Prince Gortschakoff is spoken of as likely to be appointed Minister of War; Prince Dalgorouki, Police, and Count Orloff, President of the Council. A treaty of alliance between Russia and Prussia is openly spoken of, but this is not in accordance with Baron Manteuffel's note of the 6th, in which he speaks of Prussia's relation toward the point of guarantee.

It is positively stated in the English papers that the Emperor Alexander is in a bad state of health. Consumption is his reputed malady. The same paper used to report that the Emperor Nicholas was insane. Private letters from Russian sources in Belgium deny Alexander's ailment.

Progress of the War.

The position of affairs remains as before the repulse of June 18. No permanent check has been sustained by the besiegers. Several regiments, which suffered badly on the recent occasion, have been re-organized, and the troops of the four nations continue healthy and hopeful. Immense works are being raised against the Malakoff and Redan, and also to command the shipping. Thirty thousand men are said to be employed on these works of attack. Another and general assault is not far off. Nor have the Russians been idle, as new works are thrown up behind the Malakoff and Redan, (a formidable star fort behind the latter.)

JULY 10—Gen. Pelissier telegraphs: "I have nothing new to announce to-day. The firing has been very brisk since morning between the English and the Redan. This evening the Redan is quite silent; consequently the English will be able to advance their works."

JULY 11—Evening.—Gen Simpson telegraphs: "Our fire yesterday had good effect on the Redan. Cholera is decreasing, and the health of the army is satisfactory. Prince Gortschakoff proposes that prisoners should be exchanged at Odessa."

On the night of the 7th of July, the Russians made a sortie against the works and positions in front of the Mamelon. They did not, however, offer battle, but, having put the besiegers on the alert and exchanged a few shots, withdrew.

Omar Pasha, his Turks and the Sardinians, have returned, as reported by telegraph, from their reconnoissance toward Mackenzie's farm. They found the enemy strongly entrenched, and his position defended on all sides by powerful batteries. Omar continues in his camp at Baldar.

Notwithstanding the lateness of the season, there are indications of forthcoming operations on the Danube. M. Lalande, a French engineer, has been sent to inspect the roads in Eastern Moldavia, and make a new one from Galatz to Jassay. Orders have been forwarded to the local authorities to place the roads in their respective districts in the best possible condition, and French agents are making great purchases along the Danube for the supply of an army. The departure of 16,000 Turks from Silistria for Matchin and Tultcha, is also mentioned as connected with the projected operations.

Turkish advices from Kars, of June 6th, state that the Russian demonstrations against that place had been repulsed, and the assailants had retired to Adja-Kaleh.

Other accounts state, on the contrary, that the Russians, under Gen. Menravieff, had taken the field; also that the Turks have evacuated Kars and fallen back on Erzeroum, which is better fortified. We have once more the report, so often repeated, of the death of Shamyl, the Circassian chief.

Black Sea and Azof.

At Kertch, affairs remain as last reported. A regiment of French marines had garrisoned St. Paul and Ak-Bourmou, which command the Straits of Kertch. The Russian manifest no intention of an attack. The Allies continue to fortify Yenikale.

Immense Reinforcements from France.

We read in the Courier de Marseille of the 10th instant:

If we are to judge from the preparations making at Marseilles and Toulon, there is little doubt that our army in the East will be soon considerably augmented. We are not going to send thither fresh reinforcements, to fill up the void occasioned by the war, by disease and furlough. An entire army is to be embarked, the effective force of which will amount to at least 50,000 men. We had been told that the divisions of Generals Renault and Courtigis were to be detached from the camp of Boulogne, and [illegible] to the Crimea. This may be the case, but nothing official on the subject has yet transpired. We have, however, been credibly informed that 20,000 men of the army of Lyons are to form part of the new expeditionary corps. A portion of those troops have even already commenced their movement. The brigade of General Bel, consisting of the 30th and 35th regiments of the line, have ere now left Lyons for Marseilles, where they are expected about the 10th or 15th for immediate embarkation. The military authorities and the intendants are actively engaged in procuring means of conveyance for other regiments which are to arrive in succession, and to encamp in the neighborhood until the day of their embarkation. The instructions forwarded to Toulon are not less pressing. The Maritime Prefect has been ordered to prepare before the end of the month a sufficient number of [illegible] to transport 16,000 men and [illegible] to the seat of war.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

Christian Advocate.

Terms: $2 00 per annum, in advance.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, AUGUST 11, 1855.

HEALTH.—Fever rather on the increase. Deaths this week will reach 300.

OBIT.—We have to record the demise of the Catholic Standard. Obituary next week.

To the Agents.

Our good brethren will please make every practicable effort to collect all the dues of the Advocate on their respective charges ere we meet them at their Conferences; not only all the arrears, but also all the advance subscriptions for the forthcoming volume. It is very desirable to reduce the business of the Advocate as much as possible to the advance cash system; therefore get all to pay in advance you can. We earnestly hope this will not be overlooked, and all the agents come up to Conference with a "clear sheet" from their respective circuits and stations. Several have recently informed us this would be the case with them and their work. We hope it may be the case with all.

The Law of Newspapers.

1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary are considered as wishing to continue their subscription.

2. If subscribers order the discontinuance of their papers, the publisher may continue to send them until all arrearages are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their newspapers from the offices to which they are directed, they are held responsible until they have settled the bills and ordered them discontinued.

4. If subscribers remove to other places without informing the publishers, and the newspapers are sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

5. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers from the office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is prima facie evidence of intentional fraud.

6. The United States courts have also repeatedly decided that a postmaster who neglects to perform his duty of giving seasonable notice, as required by the Post Office Department, of the neglect of a person to take from the office newspapers addressed to him, renders the postmaster liable to the publisher for the subscription price.

The preachers are respectfully requested to be very careful in reporting the statistics of their respective circuits, stations and missions at the next sessions of the Annual Conference; distinguishing, in all cases, between members and probationers, according to the provisions of the last General Conference. The bishops will be furnished with blank forms of the minutes, so as to secure, if possible, correctness, completeness and uniformity in our statistical returns.

ONE DOLLAR A MEMBER.—At this rate of contribution Alabama Conference would send up to the Missionary Society, this year, $39,000; Mississippi, $16,000; Louisiana and Florida, each $5,000; East Texas, $10,000; Conchitas, $7,000. This from white members only. While the rich give more, let the poor not fall below this figure; and thus the abstract, neglectful and neglected and churlish, will be made up for and the average attained.

Religion and Politics.

There are two ways in which these two may be lawfully joined together:

1. Religion should enter into politics to the extent of a quick and controlling conscience of duty. Voting is an important act, not dispensed from that obligation resting on every Christian, that whatever he does, he should do all to the glory of God. Think how much travail and agony of thought, discussion, progress and revolution has been undergone, how much blood shed, that you, a simple freeman, might exercise that right! Value it highly, use it discreetly. The ballot you cast may be the decisive one in the contest of great principles.

2. Politics should enter into religion so far as the Saviour rebuked his followers for the want of policy. The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light. If the zeal, boldness, self-sacrifice and unstinted outlay that characterize a canvass could be brought to bear upon religious propagandism, great would be the success. "Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown; but we an incorruptible."

Either by pilotage or providential drifting we have fallen, like St. Paul on his voyage to Rome, "into the place where two seas met." Or, slightly changing the figure, the ship of State and the ship of Church have got so close that sand bags and fenders must be thrown out to prevent collision; and it is an unsettled question which has lost its channel.

As for ourselves, we claim that we are on the same tack upon which we have been sailing all the time.

The semi-religious character of politics is variously embarrassing to our cotemporaries of the religious press. How to do their duty, and yet escape the imputation of meddling with politics, that is the difficulty. If they are silent, they are recreant to their post! If they say the same things they have heretofore said, without let or hindrance, they are partisans! Instance:

The Nashville Christian Advocate has ever stoutly maintained temperance, drawing from the Bible and Discipline, and other sources for argument. All well enough. But lately the prohibition question has got into Tennessee politics. In an editorial of 19th ult., headed "Preachers and Politics," we see how the matter now stands:

"We have never allowed our sheet to become the organ of a party. The Christian religion, and that form of godliness called Methodism, which one says is 'Christianity in earnest,' are the things we advocate and defend. We defy any one to point to a single instance in which we have departed from these principles. All moral questions founded on the teachings of the Bible we advocate with a hearty good will. And yet we have recently subjected ourselves to the censure of some of our brethren, because we advocate the great cause of temperance. They say we have run into politics, and have thereby become partisan."

By parity of reasoning, if the Perseverance of Saints, or that lately inaugurated dogma, the Immaculate Conception, were to fall at issue between political parties, the religious press must surrender all further expression of opinion on those themes. Our Nashville cotemporary well remarks, in vindication of himself:

"We beg pardon, gentlemen—we are not to be driven from our purpose by new born politico-religionists, who think the Bible, the pulpit, the religious press, ministers of the gospel and the institutions of Christianity must all stand aside because they have appeared on the stage."

By the way, the editor of the Charleston Advocate must take care how he feeds his temperance column, in which so many good things are wont to appear; since, in Georgia, where its circulation and influence are quite large, the gubernatorial lasso touches thereon.

Fully aware of the recent delicate involvements of the Catholic question, we penned an article on the 30th June, in the fear of God, under a sense of duty, and with a jealous concern for the peace and prosperity of the Church. Therein was laid down for the Church, as far as we represented it, what we conceived to be the true ground for the present crisis. We were principled that way; and thought it, moreover, the best policy for Protestantism—and Methodism, its greatest exponent in this country—to show that they could be trusted in power, by extending the largest toleration to the weak and the unworthy. A party attack, we feared, would beget a party defence of Roman Catholicism. And though the party might be defeated, the Catholics would not be, but find themselves in a larger minority, with more sympathy and strength than ever they had or hoped for. Our editorial has been quoted with approbation by some leading American organs—but more largely by the Democratic. Some of our American friends have been made sore by the use of it.

On the other hand, we intend to go on in our old way waging war on Romanism, as an organization inimical to the best interests of humanity and religion. We so regard it, have so represented it, warned against it, watched it and fought it. In this some of our democratic friends may think they see a leaning to their opponents' interest. We beg them both to believe we are where we were before the present party issues arose, and where we shall be when they close. In the end, (opposition to Romanism,) we agree; about the means, differ. Which is right, time will show. And time will show them we are no partisan, and the New Orleans Christian Advocate the organ of no political party.

As an instance gratifying and honorable to American tolerance of opinion, we state that though many of our subscribers differ with us as to the grounds taken in the editorial of 30th June, and much ink has been commented upon and sometimes garbled, only two have stopped who assign that as the reason. We, as one of them charges, have not gone into politics, but sought to rescue a question out of that sphere, to be more successfully treated in another.

What! a man honestly opposed to the Roman Catholic Church, and yet refusing to support the Christian Advocate, located in its stronghold, and, according to the verdict of others, doing better service against it than any other single instrument, influence or press in the South! Can't understand that logic. Our two friends, on sober second thought, may reconsider their act.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

NOTES BY THE WAY-SIDE.

Of the glory and sublimity of our sunset sky to-night I would gladly give you some idea, but no pen—not even that of Irving, and surely not mine—can bring to your mind even a faint conception of its strange, fantastic lights and shades.

We were all around the tea-table, when an exclamation from one of us called us out upon an upper piazza, commanding a wide view. Surely such a scene man never saw before! In the west, spreading far up into the sky, was a golden haze, brighter on some of the hills, and darker just where the sun itself showed a disc "all shorn and sad;" but inexpressibly beautiful in all its shades. Above, and forming a fringe to it, were masses of thick, heavy, rushing clouds, tinged with faintest rose color, and all the rest of the sky was soft, clear and bright. As we watched it, the golden cloud came on, and on, till half the heavens were covered by its strange light, and then we could see the rain falling in heavy streams upon the distant hills, and coming toward our valley. The wind came next; and to its music "solemn and slow" the dense clouds still moved on, till only a little strip of the sky was left to us as a token that "the end was not yet;" and, indeed, some of our little ones were trembling, and even some of the elder ones saw more horror than beauty in this glorious scene. With the large drops of rain the strange light faded out and gave place to a greyish tint, and we thought the whole was gone; but soon the clouds were swept away from the west, and lay piled up in masses on our eastern mountain tops, and as peaceful a sky shone out upon us as if there had been no such novel working of nature. It was clear and bright, with light rose colored and purple cloudlets lying in it as in a sea of peace.

Now, at twilight, all is as usual, and this magnificent scene has melted away "like the baseless fabric of a dream," and nothing is left to us of what should have been the glory of painters to copy and poets to dream of. Oh, if you could have been here, some of your glowing sermons' words might in future years have brought to mind what now is left only to this unpractised pen.

I looked, while the tints were brightest, at the face of one of the gazers, and a light was shining upon and glorifying each feature such as we may imagine to have rested on the face of the martyr Stephen when he saw the heavens opened and Jesus standing on the right hand of God; and the thought came to me that to a loving, reverent eye this was also a glimpse of the majesty and glory that surrounds the throne above, before which the angels veil their faces; and let us, like them, bow down and cry "Holy! holy! holy Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come!" "Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honor and power: for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created!"

We had in our midst lately a venerable man of God, who will, too, soon form one of the company on high were now nearly all his contemporaries are gone, leaving us to tread with feeble and uncertain footsteps in the path which was to them so joyful a one. I allude to Dr. Nathan Bangs, now in his 77th year, with his head whitened "by the snows of many winters," and his heart already fixed upon his everlasting rest. It seems sad to see these venerated "Fathers in Israel," who have so long stood as faithful watchmen on the walls of Zion, now sinking to their rest. To some of us they have long been as landmarks in our loved Methodism, and to others the mention of their names brings up the fading remembrances of early childhood. But they have filled well their part in life, and leave behind them as our legacy a glorious memory.

But this dear old friend cannot yet rest from his labors, and yet tells, on nearly every Sabbath, this "wondrous tale" of redeeming love. The seed he now sows with trembling hand but most steadfast faith will spring up in many a rich harvest in coming years, and will add fresh jewels to the crown even now waiting to encircle his silvered locks.

MANUFACTURING MISSIONARIES.—Fifty-five young Abyssinians and negroes, selected by Austrian priests, have left Egypt for Italy, where they are to be educated as Roman Catholic priests.

RECANTATION.—At the late Roman Catholic Council in Baltimore there was a requiem mass for the repose of the soule of Bishops Barron and Gartland, who died of yellow fever in Savannah, last fall, on which occasion Dr. McCaffrey was the preacher. In his sermon he said, as the Sun reports him, that their bishops and priests remained at their posts, nobly doing their duty, "while a host of other ministers cowardly ran away from the scenes of danger." The Savannah papers indignantly denied this imputation, and gave abundant proof that it was altogether groundless. Whereupon Dr. McCaffrey writes a letter to the Sun, alleging that he "never said what was imputed to him, or anything equivalent to it."

NEW BOOKS.

THE LIFE OF REV. ROBERT NEWTON, D. D. By Thomas Jackson—12mo., pp. 408; price $1. Nashville: Stevenson & Owen.

We have rarely enjoyed so much pleasure in passing a work through the press as in the case of this volume. It is a most interesting and edifying biography. As soon as the work was published in London, it was severely criticised by certain editors, and we were almost led to fear that Dr. Jackson had failed in his undertaking. But on perusing the volume we found that the attacks on it were illiberal, not to say malicious. That there are defects in the work, we admit; but we are mistaken if it does not rank with the most popular biographies. We have introduced it to the American reader with the following preface:

"The subject of this biography was one whose praise is in the gospel throughout all the churches. Operating as a Methodist minister with almost unprecedented activity, popularity and usefulness for half a century, his life can scarcely fail to be of surpassing interest, especially to the Methodist reader. His official visit to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church made him personally known to thousands in our own country; and it was impossible to know him without admiring and loving him. When, therefore, it was announced that his intimate friend, Rev. Dr. Jackson, was writing his life, a great desire was expressed for its speedy publication and its prompt reissue from our press. Accordingly, the author executed his task with as much despatch as the nature of the case would allow, and we have lost no time in the republication of his interesting biography. This edition is an exact reprint of the London book, with the exception of a few errata in the names of persons and places this side the water, which we have of course corrected, and the addition of a few notes, which were deemed expedient for reasons which will be obvious to the judicious reader."

LIFE OF ALEXANDER THE GREAT—18mo., pp. 177; price, 30 cents. Nashville: Stevenson & Owen.

This volume was written by one who understood the subject on which he wrote. He has compressed a vast amount of useful knowledge in a small compass; the style of the work is good, and the moral tone excellent. It can scarcely fail to interest and profit the young, while it contains nothing unworthy the perusal of their seniors. It is, in short, one of that class of books desiderated by Dr. Arnold: "I never wanted articles on religious subjects half so much as articles on common subjects, written with a decidedly religious tone." It will be found a valuable addition to a Sunday school or family library, with special reference to which it has been carefully revised by the editor.

OUR HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

MANSFIELD, LA., July 28, 1855.

According to the appointment of the Conference, we attended the annual examination of the Mansfield Female College. Brother Walker's health, as you are aware, has totally failed, and he has returned to Kentucky. Brother Wright is absent also. Thus this task devolves on me alone. I give you, for the present, a fact or two only.

The exercises included from 26d to 27th of July, on the first of which the corner stone of the proposed new college was laid, and in which great interest was evinced—such as speaks the determination of the friends of the project. The three next succeeding days were employed in the examination of the classes in the various branches, and the last in commencement exercises.

A subscription with which to secure an apparatus, amounted to $1600, and a tea party or barbecue in the evening. Altogether, it was the most interesting time we have witnessed for many a day. It gives a new phase to our prospects in this section. The young ladies acquitted themselves with great credit.

The audience was larger than we have been accustomed to see on any occasion, from the first to the last. That we shall have a college building of a fine order very soon, is fixed. There were creditable addresses, suited to the several interests. A general expression of pleasure prevailed.

The next session will open first week in October. The same teachers continued in the several departments. I have not time to say more now, but purpose doing so soon. Success to Manasfield Female College.

R. RANDLE.

OPELOUSAS, LOUISIANA CONFERENCE, August 1, 1855.

Since my last we have had some interesting meetings on a portion of my circuit, and the prospect is brightening. In no portion of the Conference is there greater need of revival influences. We have to labor under many disadvantages; have but one local preacher on the circuit, Brother Frezee, and he employed on the St. Landry Colored Mission, where he is doing a good work. The circuit is too large and unwieldy. I have to ride upwards of three hundred miles in the course of four weeks, which gives no opportunity for pastoral visiting. I think it very unwise policy to take in more territory than we are able to cultivate. We have work for three preachers, and if we had the men, they would be sustained by the people. The health of the country is generally good; indeed much better than it has been for years at this season; the crops look fine, and will yield an abundant harvest if no casualty shall occur. REYNOLDS TRIPPETT.

AN EXCHANGE.—In return for the tiara sent by the Queen of Spain to the Pope, and which was valued at 2,000,000 reals, the Pope has sent her Majesty the body of Saint Felix, the martyr. We think the Pope has the best of the bargain.

OUR NASHVILLE CORRESPONDENCE.

NASHVILLE, July 31, 1855.

Mr. Editor—If any excuse for writing letters, when news items are as scarce as green leaves in the desert, could be valid, it would be in a wish to chat with a good natured editor like yourself.

Nashville is just now taking her summer nap. Many of our citizens have left in search of cool weather and rural pleasures, while we who are compelled, for various reasons, to remain in its heated atmosphere, have nothing to do but wish the absentees a pleasant time and seek to be contented at home. Not that there is anything to complain of, for the summer has been delightful until within a few days past, and, better still, the mosquitos have very considerately delayed their annual visit.

I said that Nashville is asleep. In some sense, this is true, but she is having a most excited dream. Political excitement, all but a dream at best, is at mania heat. Know Nothingism and anti-Know Nothingism, temperance and anti-temperance, are the topics of conversation in all circles. The merits and demerits of the opposing Gubernatorial candidates, Gentry and Johnson, are upon every tongue, and if there is any truth in the old saying about burning ears, these gentlemen must suffer great inconvenience at times. Vast amounts of money are said to be staked upon the election which comes off to-morrow. A stormy time is anticipated; and I have a notion not to go to the polls, as there is no insurance on my head.

Drs. McFerrin and Greene and Rev. A. R. Irwin have been away recently attending various college commencements, making addresses, &c., and have all returned in good health and spirits. Rev. Mr. Huston was not so fortunate, I understand, for having been taken sick on the way to LaGrange College, he returned home without having seen the new seat of learning.

The other gentlemen bring us wondrous accounts of the temerity shown by these institutions in conferring degrees. One good brother was made a D.D. who has been noted, it is said, for only two things, viz, an utter want of all the qualifications requisite for the legitimate possession of such an honor, and an anxious desire to possess it. There would perhaps have been no harm in gratifying his desire, had not the doing so involved the literary and theological reputation of the Church to which he belongs.

Speaking of the desire to possess this too often empty title, reminds me of an instance which is too good to be kept. There is a certain D. D., not a thousand miles from Tennessee, who actually wrote to the President of a venerable institution, shortly before one of the commencements, begging to have the degree conferred upon——himself! His request was properly spurned; but some time afterwards, a very small institution, elsewhere, bestowed the coveted honor, and I am told that this gentleman never fails to place the magic capitals after his own signature!

Dr. Sehon preached here on last Sabbath morning, and having attended a meeting of the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society, has left us again on his way to Western Virginia, Louisville and the Kentucky Conference.

Dr. Stevenson's health is much improved by his four or five weeks' rest, and he is at his post again. We had a capital sermon from him last Sunday night; one of the old sort that used to gladden the hearts of our fathers. As we know him better we love him more.

There are some admirable books now in press at the Publishing House, through the indefatigable exertions of Dr. Summers, one of the most patiently industrious men in the service of the Church.

We are all glad to learn that Rev. Robert A. Young, now of St. Louis, will be transferred to our Conference this fall.

There have been a few deaths from cholera in our city, but no threatening, as yet, of an epidemic. Rain is very abundant, and the market overflowing with fruits and vegetables. As is the case everywhere in our happy country, the crops in this State are unprecedentedly fine.

Our friend, C. D. Elliot, thinks I have done him injustice before his brethren. If he will say, in so many words, that dancing is not taught in his school, then I hold myself in readiness to make all the acknowledgments that one gentlemen can ask of another.

Very truly yours, CROTCHET.

ASSYRIAN ANTIQUITIES.—Byron complained of our scant knowledge of Assyrian life. His gorgeous drama of "Sardanapalus"—the conception of the hero, and the moral setting of the play—rose out of the poet's mind rather than from known materials. The scene was a creation. Thirty-five years have passed and, thanks to Rawlinson and Layerd, the English Court is with that of Egypt. Our knowledge, too, is daily deepening. Among the many curious illustrations of Assyrian life brought home by Col. Rawlinson from the East, and now on view at the British Museum—where they have been visited during the week by the Majesty of England—are, an alabaster vase, containing some remains of sweetmeats, various objects in gold and ivory, part of the throne of Sardanapalus, many inscriptions relating to the deeds of men celebrated in secular and sacred history—such as Nebuchadnezzar, Sardanapalus and Tiglath-Pileser—gems and other personal ornaments; together with a series of drawings, made by artists on the spot, from slabs impossible to bring away from their ancient resting places, representing the more heroic forms of antique relaxation—lion hunts, banquets, and the like. How strange to think of these spoils of the proud dynasty of Semiramis, after three thousand years, being visited in a London Museum by a lady who reigns in all feminine gentleness over a mightier empire than obeyed the "ancient beldame"—who from the ends of the earth stretched a benignant sceptre over that very India from which the successor of Ninus returned baffled and discomfitted.

Missionary Reports.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South.

EAST FELICIANA COL'N MISSION, July 28, 1855.

The Lord is carrying on his work on this mission. Last Sunday was a very interesting time. My meeting at Old Union, in the morning, was a very good one. When I entered the church the scene was awful, on account of the presence of God's Spirit. I first catechized the congregation, (men, women and children,) then gave a short discourse. On account of the feeling manifested I called up mourners. Some thirty came forward. From their sighs and pleadings for mercy I saw their convictions were pungent. Soon one confessed Christ, then another, and another. I opened the doors of the church; five joined; melting feeling through the congregation; some able exhortations from those who were blessed. Closed the meeting; hastened to Rev. J. B. Smith's, (Baptist clergyman;) organized a society; found eight persons who had been members; children all well catechized by a member of the family; had a very interesting meeting; some twelve or fourteen mourners.

The whole number joined since my last report is 108, some of whom are backsliders reclaimed. Our good old brother, J. Higginbothem, is to go round with me in September to administer the ordinance of baptism and the sacrament of the Lord's supper. I anticipate a happy time. May the Lord be with us and convert sinners!

WM. S. TOWNSEND.

CHUNNENUGGEE COLORED MISSION, Alabama Conference.

I send you a report of the Third Quarterly Conference for the above mission, which was held on Saturday, June 8, at Chunnenuggee. There have been 2 added to the church by letter the last quarter, and 16 on probation; 1 expelled, 1 died, and 6 children have been baptized. One new appointment has been added. About 90 children have received catechetical instruction. The most of the appointments are well attended, and good attention is generally given. I think the mission is generally prosperous. We often have refreshing times. A. TATOM.

Revival Intelligence.

SHARON DISTRICT, MISS. CONF., July 30, 1855.

I should have informed the friends of Zion, through your paper, long since, of a gracious revival of religion at Philadelphia, on the Philadelphia Circuit, Miss. Conf.

With the assistance of some other brethren we held a meeting at the above named place, embracing the fourth Sabbath in June and the first Sabbath in this month, which resulted in the conversion of about 40 souls and an accession of 53, I believe, to the Methodist, and some 9 or 10 were divided between the Old School, Cumberland Presbyterian and Baptist Churches. There were many interesting circumstances attending upon this truly encouraging meeting. First, the work of Divine Grace was deep, thorough and more general than I have ever seen, taking the community altogether. Every business house and workshop, and even to the drinking shops, were more promptly closed at the sound of the church bell for fifteen days together, and there was not half a dozen men in the place who did not give some token of deep interest on the subject of religion. Several leading men of the place, who had had misunderstandings, were all happily reconciled in the presence of the whole congregation.

During the meeting we had the aid of Bro. Sibley, the pastor in charge, Bro. Seals, a most efficient local preacher, Bro. Thomas, O. S. P., and Bros. Fincher and Ross, C. P. I never saw brethren of the same branch of the Church more united than the Methodist and Presbyterian brethren on this occasion. We communed in spirit together and around the sacramental board. Altogether it was one of the happiest seasons I have ever enjoyed.

The prospect for good, in some parts of my District, is flattering. But I am pained to confess that, for the most part, there is barrenness of spirit in the Church, and too great indifference among the unconverted. The preachers are all faithful men, and trying to do their duty. We pray and hope for better times. Pray for us. H. J. HARRIS, P. E.

SHARON CIRCUIT, MISS. CONF., July 24, 1855.

A protracted meeting of ten days at Soulo Chepol was closed yesterday. The results were 41 conversions and 13 accessions among the white, and 27 among the colored people, the healing of backsliders and revival of the true disciples of Christ. We were truly glad to see members of other denominations taking so much interest in the meeting and enjoying it so much.

The local brethren of the circuit and Bro. J. W. Adams, of Vernon Mission, did good and valuable service during the meeting.

There have been 109 accessions to the Church on the circuit during the present conference year. I have baptized 110 in all. May this precious work spread and roll on over the whole country. Amen.

H. H. MONTGOMERY.

P. S.—Since writing the above the examination of the students of Sheron Female College has come off. They acquitted themselves well, giving general satisfaction. On the last day, Thursday, 26th, the Trustees resolved to shoulder the old debt of over $[illegible]. An appeal was made to the congregation for an additional subscription.

PREACHING TO THE CONSCIENCE.

Years have passed away since a young man, who had enjoyed the advantages of religious education, said to a minister, after a very plain and pointed sermon which had made several persons very uneasy, "Proceed, sir, in your usual style of preaching. You may imagine, from the air of difference which we assume in public, that your sermons produce no effect. It is a mistake, sir. They make us wretched. To bring before our imaginations all the scenes of home, when our parents taught us to revere the name of Jesus; they drive us to our wit's end; they make us dread futurity, and sometimes compel us to pray. You have our consciences on your side; and though we laugh when we ought to weep, yet we feel and must ultimately yield either to grace or to [illegible]."

This is no picture of fancy, but a reality. Yes, and such facts constantly occur under the preaching of every faithful advocate of Christ. The Word of God will wound the conscience, and though the preacher may be persecuted, the truth will triumph sooner or later be confessed. Not very long since a pastor in New England preached a sermon against dancing. As several of his hearers loved the amusement, no small degree of indignation was raised against him. But one of his hearers said to another, "After all, we know, and you know, that what he said is true." Let such a seed be admitted, and sooner or later good will be done; and, where there is even of more importance, the Great Master will be pleased with his servants.

CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

It is by these very Scriptures that we first and chiefly taught how to know God and how to accept of him. Then let us read his blessed revelation into our hands, and the image may be admitted, let us feel, as he who is blind feels, the person and face, until by little and little the counterfeit grows into his soul that the lineaments lovely, and then that they are found and at last that they are most precious. Thus if we begin, even in our blindness, to handle the word of life, it will grow upon us with a gentle and mighty power, until our very weakness is made strength, and our darkness is made light. Let us sit down at the feet of Jesus and learn of him. Though his words be strange to us at first, they grow more and more find a lodgment and a response within us. They alone, but fully, can divide between the joints and the marrow, the soul and spirit of man. The lone wayfaring man may appear to us rough and uncomeliness, and his solemn and tender words may sound strange to us at the din of life. Nevertheless, let us arise and follow him. As we walk by his side we shall feel those words which once we could not stood not burn within us, as though celestial fire had fallen upon our souls; his favor becomes life to us; his loving kindness better than life! O taste and see that the Lord is good!—R. J. Breckenridge, D. D.

PREACHING THE GOSPEL.—There are two methods of presenting the gospel: the one to unfold it as a principle of doctrine, the other as a provision for souls. In the former case every part is made to fit into some theological schema, and in the other every truth is made to suit the nature and meet the wants of mind. The former method has been in use for ages, and the world is tired of it; the importance of the latter is beginning to be felt more deeply than ever, and the most thinking teachers of every church are employing it with energy and success. This was the method that Jesus adopted. He spoke not to systems, but to souls. His words were spirit and life. This seems to be the only method of preaching the gospel so as to realize the grand design..... The preaching of [illegible] ministers should, like that of Christ to the multitude, be so far practical as to have the evident tendency to convert men from their present practice; or if they have, in the main, been already thus converted, to make them still go on examining and improving their practice in a thousand particulars. The ear to hear the minister should be a [illegible] quence of having a desire of this practical amendment in the heart.—Thornton.

PRAY ALWAYS.—"How often have you prayed?" said a mother to her son. "Once." "Only once! and when was that?" "I began about two years ago, and have continued to pray ever since." This son became a distinguished minister.

Ten poor men can sleep tranquily upon a mat, but two kings are not able to live in peace in a quarter of the world.

Patience is a tree whose roots are bitter, but the fruit is very sweet.

The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom.

Truth is an inexhaustible fountain, of which nobody knows how much he draws

Deaths.

—, daughter of Col. S. H. and Mrs. S. M. Taylor, of Ponteted county, Miss., departed this life on Sunday, July 15, 1855. She was ill only a few days, but her suffering was intense. This sudden and afflicting dispensation of Divine Providence is felt keenly by the bereaved parents. But they "sorrow not as those who have no hope;" for while they know that she will not return to them, they feel assured that, through Christ, they can go to her. R. ADAMS.

WAR DEPARTMENT.—Indian Hostilities—A new policy adopted.—From a letter recently received from the frontier of Texas, we make the following extract:

"The policy of pushing our military posts higher up into the mountains is a good one. We must reach the hostile Indians there in their villages, and if they are to be punished at all, these are the places to make the punishment exemplary. Their squaws, their children, their horses and mules are here, and when a village is destroyed, the fortress of the indian is an irreparable ruin, and fighting must cease. In these villages they prepare for war. Here the squaws make the quiver and fill it with arrows. Here the lance and the shield are made and tried, and here the hordes are trained and prepared for battle, and here the boys are taught the art of Indian war. These villages, therefore, are their material strength. They are at once the Indian armory, arsenal and military school. It is a small matter with them that we occasionally cut of their small parties on the plains while their mountain strength is unimpaired."

Later from Europe.

ARRIVAL OF THE ASIA.

HALIFAX, August 1.—The Royal Mail Steamship Asia, Capt. Lott, from Liverpool on the 21st ult., arrived here at half-past two o'clock this morning.

The Asia left here at four o'clock this morning, and will be due at Boston about noon on Thursday. The Washington sailed from Southampton for New York on the 18th of July, with 210 passengers. The Cunard steamship Arabia was at Liverpool, embarking troops for the seat of war.

The War.

The general prospects of the war, at home and abroad, were not very encouraging. Partial successes before Sebastopol have, however, revived the drooping spirits of the army, although the small reported losses of the Allies show that the successes were not of importance.

Pelissier, whose character suffered much after the repulse of the 18th of June, was regaining confidence, and from the strength of the French works, now close advanced towards the Malakoff, there is a probability of its early capture.

A dispatch from Gen. Simpson is published, giving an account of the embarkation of the body of Lord Raglan for England. Pelissier placed a garland of immortelles on the coffin, and the French troops formed an avenue of men six miles long, from the camp to the sea.

The following are the latest dispatches: Under date of July 16th, 11 P. M., Gen. Pelissier telegraphs—"The enemy, who had for some days endeavored in vain to stop our left approaches in front of the Malakoff Tower, attempted last night to drive us back, but they were repulsed by the first division of the second corps. Three times the Russians threw themselves upon our trenches with their usual shouting, but after each attempt they were compelled to retreat by the steady fire and calm attitude of our soldiers, leaving behind them many of their slain."

July 17th—General Simpson telegraphs: "Nothing of importance has occurred. The army is in good health." July 18th he telegraphs: "A sortie, made on the left attack, was repulsed, with only three casualities on the British side."

The Paris Patrie, of July 10th, says: "According to the news received this morning, the Russians attempted another sortie last night about ten o'clock, against the batteries of Careaing Bay, and were vigorously repulsed. Letters say that the Russian ships begin to suffer from the French mortar battery, on the side of Quarantine Bay, and deserters say that the rations of the shipping are reduced one-half.

The French have cleared Kamiesch of all suspicious persons and have established a municipality.

The British General Eyre has had a leg amputated. General Sir John Campbell died within Sebastopol, and under a flag of truce his sword was returned.

The Army in the Field.

The Sardinian and Turkish forces have again withdrawn from the valley of Baldar to Balaklava. This may indicate either another modification in the plan of campaign, or that field operations against the Russians have been abandoned. The report is confirmed that the Russians have received reinforcements. Gortschakoff has written to St. Petersburgh acknowledging their arrival.

The Black Sea.

Another sea expedition is fitting out, but the destination is unknown. It is supposed to be either against Odessa, or to relieve the Turks hard pressed in Anatolia, and perhaps it may be for operations on the Danube. Four thousand Turks are in the Dobrutscha, where reinforcements of French and English are expected.

Asia.

Reliable accounts to June 23d state that the Russian army, under Gen. Murevieff, had invested Kars, while a small corps d'armee had advanced upon Kutal, and was pressing the Turkish garrison of Batoum. The Russians number 30,000, and the Turks 15,000, under Vasseff Pasha and Gen. Williams. The Russians are bringing siege guns from Gumri, and the situation of the Turks is critical unless they render Kars a second Silistria. The Russians hold the roads to Erzeroum.

The Austrian troops in the Principalities are being proportionably reduced, and the men conveyed home to Hungary, come to Vienna.

The Baltic.

Nine British ships were reconnoitering approaches to Abo.

The Russian official journal of Helsingfors, complains that on July 3d, six English boats came into the small harbor of Kimma, district of Abo, under the false pretext of a flag of truce, and plundered the shipping, until fired on by a detachment of Chasseurs.

No intelligence concerning the movements of the main body of the allied forces had been received.

Germanic Relations.

The London Morning Chronicle publishes the text of an Austrian circular, dated June 28th, to the Germanic Diet. The document speaks strongly for peace, and also says that Austria will continue to hold the Principalities till peace be restored. Austria further asks the Germanic Confederation to maintain its present attitude. A telegraphic dispatch says the Diet has replied that present circumstances do not call for fresh measures, and the Diet does not contemplate extending its obligations or engagements.

It is stated in Vienna, that a better understanding exists between the Austrian and Prussian Cabinets, and that their action in the Federal Diet will be identical. There is also a rumor—scarcely creditable, however—that the Allies propose that the Crimea be given to Turkey, the Principalities to Austria and Lombardy to Sardinia. England and France to have contingent advantages.

Great Britain.

Mr. Roebuck's motion for a vote of censure on the Government, after being debated at great length, was thrown out in the House of Commons by a majority of 107; the numbers being—for the motion 182, against it 289. The debate occupied twenty-six columns of the London Times. The Palmerston Ministry has thus a new lease of life.

It is stated that Sir William Molesworth will succeed Lord John Russell as Colonial Secretary, and that Sir Benjamin Hall will be Commissioner of Works, without a Cabinet seat, and Sir John Shelly, President of the Board of Health.

Parliamentary business, other than the above has been unimportant.

A committee has been investigating into the police outrages in the recent Hyde Park demonstrations. Anthony Gibbe & Sons, of London, are appointed financial agents of Peru.

Dr. Arnoud, Napoleon's St. Helena doctor, is dead.

France.

The Moniteur contains a decree modifying the import duties on several articles.

The sum set apart for the expense of the Fete Napoleon, on the 18th of August, is to be distributed to the widows and orphans of the war. Five hundred Russians, now at Toulon, are to be exchanged at Odessa for French prisoners of June 18th.

Spain.

Don Escalante is appointed Minister to Washington in room of M. Cueto.

A telegraphic message from Madrid says the rupture with Rome is complete, the Roman Chargo having demanded his passport on the 16th, on account of the passage of the Church Property Bill.

The Black Warrior dispute with the United States is definitely settled by the indemnity of a million reals.

The French mail had been again stopped by the insurgents near Burgos. Ten Carlists were shot on the 10th at Gironne. Some skirmishes occurred at Burgos, in which the loss on either side was trifling. Among the killed, however, was General Arnace, brother-in-law of Cabrecras. Barcelona had become quiet once more. The treaty with the Dominican Republic is authorised by the Cortes.

Italy.

France, England and Sardinia, are said to have expressed their formal disapproval of the purposed league of the Italian States. The Turin papers speak of an attempted insurrection in the Duchy of Modena, and arrests had been made at Spezzia, Carrara, Massi, Leviei, and elsewhere.

Owing to the troubled state of Italy, the French garrison at Rome has been reinforced by a thousand more men.

Mazzini publishes a letter in the Genoa papers warning Italians against Bonapartist intrigues.

Germany.

Most of the small German States are preparing to disarm. The resignation of the Hanoverian Cabinet is hourly expected, and it is said Count Platen will be the new Premier.

Capt. Merryman, of the American bark Undine, has been the first to refuse payment of the Hanoverian State dues. He refused to show his papers, yet was permitted to proceed to Hamburg and deliver his cargo.

Denmark.

The Danish Government is understood to have replied to the United States in a long document, regretting that the Cabinet at Washington had not given longer notice of its intention respecting the non-payment of Sound dues, especially in the present crisis, when Denmark's neighbors are endeavoring to draw her into a war; and further, that the abolition of Sound dues would be a loss of many thousands of dollars to Denmark, and a saving of not more than $200 annually to the shipping of the United States.

Denmark, therefore, considers it impossible on the short notice to comply, and believes that other nations will regard America's demand unfavorably.

Russia.

A Vienna letter in the Cologne Gazette reports that marked differences have arisen between the Czar and his Brother Constantine, and that the journey of the Prince of Prussia to St. Petersburg is for the purpose of acting as mediator.

Commercial Intelligence.

In the Liverpool Cotton market there had been rather more activity than during the week preceding, the sales reaching 40,000 bales, of which but a small proportion was on speculation.

The advices from the United States had exercised a rather depressing effect during the early part of the week, but the market subsequently rallied, and closed at about previous rates.

Provisions generally are dull, but quotations, except for lard, which was slightly lower, had not been reduced.

Breadstuffs—Wheat and Flour were steady at former quotations, but in Indian Corn a further decline of 3s per quarter had taken place. The weather had been moderately favorable for agricultural purposes.

The London Money Market was easier.

Consols closed at the same figure as on the previous Friday—namely, 91.

THE STORM.—Since Saturday morning, to the time of penning this article, rain has fallen with scarcely a cessation, and at times in perfect torrents, impelled with violence by a high wind, which has prevailed from southerly points of the compass. It was feared that we should experience a second edition of the storm of August, 1852, and, indeed, there was great reason to dread a repetition of that disastrous visitation of wind and water, for the lower streets were flooded. The water rose so that boats were plying on Water street, north of St. Louis; Commerce street, of course, being overflowed the greater part of its extent. Having reached this height, the waters receded, having done but little damage, the rise being so gradual that three was permitted to remove merchandise and property which would have been injured. The steamer Junior and Southern Star were unable to run as usual, there, however, on account of the difficulty of landing passengers than for fear of the small gale which prevailed in the bay. Awnings and trees suffered considerably, but the damage in the city is light in the aggregate, and still lighter individually.

The railroad track suffered not a little by washing, etc., and we are informed that a day or two will elapse before the regular trains are resumed. On the whole, we should be extremely thankful that we have been let off so easily, for if the rise had been a few inches higher, there would have been cause, indeed, for lamentation. The weather is not yet (Monday evening) entirely settled, nor will it be until the wind chops round to a more favorable quarter. [Mobile Advertiser, 7th.

THE NEW DOME ON THE CAPITOL.—About twenty men are now employed in preparing the timbers; the work of building the scaffolding will be commenced in the rotunda this first week in August, and a month at least will be occupied in putting it up.

The old dome is to be taken down entirely to the roof of the Capitol, and a base constructed of 25 feet in height and 132 feet in diameter, somewhat of an octagonal plain. On this stands a noble colonnade of 128 feet in diameter, consisting of 36 columns, with appropriate intablatures, balustrades, etc., etc., etc., from which rises an encircled attic of 38 feet in height by 107 feet in diameter. This attic forms the base of the cupola, the diameter of which is 88 feet, and the height 56 feet. The whole is crowned by a gracefully proportional lantern, supporting a colossal statue of the goddess of liberty.

The entire elevation from the ground on the eastern front of the building is 300 feet.

The interior is exceedingly rich, and the ornaments are of a bold and striking character. The present rotunda is preserved as high as the top of the cornice; above this will be a gallery, over which a belt of sculpture nine feet high, and nearly 300 feet long, extends round the entire dome. Above this there is a succession of galleries, colonnades, intablatures, attics, and balustrades, surrounded by a hemispherical ceiling, crowned with a lantern at the height of 218 feet from the floor.

The highest point of look-out is 275 feet above the ground on the eastern front, and the highest point from which the interior may be seen is 218 feet above the floor.

The whole work is to be of iron, from bottom to top, inside and outside. It will be the first structure of the kind ever built entirely of this material. The design, as well as the working drawings, is by Mr. Walker, the architect of the Capitol extension. [Washington Union.

LAGER BIER—HOW IT IS MADE.—An interesting lager bier trial came off in Petersburg, Va., on Saturday, in which interesting lager bier statistics were brought out on oath, and may, therefore be believed. Mr. Soloman Keyser was the defendant, and was charged with keeping a disorderly bier saloon. A very respectable German witness in the case defined what lager bier was. He said it was manufactured of malt and hops, and to make it bitter an extra amount of the latter was thrown in—that was bier. This compound was placed in a barrel lined with a casing of rosin, and was laid in a cellar, from which laylag in store was derived the name lager. This was lager bier, or "stock ale." The witness thought it might hurst a man, but would not make him drunk. He had known German ladies in New York and Philadelphia to put 17 to 20 glasses (pints) under their wastebands in one day and never feel the effects.

KIT-CAT BANKS.—The Baltimore Sun says the public, especially the western public, will have to look out for a flood of Georgia and Tennessee kink kit-cat issues. New banks are in course of organization there, the issues of whose notes are to be made at Chicago and at other western points. Chicago firms are interested in them. The last one we have heard of is the Agricultural Bank of Brownsville, Tennessee, the stock of which is owned at Chicago. Parties should be aware of such issues purporting to be made from distant parts. The western farmer had better insist on gold, or the notes of banks near home and of ready redemption.

THE KINNEY EXPEDITION

NEW YORK, Aug. 6.—The steamship Northern Light has arrived from San Juan, with dates from San Francisco to the 16th ult., and near one million in gold.

Judge Chambers, late of the firm of Page, Bacon & Co., had charged frauds to the amount of $400,000 against J. C. Woods, member of the late firm of Adams & Co., which firm it is said has been engaged for years in palming off inferior dust on Messrs. Page, Bacon & Co.

From Nicaragua we learn that Col. Walker and his expedition were at Realeja. Kinney and twenty-four followers arrived at San Juan on the 16th ult. His party was engaged in erecting a building. There was said to be much dissatisfaction among them.

Appointments.

WASHINGTON, August 6.—Judge Moore, of Alabama, has been appointed Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of Kansas, vice Rush Elmore removed on the same grounds as Governor Reeder.

Mr. Harris, of New York, has been appointed Consul to Japan, under the Perry treaty.

Tennessee Election.

Returns from East Tennessee show immense gains for Gentry, the American candidate, who is undoubtedly elected Governor.

New York Market.

NEW YORK, Aug. 4.—Our Cotton market is firm. The sales of the last three days have been 7500 bales. Breadstuffs are easier but not lower.

NEW YORK, August 6.—Our Cotton market is still firm at 11¼ cents per pound for Middling Orleans. Flour is a trifle higher. Corn is unchanged, with a moderate demand. Pork is easier, but not quotably lower.

NEW YORK, August 7.—Cotton is firm. Flour unchanged, with a moderate demand. Corn is a trifle higher.

Massachusetts.

SPRINGFIELD, Mass., August 7.—In the Know-Nothing State Convention, which was in session here to-day, resolutions were reported declaring that slavery is sectional and liberty national. They also favor the allowing of naturalized Protestants to join the order.

The Yellow Fever at Portsmouth.

NORFOLK, Va., August 7.—The yellow fever is increasing at Portsmouth. Half the population have left the place in consequence.

Kentucky Election—Terrible Riot in Louisville.

LOUISVILLE, August 6.—The returns to hand indicate the election of the Know-Nothing candidate for Governor in this State.

A terrible riot occurred in this city to-night. Several persons were killed and wounded. A mob is marching up to the Courier office with cannon in their possession.

LOUISVILLE, August 7.—Twenty persons were killed and twelve houses burned during the riot in this city last night.

Alabama Election.

MOBILE, August 6.—This county gives over six hundred majority for the American ticket. Shorthridge, the American candidate for Governor, leads his ticket.

This district will give Walker, the American candidate for Congress, over six hundred majority over Stallworth, the Anti-American candidate.

Baldwin county is reported to have given a majority of 75 for Walker. Clarke county is reported to have given a majority for Stallworth of 165.

In Marengo county, as far as heard from, Walker is ahead.

Returns to hand from twenty-two counties in Southern and Eastern Alabama give Shortridge, the American candidate for Governor, more than 1500 majority over Winston, Democrat.

North Carolina Election.

COLUMBIA, S. C., Aug. 6.—The returns to hand from North Carolina indicate that Messrs. Paine, Puryear and Reade, Know-Nothings, and Messrs. Winslow, Branch, Ruffit and Craig, Democrats, are elected to Congress. From Clingman's district we have no returns.

Later.—The counties in Clingman's district which have been heard from have gone against him, and it is believed he is defeated.

MORMON CONFERENCE AT HOLY ISLAND—Effigies of Men Hung on a Gallows.—A party of some fifty odd persons left Beaver Island on the 13th July to attend the conference on Holy Island, and made the passage across Lake Michigan in fish boats, camping on shore at night. The next day the settlers were gathered together, and brought in in boats. Congratulations were exchanged, and then the ensign was run up on a staff, fastened in the top of a tall maple, and the service commenced They consisted of a relation of the persecutions suffered by the Mormons, and especially the efforts to dispossess them of that country, and a solemn thanksgiving and praise of God for their happy deliverance from civil war and from threatened persecution. After the administrations of sacraments, etc., the conference closed, and the camp broke up. The day after conference the men and women went together to the mouth of Pine river and erected n gallows, and hung in effigy the men who made the murderous attack on two leads of unarmed Mormons there two years since. Had the men been in hand instead of the effigies they would have doubtless shared the same fate. The following day all hands went to work and put up the body of a synagogue, for a future place of worship. It is a blockhouse of excellent workmanship. On the sixth day all returned, happy with their excursion. [Buffalo Democracy, July 27.

ON THE OCEAN TWELVE DAYS IN A SMALL BOAT.—By the arrival of the ship Louis Napoleon, on Saturday, we have the following miraculous escape of two men, who had been drifting about on the ocean twelve days in a small boat. Three men started from a schooner to go fishing, and owing to the dense fog on the Banks was lost sight of:

July 10, latitude 47 deg 38 min., longitude 45 deg. 57 min., fell in with a sail picked up a small boat from the Portuguese fishing schooner Azorio, from Lisbon, fishing on the Banks. The boat contained two men; the mate, who had been with them, died two days previously. They report, 28th June, in lat. 45 deg., longitude 50 deg., seven boats left the schooner for the purpose of fishing when a thick fog came on and they lost sight of the schooner, and had been drifting about twelve days when picked up by the Louis Napoleon. They had plenty of provisions in the boat, but had no water for three days. Their names are Jose de Silina, Antonio Mondez. The mate who died was named A. Manuel. They were brought to this port. N. Y. Times, 30th ult.

ROT IN THE COTTON.—A friend, yesterday, left at our office a part of a cotton stalk, upon which were two open bolls of cotton, one sound boll and nineteen bolls affected by the rot—and most of them entirely rotten.

We learn further that this is not by any means an unusual specimen—the rot having appeared in many places to a great extent.

The planter, in whose field the specimen in question grew, informs us that it will not surprise him if he only makes 25 or 30 bales, instead of 150, as he expected ten days ago. The disease is not confined to his plantation; it has appeared on all the surrounding plantations. The worst feature about the present rot is its early appearance. Last year it began in September, and cut the crop off a great deal. Beginning now in July, if not arrested, it will do much greater injury. [Natchez Courier, 3d inst.

Sir James Graham accused of Treason.

The subjoined correspondence was read at a meeting of the Sheffield committee for investigating foreign affairs, held at the Council Hall of the town. The occasion was a motion requesting Mr. Roebuck, the member for Sheffield, to move the appointment of a committee to inquire into the Baltic expedition of last year. Mr. Ironside, the originator of the motion, stated that, in consequence of hearing that the whole of the correspondence between Sir Charles Napier and Sir James Graham was in the hands of Mr. Grant, of the London Morning Advertiser, he wrote to that gentleman, and received the following reply:

LONDON, June 11th, 1855.

Dear Sir—I had in my possession for six weeks the whole correspondence—the originals which passed between Sir James Graham and Sir Charles Napier, from the clearing of the Baltic expedition last year to its return; but I returned it to Sir Charles Napier a month ago. I got the documents, which I need not say are of infinite importance, on the understanding that I should not give them out of my hands, and no prohibition as to showing them to friends, and had you chanced to call on me me while they were in my possession, I should have had much pleasure in showing them to you. I have no hesitation in saying that if I have any idea of what evidence is, these letters would suffice, with other facts of undoubted accuracy, to convict Sir James Graham of treason.

Yours, JAMES GRANT."

On receipt of this, Mr. Ironside wrote to Sir Charles Napier, asking permission to see the letters. He received the subjoined answer:

"Morchiston Hornlean, June 17, 1855.—Sir: Mr. Grant has told you the truth. I did not give those letters to him to publish, because I might have been accused of giving my plans of attack to the enemy; but when it is decided not to attack the ports I pointed out, and when there is no danger of publication, I shall go to Lord Palmerston and ask him if he will give the papers to the House; and if he refuses, I shall publish them—whatever is the consequence to myself."

"I have no hesitation in saying, had I done what Sir James Graham wished me to do, plainly expressed in letters both public and private, I should have lost her Majesty's fleet; and I think Sir James Graham deserves impeachment for goading me to do in the winter what he was advising me not to do in the summer. Roebuck was so successful with his Sebastopol committee that he ought to take up the Baltic. Sir James Graham has been publicly accused by me of perverting my (query, his?) letters, and of endangering the Queen's fleet, and that accusation ought not to lie dormant. Were I in Parliament, it should not sleep for twenty-four hours. I do not think it right to send you the papers, but would be glad to show them to you had I an opportunity. I remain, yours very truly. CHARLES NAPIER.

Mr. Ironside's motion was carried by the town meeting; but we have seen no notice in the English parliamentary reports of Mr. Roebuck having yet acted upon it. [N. Y. Com. Adv.

A Beautiful Sentiment.

"The moon looks calmly down, when man is dying,
The earth still holds her way;
Flowers breathe their perfume, and the winds keep sighing;
Naught seems to pause or stay."

Clasp thy hands meekly over the still breast—they've no more work to do; close the weary eyes—they've no more tears to shed; part the damp locks—there's no more pain to bear. Closed is the ear alike to love's kind voice, and calumny's stinging whispers.

O, if in that stilled heart you have ruthlessly planted a thorn; if from that pleading eye you have carelessly turned away; if your loving glance, and kindly word, and clasping hand, have come—all too late—than God forgive you! No frown gathers on the marble brow as you gaze—no scorn curls the chiseled lip—no flush of wounded feeling mounts to the blue-veined temple.

God forgive you! for your feet, too, must shrink appalled from death's cold river—your faltering tongue asks: "can this be death?" Your fading eye lingers lovingly on the sunny earth; your clammy hands yields its last feeble flutter.

O, rapacious grave! yet another victim for thy voiceless keeping! What! no words of greeting from the household sleepers? No warm welcome from a sister's loving lips? No throb of pleasure from the dear maternal bosom? Silent all!

If, if these broken limbs were never gathered up! If beyond death's swelling flood there were no eternal shore! If for the struggling bark there were no port of peace! If athwart that lowering cloud sprang no bright bow of promise!

Alas for love if this be all,
And naught beyond—no earth.

CONCORDIA.—We clip the following items from the Concordia Intelligencer, of Friday last:

The body of an unknown person was found floating in the river, on Sunday evening, the 22d inst., by George W. Green, Esq., about 15 miles below this place. His head had been severed from his body, leaving the scalp of the back portion only. He appeared to have been a man of medium size and middle age. His feet were small, hands delicate, finger nails trimmed with great care, and did not indicate laboring man. His clothing consisted of a woolen net undershirt, cotton shirt, and small plaid nottonado pants. When discovered he did not have the appearance of having been dead many days. A coroner's inquest was held on the body.

THE ROT IN COTTON.—We are concerned to hear that a destructive rot, caused by the frequent and heavy rains, has invaded many of the extensive plantations on both sides of the Mississippi. Hot and sotried weather may arrest or remedy the now threatening evil.

We learn from a reliable Natchez gentleman, who came from Bayan Sara on the steamer Primess, Wednesday evening, that quite a number of yellow fever cases had been imported into Bayou Sara by the packets plying between New Orleans and that place. On Monday, the present week, two had died who were landed from packets, and the others remained sick. Two were told that the cases were of a very virulent character.

Rapid imitations of Noah's deluge took place in the parish of Pointe Coupee last week on Thursday and Friday evenings. In all the previous showers of the present year the earth had drank in and absorbed the full of rain; but on Friday last the vast ditches which drain the immense alluvions of Polate Coupee plantations, run like mill-races, filled to the brim, but soon subsiding after the tremendous outpouring of the weeping heavens.

THE WILL AND THE WAY.—I learned grammar when I was a private soldier, on the pay of sixpence a day. The edge of my berth, or that of my guard-bed, was my seat to study in; my knapsack my book-case, and a bit of board lying on my lap was my writing-table. I had no money to purchase a candle or oil; in winter; it was rarely that I could get any light but that of the fire, and only my turn even of that. To buy a pen or piece of paper, I was compelled to forego some portion of my food, though in a state of half starvation. I had not a moment of time that I could call my own; and I had to read and write amid the talking, laughing, singing, whistling and bawling of at least half a score of the most thoughtless men—and that, too, in their hours of freedom from all control. And I say, if I, under these circumstances, could encounter and overcome the task—is there, can there be, in the whole world, a youth who can find an excuse for the non-performance! [Cobbett.

PROOF OF MONSTER GUNS.—Mr. Nasmyth, of Patricroft, who is making the monster guns for the Horatio, has nearly finished the first gun, which, we believe, will be ready for trial in a few days. It was arranged that this gun should be tested on the North Shore, at Liverpool, and this we hope and believe will be done, as originally intended. Military and scientific men from all parts of the country will be present on the occasion. These guns, with their carriages, will weigh fifty tons each, and will carry a shot half a ton weight a distance of four miles. It will take two and a quarter barrels of powder, or 225 pounds for a charge. Guns like these must add a new feature to the destructive engines of modern warfare, particularly against such stone walls as those of Constradt and Sebastopol.] Liverpool Times.

A SONG OF LABOR.

BY MARY ANN WHITAKER.

Thank God for those true earnest men,
Ordained by Him to bless
The busy world with honest toil,
And southern happiness.
John Bull and Brat to welcome them,
The great ocean of the earth,
Who obtained the foulowest rights heartwood
On all of noble birth;
For spirits of such lofty mould!
Are noble, though shrouded
By paupers, bodily wrongs clippers
Of worldly rank and pride.

Like pillars round some grand old pile,
They stand in concious power;
To give support and beauty
High domes of thought, which tower
Above the trembling prison-walls
Of vanity and sin,
Reared by self-loving Pharisees
To hide the wrong within;
Yea the strong arm of manliness
Alone is firm and sure;
To bear the social rights
And make its fame endure.

May Heaven its choicest blessings give,
To dwell within the heart
Of every faithful son of toil
Who bravely does his part;
And every voice owe their worth,
And willing hands extend
To grasp the rough but honest palm,
And hail the laborer—Friend!
Ye week of faith, throw off the chains,
Which custom binds around
Your souls, and fetters brothers live
On God's own holy ground.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS.

We cannot bid our sky-birds remain,
Our chords continue round;
We cannot say to an egad-back,
Stoop not towards the ground.

We cannot bid our dim eyes see
Things as bright as ever,
Nor tell our friends, though friends from youth,
That they'll forsake us never.

But we can say, I never will—
False world, be false for them;
And oh, Sound Truth and Old Regard,
Nothing shall part us from.

THE OPELOUSAS RAILROAD.

The Thibodaux Minerva, of the 4th, concludes an excellent notice of a jollification had over the completion of the bridge across Bayou La Fourche, in the annexed encouraging language. The bridge is a most elegant and substantial one, and was planned and executed under the superintendence of Mr. G. W. R. Bayley, Chief Engineer of the company:

It may not be improper or out of place to state that the work on the road west of the Lafourche to Berwick's Bay is progressing with the greatest rapidity. The rails are now down from the bridge in within less than a mile of the Terrebonne at Mrs Tauner's, where a depot for Thibodaux and the upper portion of Terrebonne will soon be built. This section of the road (between the Lafourche and Terrebonne) will be entirely completed and the cars running upon it by the 10th inst. Upwards of two miles of the track from Tigerville towards the Terrebonne have already been laid; and it is confidently expected that the entire section, twelve miles, will be completed and in running order by the first of October next—one month sooner than was at first anticipated. This will secure to the road the coming season at least 50,000 hogsheads of sugar and from 75 to 100,000 barrels of molasses, besides other freights; together with all the travel between the Attakapas and Opelousas countries and New Orleans. We also learn with pleasure that the company is now in negotiation with the Post Office Department at Washington for carrying the mail, which will afford an additional revenue to the company. In our opinion the prospects of the road—the most important of any now being built in the South—are the most flattering; and all should consider it a special duty to help the road upon most in their wishes. As Mr. Wilcox's entire will be about $1,500, he will make a handsome speculation, should the river not rise pretty soon and enable the steamboats to anticipate him. If now has the offer of more freight than he wants to take up with him, at his own price. He expects to leave in a few days, and that his craft will breast the "muddy Mississippi" at the rate of about five miles an hour. He will himself be captain, clerk and engineer, and will have a crew of six subordinates to assist him. The Champagnola through a most droll-looking craft excites as much admiration as amusement with those who see her, and she will certainly create a sensation up Ouachita. We commend the enterprise of Mr. Wilcox, and hope that he will meet with the success he merits.

BAD LOT.—The case of Mrs. Graham, a poor seamstress, residing at No. 13 Philippe, or rather Dryades street, is a peculiarly sad and unfortunate one. She is cursed with a husband addicted to intemperance and its kindred evils, and she (her bad him arrested, time and time again for beating and otherwise maltreating her, and preventing her from earning a subsistence for herself and children. A few weeks since she had him arrested for violently beating her; and, not being able to furnish bail, he was sent to the parish prison. Since then, Mrs. Graham has received information of the death of a distant daughter—a sad thing to her in her trobious times, but not as sad as what was still in store for her. About a month since her son Joseph, a lad

HOEING IN DRY WEATHER.—Experience has fully established the fact that corn and other crops are essentially benefitted by hoeing in dry weather; but the reason why or the manner how it is done is not so generally understood. That moisture is formed by stirring the dry particles of earth and changing their relative position, is generally admitted.

Water is composed of oxygen and nitrogen. These substances are also contained in different particles of earth, which act upon each other when brought into contact, as above by hoeing. Water acts as a solvent on other substances, and holds them in solution so that they can be taken up by the roots and made to nourish the growing plants. This is the reason why it is best to sow or plant our seeds as soon as possible after the ground has been ploughed or harrowed. The different particles coming together form new relations and chemical action, during which heat is evolved and oxygen and hydrogen are generated and caused to unite, forming water, which with the other substances act upon the seed and produce germination, and give to new born plants a vigorous start into existence.

After the soil has remained quiet for some time, these substances having exhausted their energy, by neutralising the powers of each, the plant having absorbed all the elements of nutrition within reach of its roots, its growth becomes retarded, and can only be restored by renewing the chemical action. This can be done by applying some compost manure or by hoeing or stirring the earth so as to bring the particles in contact with each other, and forming new combinations, and consequently thus producing a further supply of nutrition. Corn that is hoed every two or three weeks will come to maturity sooner, produce more and be better filled on the cob than it will when treated in the usual way. We would recommend to our farmers to select two or three rows in the field and hoe them regularly once in two weeks, and in the fall inform us of the results of their experiment.

CLAIRVOYANCE.

The following extract from the Zoist contains a very interesting narrative by Lord Ducie:

"In the highest departments of phenomena of mesmerism, he for a long time was a disbeliever, and could not bring himself to believe in the power of reading with the eyes bandaged, or of mental traveling; at length, however, he was convinced of the truth of these powers, and that, too, in so curious and unexpected a way, that there could have been no possibility of deception. It happened that he had to call upon a surgeon on business, and when he was there the surgeon said to him, 'You have never seen my little clairvoyante.' He replied that he never had, and should like to see her very much. He was invited to call the next day, and upon his replying that he should be obliged to leave town that evening, he said, 'Well, you can come in at once. I am obliged to go out, but I will ring the bell for her, and put her to sleep, and you can ask her any questions you please.' He (Lord Ducie) accordingly went in. He had never been in the house in his life before, and the girl could have known nothing of him. The bell was rung; the clairvoyante appeared; the surgeon, without a word passing, put her to sleep, and then he put on his hat and left the room.

"He (Lord Ducie) had before seen something of mesmerism, and he sat by her, took her hand, and asked her if she felt able to travel. She replied, 'Yes;' and he asked her if she had ever been in Gloucestershire, to which she answered that she had not, but should very much like to go there, as she had not been in the country for six years; she was a girl of about seventeen years old. He told her that she should go with him, for he wanted her to see his farm. They traveled (mentally) by the railroad very comfortably together, and then (in his imagination) got into a fly and proceeded to his house. He asked her what she saw, and she replied, 'I see an iron gate and a curious old house.' He asked her, 'How do you get to it?' she replied, 'By this gravel-walk;' which was quite correct. He asked her how they went next into it; and she replied, 'I see a porch—a curious old porch.' It was probably known to many that his house, which was a curious old Elizabethan building, was entered by a porch, as she had described. He asked her what she saw at the porch, and she replied, truly, that it was covered with flowers. He then said, 'Now, my dear, turn to your right hand; what do you see?' She answered with great promptness, 'I see a book case, and a picture on the wall of a ship at sea.' He told her to turn her back to the book case, and say what she saw on the other side of the room, when she said, 'I see something else, like that which soldiers wear.'

"He described some old muskets and warlike weapons which were hanging in the hall; and asked her how they were fastened (supposing her, by what means they were secured) to the wall. She did not answer the question, but replied, 'The muskets are tied up in threes,' which was the fact. He asked her the names of what substance the handles were made of, and she said, 'Of black and white bands,' which was correct. He then asked her what was the color of the ceiling, and she very promptly replied that it was as being by candlelight. He (Lord Ducie) told her to enter the room, and say what she saw there; and she replied, 'I see a picture on each side of the room.' Upon being asked if she saw any thing particular in the fire-place, she replied, 'Yes; I see a curious old Elizabethan grate.' He asked her if it was a curious old Elizabethan grate. There was at Totworth Court a curious old grate; and he told her to describe it. She then went to a favorite tree, and described it accurately. He then told her to go to his farm, and desired her to see his farm, and desired her to go into a field which he had purchased, and tell him what she saw growing. She replied that the field was all over green, and that it was potatoes, adding that she did not know much about the country. It was not turnips. He then said, 'Now look over the gate to the right, and tell me what is growing there.' She at once replied, 'There it is, growing there; it is a field of wheat, but not quite ripe, and carried.' This was correct; but he asked her, as it was a part of the field, grain of a different period, he asked her if she could see the end of the field. She replied that she could not see the end of the whole of it had been carried, as the land rose in the middle, so that it did. He then said to her, 'Can you see on the brow, can you tell me if it is all carried?' She answered, 'No, it is still growing there.' He then said to her, 'Now let us come to the end of the field, and say where it leads to.' She replied, 'Into a lane.' She then went on and described everything on his farm with the same accuracy, and upon his subsequently asking her if she was only in error in one instance, for which error any one who knew the locality (mentally) with a clairvoyant could easily account, without conceiving the truth."

He who has never wandered on a summer night, through the streets and squares of St. Petersburg: who has never contemplated that magnificent panorama in the gentle moonlight, when the nocturnal stillness is broken only by the murmurs of the soft flowing Neva: he to whom the colossal statues, upon their immense pedestals, have never appeared, through the twilight of a northern night, like gigantic phantoms just risen from their graves—let him not say that he has seen St. Petersburg.

Select such a night, and go forth to gaze upon the monuments of by gone greatness. Spectre-like they pass before you, their steadfast eyes fixed upon the book of genuine and impartial history, to whose pages, impressed with adamantine and blood-red types, they point with iron fingers—alike to the inscription of undying fame, and to the record of infamy and crime!

It was on such a night that I returned alone from the country, and paused upon the half of the Troitzky Bridge. The center portion of the bridge had been removed to let vessels pass through. This is always done at night in order not to impede by day the traffic over the bridge. I got out of the carriage, had myself ferried across, and continued my way on foot towards the interior of the city. Passing along the quay, and by the Winter Palace, I rambled slowly to the Summer Garden, and soon stood on the further side of the canal, in front of that reimarkable building, whose gratings, ditches, bridges, and palisades, betray the former fortress-like habitation of the Emperor Paul.

The palace is now occupied by the school of engineers. Opposite the facade, in the outer court, stands the equestrian statue of Peter the Great. It is of bronze; the attitude of the figure is quiet and easy, the horse is in an advancing attitude. The pedestal is of marble, adorned with very handsome bas-reliefs, and bears the simple inscription: "To the Grandsire, the Grandson." Paul I. had it erected in the year 1800.

In Northern Russia the summer nights, from the middle of May until the end of July, are almost as light as day. The quality of this nocturnal light is particularly favorable to the aspect of buildings and statues, whose beauty it seems to heighten by a sort of enchanted radiance. I sat down upon a bench whence I had a front view of the statue. Glancing to the left, my attention was attracted by the walled-up window of the Emperor Paul's sleeping room, into which apartment, since his death, no human foot has entered nor ray of light penetrated. Often, when passing by, had I looked up at that window, but never with such absorbing interest as that moment; I sat gazing alternately at the "grandsire's" statue, and at the place of the "grandson's" death, until at last my thoughts grew confused, shadows hovered about me, and I fell asleep. I had not slumbered long, when I was roused by a noise, as of footsteps and hollow murmurs. I opened my eyes, but could see nothing, for all was shrouded in profound darkness. Suddenly the pale moon emerged from behind the clouds, and I distinguished in my immediate vicinity a group of five men, in old-fashioned uniforms, who, with pale countenances, and uncertain gestures, whispered secretly together. Almost as soon as I discern them one of them perceived me, and silently taking my arm, he led me away with him.

We walked softly across the court to the great staircase. It was lighted up. To our right hand, at the entrance of the first corridor, stood a grenadier on sentry. He presented arms, and let us pass.—Now we turned into a side passage, at the extremity of which we found ourselves in a great hall. At its inner door stood a Cossack on guard. Before he could call out, one of my companions sprang upon him and drove a dagger into his left breast. Without a sound he sank upon the floor. The others strode across his body to the door; it was fastened, but a violent kick burst it open, and we entered a lighted chamber, where was a man who, as it seemed, had just awakened from a deep sleep, and who was stretching forth his hand to the bell-rope that hung beside his bed. One of my companions, who was attired in a rich uniform, sprang forward, and with his bloody dagger cut the rope above the outstretched hand.

A momentary pause ensued, then one of the intruders approached the man in the bed and held out to him, after a low and respectful obeisance, with the one hand an open document; with the other, a pen wherewith to sign it. Thereupon the man sprang from his bed, attired only in his shirt, and with a single bound was in the middle of the room, when he assumed so lofty an attitude, whilst his countenance and bearing were so imposing and dignified, that the others for a moment timidly gave back. Now commenced a vehement discussion, of which I, ignorant of the Russian language, unfortunately understood nothing. I comprehended, however, that some hard condition was sought to be extorted from the person we had found in bed, for his countenance grew purple with fury, and when the murderer of the Cossack again approached him with paper and pen, he dealt him a blow in the face, which made him stagger three paces backwards.

At the same moment that this happened, I heard a tumult of an unmistakable character in the guard-room below. A mute spectator of this singular affair, I had retired into the embrasure of a window, whence I now looked out upon the court-yard. There I saw the officer of the guard (who I at once recognized as him who had admitted the others avor the draw-bridge into the court-yard and had conducted me to the foot of the palace stairs) hurry to the sentry and give him some order. "Guard, turn out!" immediately exclaimed the man. The officer drew his sword, drew up the guard under arms, and from that moment the man stood as if rooted to the ground, without moving a muscle, or uttering a murmer. Such is the character of the Russian soldier under arms.

Meanwhile the scene in the room above took another turn. Recovering from his momentary stupefaction, the officer who had been struck rushed upon his antagonist, and—returned the blow! Scarcely had his hand fallen upon the face of the half-naked man, when a panic fear seized all present; timidly dispersing, they hurried wildly towards the door. But he who had struck the daring blow was before-hand with them; erect, and with outstretched sword, he stood at the threshold, and warned them off with terrible words. Perhaps it was the excitement of the moment which led him involuntary to use his native tongue, for what he said fell upon my ear in plain German, with, if I mistake not, a Hanovarian accent, "Back!" he cried; "upon this threshold stands death, I have laid hands upon him; we are ull lost—HE DOES NOT DIE."

Thrilled with horror, for a moment all stood like statues—then all trembled like an aspaleaf. My teeth chattered when I saw my countryman sheath his sword, unwind the sash from around his loins, and advance towards the nearly naked man. From that moment, the latter's mood seemed completely changed. His dignity had given way to fear, his bold defiance to abject terror: in lieu of his commands he now poured forth prayers: his words and tones were no longer threatening, but supplicatory. A shudder came over me when I saw him clutch the paper and pen, and then, when these were snatched from him, sink upon his knees before his murderer. The majestic, powerful man, who, a few moments before, seemed ready to defy the world, now crouched upon his knees, and sued, in piteous tone, for mercy and for life. It was too late.

The man with the sash went up to him, and threw it in a noose around his neck. The others seized the two ends, and tugged hard at them; but in his deadly agony the naked man got his left hand through the noose, and drew it over his chin, so that it seemed impossible to strangle him. At the same time, with his right hand, and with the energy of despair, he defended himself against his adversaries, and struck one of them to the ground. Being a strong man, his stout resistance made it yet uncertain how the unequal contest should end, when suddenly his first assailant seized the heavy marble slab from off a dressing-table, and brought it down with such violence upon the head of the victim that he fell senseless to the ground, and stretched out his limbs upon the carpet—a dying man.

Hastily did the assassins now untwist the scarf from the neck of the corpse, which they then laid upon the bed, and rushed, as if hunted by furies, out of the apartments, down the stairs, across the court. The guard still stood under arms, motionless as a wall. Flying rather than running, they reached the drawbridge, and, at the very moment that I was about to step upon it, the terrible "Man of the Marble Slab" approached me, and with his sword gave me so severe a cut across the forehead that I was instantly deluged with blood.

I awoke. I was still seated upon the bench upon which I had fallen asleep, in front of me was Peter's statue; more to the left the sleeping room of Paul. The sun's first beams were revivifying nature, and their warmth fell pleasantly upon my limbs, which were chilled and stiffened by the night dew. I had had a dream, but a terrible dream. That horrible scene, as it occurred in all its fearful reality, not as it has been misrepresented in Russian books of history, had been repeated, as I slept, before my affrighted eyes.

Exection of Andre.

The following account of Andre's execution is one of the most minute and interesting that we have ever read. It was furnished to Mr. William G. Hassolbarth of Rockland county, the history of which he is engaged in writing. It was taken down from the lips of a soldier in Colonel Jedathan Baldwin's regiment, which was stationed a short distance from where poor Andre suffered:

"One of our men, whose name was Amrstrong, being one of the oldest and best workmen at his trade in the regiment, was selected to make his coffin, which he did, and painted it black as was the custom at that period.

At this time Andre was confined in what was called the Old Dutch Church—a small stone building with only one door, and closely guarded by six sentinels.

When the hour appointed for his execution arrived, which was at two o'clock in the afternoon, a guard of three hundred men were paraded at the place of his confinement. A kind of procession was formed by placing the guard in single file on each side of the road. In front were a number of American officers of high rank on horseback. These were followed by the wagon containing Andre's coffin, then a large number of officers on foot, with Andre in their midst.

The procession wound slowly up a moderately rising ground about a quarter of a mile to the west. On the top was a field without any enclosure; and on this was a very high gallows, made by setting up two poles or crotchets, and laying a pole on the top.

The wagon that contained the coffin was drawn directly under the gallows. In a short time Andre stepped into the hind end of the wagon, then on his coffin, took off his hat and laid it down; then placed his hands upon his hips and walked very uprightly back and forth as far as the length of the wagon would permit, at the same time casting his eyes up to the pole over his head and the whole scenery by which he was surrounded.

He was dressed in a complete British uniform. His coat was of the brightest scarlet, faced and trimmed with the most beautiful green. His underclothes, vest, and breeches were bright buff; he had a long and beautiful head of hair, which, agreeably to the fashion, was wound with a black ribbon and hung down his back.

Not many minutes after he took his stand upon the coffin, the executioner stepped into the wagon with a halter in his hand, on one end of which was what the soldiers in those days called a "hangman's knot," which he attempted to put over the head and around the neck of Andre; but by a sudden movement of his hand, this was prevented.

Andre now took off the handkerchief from his neck, unpinned his shirt collar, and deliberately took the cord of the halter, put it over his head, and placed the knot directly under his right ear, and drew it very snugly to his nook. He then took from his coat pocket a handkerchief, and tied it before his eyes. This done, the officer who commanded spoke in rather a loud voice, and said, "His arms must be tied."

Andre at once pulled down the handkerchief which he had just tied over his eyes, and drew from his pocket a second one, which he gave to the executioner, and then replaced his handkerchief. His arms at this time were tied just above the elbow, and behind the back.

The rope was then made fast to the pole overhead. The wagon was very suddenly drawn from under the gallows, which, together with the length of rope, gave him a most tremendous swing back and forth; but in a few moments he hung entirely still.

During the whole transaction, he seemed as little daunted as John Rogers when he was about to be burnt at the stake, although his countenance was rather pale.

He remained hanging from twenty to thirty minutes, and during that time the chambers of death were never stiller than the multitude by whom he was surrounded. Orders were given to cut the rope and take him down without letting him fall. This was done, and his body carefully laid on the ground.

Shortly after, the guard was withdrawn, and the spectators were permitted to come forward to view the corpse; but the crowd was so great that it was some time before I could get an opportunity. When I was able to do this, his coat, vest, and breeches had been taken off, and his body laid in the coffin, covered by some under-clothes. The top of the coffin was not put on.

I viewed the corpse more carefully then I had ever done that of any human being before. His head was very much on one side, in consequence of the manner in which the halter had drawn upon his neck. His face appeared to be greatly swollen and very black, resembling a high degree of mortification. It was indeed a most shocking sight to behold.

There were at this time, standing at the foot of the coffin, two young men of uncommon short stature. They were not more than four feet high. Their dress was extremely gaudy. One of them had the clothes just taken from Andre hanging on his arm. I took particular pains to learn who they were, and was informed that they were his servants, sent up from New York to take care of his clothes—but what other business I did not learn.

I now turned to take a view of the executioner, who was still standing by one of the posts of the gallows. I walked near enough to him to have laid my hand upon his shoulder, and looked him directly in the face. He appeared to be about twenty-five years of age; his beard of some two weeks growth, and his whole face covered with what appeared to me to have been taken from the outside of a greasy pot. A more frightful looking creature I never beheld. His whole countenance bespoke him to be a fit instrument for the business he had been doing.

I remained upon the spot until scarcely twenty persons were left, but the coffin was still beside the grave which had previously been dug.

I returned to my tent with my mind deeply imbued with the shocking scene which I had been called to witness."

TAKING THE FIELD IN THE CRIMEA.—The Times' correspondent writes: "To understand the difficulties in the way of what is called at home 'taking the field,' one must come out and stay out here. It would be much easier to take Schastopol than to take the field. There are only three accessible passes, up the precipitous wall of rock which rises on the north side of the Tchernaya, to the plateau on which the Russians are encamped, and the precipice runs round to the Belbek. These passes are so steep that an army would have some difficulty in ascending them at its leisure, without resistance from an enemy. But they are occupied wherever engineering eyes detect the smallest weakness; they are commanded by batteries, intersected by positions threatened by overhanging cliffs all ready for the lever. March round and turn them!' Where and how? We have no transports even if we could march, and we cannot march, because Napoleon himself would never lead an army into such defiles as guard the Russian position. Whether we are not strong enough to detach a great corps of 40,000 or 50,000 men to operate against the Russians north of Sebastopol is not for me to say; but it is certain that the base of operation for any such corps must be the sea, till ample transport is provided. The Crimea is to all intents and purposes a desert, a Sahara, waterless, and foodless before an invading army."

A RELIC OF THE IRISH PARLIAMENT.—English accounts have reached us of the death of Mr. John M'Cluntook, of Drumcar, in the county of Louth, Ireland, formerly Serjeant-at-Arms in the Irish House of Commons, for the loss of which office he has been in receipt of a pension of £2,000 a year for upwards of half a century. The deceased had obtained the patriarchal age of 85.

Kansas Territory.

The following is the bill passed by the Legislature at Shawnee Mission, extending the laws of Missouri over the Territory!

An act to establish the Statutes of the Territory of Kansas "Passed the House of Representatives, July 5, 1855.

SEC. 1. BE it enacted by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Kansas, That in the absence of law enacted by the present Assembly, that the statutes of the State of Missouri, which were enacted at the General Assembly of that State, held between the years 1844 and 1845, which are of a general nature, not local to the State, and which are not repugnant to the constitution of the United States, nor to the provisions of an act of Congress entitled an act to organize the Territories of Kansas and Nebraske, approved May 30, A. D. 1854, shall have full force and effect in, and extend over, the said Territory of Kansas.

SEC. 2. This act to take effect and be in force from and after its passage, provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to conflict with or make void any subsequent act of this Legislative Assembly.

The expelled free State members have held a meeting and called a mass convention of all who are in favor of making Kansas a free State, to be held in Lawrence on the second Tuesday of August, to take into consideration the situation of the Territory in reference to its government.

KANSAS, July 23—5 P. M.—Governor Reeder has taken upon himself the responsibility of vetoing all the bills that have yet been presented to him. He states in his message that there is nothing objectionable in the bills themselves, but that he does not and will not consider the Legislature as being in legal session. He bases this opinion upon the fact that the Legislature has removed from Pawnee without authority, and in against the provisions of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. Furthermore, he informs the Assembly, in a very peremptory tone, that if it persists in its removal the Executive and the Legislature must act independently of each other. The Legislature took the vetoed bills under consideration and passed them over again, through both branches, by immense majorities. Great excitement prevails in consequence of this act of the Governor—the Legislature is determined to insist upon its course and the Governor is equally stubborn in his refusal to recognize the laws they may pass. What the result will be is at present beyond conjecture.

DEFEAT OF COL. WALKER.—We find the following interesting intelligence in the Central American correspondence of the New York Times of the 28th. Our whilom fellow citizen and editorial confrere seems to meet with wretched luck in his revolutionary endeavors. But if he keeps on trying, and don't get killed, may hap he will eventually succeed. Perseverance usually triumphs in the long run:

SAN JUAN DEL SUR, Thursday, July 12, 1855

Since my last there has been quite an excitement here. Colonel Walker and his little party have arrived at Realejo, and he was commissioned by Castilion to come with his little party of 64 men, in company with a native command of 130 recruits from Chinandega, and take the Department of Rivas; but as these people can make no movement secretly, the news of their coming was received in Grenada before they had fairly sailed from Realejo, and a reinforcement was dispatched forthwith to oppose their landing. Col. Walker and his party landed about 25 miles up the coast from San Juan, and about the same distance from Rivas, on the 28th June, late in the day, and passed the night about 10 miles from the latter place.

Meantime the people at Rivas received the news of their coming, and sent a courier to San Juan with it, and this being passenger day, there were plenty of animals to accommodate 200 Grenadians, who set out at daylight, and arrived at Rivas just in time to take Walker in flank at the first firing of the Chinandega recruits broke and fled, leaving Walker and his little party to consider the fight as best they could, which lasted from 1 o'clock P. M. until dark, when, in the night, the little party made a detour and marched to San Juan del Sor—leaving 12 Americans dead, and carrying away three wounded with them. The natives lost 63 killed and 27 wounded, some of whom have since died.

Six of the Americans were killed in a house that they had loopholed, and the other five were killed outside; but the following day the house was fired, and the bodies of those killed outside thrown on top of these that were killed inside, and all burned together.

Walker and the remainder of his men embarked in their vessels, that were waiting for them at San Juan, and returned to Realejo quite unmolested, but rather the worse for war.

THE SNAKE HUMBUG—The Unnatural Father held for Trial.—Lyford C. Hill was brought before Judge Cushing, in the Police Court, yesterday, for assault, etc., upon his daughter, in compelling her to handle a black snake against her will, by which her person and life were exposed to peril. The court-room was crowded, and much interest was manifested in the case.

The complainant, Dr. I. W. Ayer, testified in relation to the atrocious circumstances which took place at Cochituate Hall on Monday and Wednesday afternoons; that at the exhibition the little girl appeared reluctant to take the snake, when her father commanded her to do so. After repeated commands the girl, exhibiting much fear, took the snake, when it bit her thumb, causing her to shriek out, and to cry out bitterly, and also causing the blood to flow freely. The Doctor then called the child to him and wiped the blood off, and saw the incision made in the flesh by the teeth of the serpent. When the child shrieked the father came forward and took the snake off and put it in its box. It held on until the father took it off. The snake was about five feet long and an inch in diameter.

Watson Goward, Dr. Snow, and Wm. A. Graves corroborated the testimony of Doctor Ayer.

Judge Cushing briefly reviewed the testimony, and ordered Hill to recognize in $500 for trial at the August term of the Municipal Court. P. S. Tronor appeared for the Government, and J. A. Bradley for the defense.

Mr. Bradley proposed to call witnesses to give the whole history of the connection between the girl and the snake, and to show that the girl acted merely by the father's request, not compulsion. Judge Cushing, however, decided that the case was of that gross inhuman nature that he could not take jurisdiction of it.

In the kingdom of Sardinia religious affairs have long been in a most confused state. The Government has forbidden the Papal "monitorio," (official exposition of the struggle between Sardinia and Romo,) to be read or made public in any way in the Sardinian States. The bill abolishing convents passed the Chamber of Deputies by an immense majority. In the course of the debate, Minister Ratazzi declared that he was possessed of many letters of monks who rejoiced in the hope to be enabled to return to the world. The bill was, however, defeated in the Senate, and the prospects for religious liberty are at this moment less encouraging than ever, since the Revolution of 1848.

☞ The relaxing heats of summer leave behind them a long train of evils. The most universal of these are general debility, and its ever attendant, lowness of spirits. For these we can recommend a speedy and unfailing cure, in the shape of HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS, prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson, Philadelphia. It is, in our opinion, a medicine sui generis—alone—unapproachable. It seems to reach the constitutional of the difficulty in the digestive organization, and thus to relieve the secretions and the blood of the materies morbi, or the cause of disease. Its tonic properties give vigor to the membranes of the stomach, and promote the secretion of the gastric juice, with dissolves the food, while its cordial, soothing, and alterative influence imparts general regularity and strength to the action of the secretive organs, and seems to fortify the constitution. Such is our own experience of its effects, and we believe it is confirmed by the evidence of all who have tried it, or had an opportunity of witnessing its operation. We invite the special attention of parents and guardians to the advantages here offered to young men destitute of a finished collegiate or business education. The location of the college, in a quiet valley, ten miles from a town—the freedom, consequently, from temptation to vice—the full and thorough course of study—the experience and ability of the Faculty—the wholesome discipline—the facilities for lectures afforded by ample apparatus, libraries and cabinets, and, withal, the cheapness of terms and healthfulness of position, cannot fail to secure to this college, as heretofore, a liberal patronage.

THE NASHVILLE FEMALE ACADEMY

The next academic year will commence September 3d. This institution has enjoyed thirty-nine years of uninterrupted prosperity.

In regard to health, it is believed to have no equal in the United States. Cholera, chill and fever, typhoid and scarlet fever, and similar fatal diseases, have never occurred here. But three deaths of boarders in thirty-nine years.

In regard to maternal influence, claims equality with the best regulated private families, in all that relates to personal habits, moral and mental culture.

Employes, almost exclusively, Southern teachers. No Southern parent, who gives this institution a personal examination, will, we think, find a reason for going further North.

Ornamental needlework	5 00
Incidental expenses	1 00

Payment to be made at the close of each term. Board, including lodging, washing, lights and fuel, can be procured in the village and immediate neighborhood at ten dollars per month. Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would however, respectfully urge all parents or guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the institution, to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, facilitating, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.

School books, stationery, &c., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the usual rates.

Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral deportment of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.

As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass into another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.

The government of the school is to be understood as that of affectionate though parental and mild, yet decided and firm. The Institution, in a religious point of view will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.

Pupils will be required to attend church at least once on the Sabbath, and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.

The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.

The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second session commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July. At which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.

All applications for admission of pupils, &c., to be made to the president of the College.

RICHARD ANGELL, M. D., HOMEOPATHIC PHYSICIAN, 116 St. Charles st., corner of Lafayette Square, New Orleans, takes this method of acquainting his friends and former patrons with his location as a medical practitioner in New Orleans.

Thirty years' experience in general and hospital practice has confirmed his confidence in the superiority of Homeopathy in the treatment of both recent and chronic diseases. He would especially ask the attention of those who have long sought in vain for relief from chronic ailment in other systems of practice, to the happy results of Homeopathic treatment and proffers his services to such as desire to avail themselves of the resources of our system.

Communications from patients asking advice and treatment will be promptly attended to. Terms moderate.

CENTENARY COLLEGE OF LOUISIANA.

Centenary College of Louisiana is located in Jackson, La., 12 miles east of Bayou Sara. Its location is beautiful, retired and healthy. It has commodious buildings, a large library, a good chemical and philosophical apparatus, a well selected mineralogical and geological cabinet, and a full Board of Instruction.

As this section of the Southwest is but poorly provided with academies and preparatory schools, there is connected with the College a Preparatory Department, in which all necessary instruction may be received for entering College proper.

The College is now in a highly prosperous condition, and under the management of the present Board of Trustees and Faculty it

PROGRESSION.

NO. II.

SHADY HILL, Aug. 2, 1855.

Mr. Editor—As I anticipated, a number of the old fashioned, antiquated Methodists found fault with my former article. And though you declined publishing all they wrote in opposition, yet you let us see enough to show how they received the views of Philomonos. I promised you, as occasion offered, to continue to develope the resources for improvement in our Methodist usages; and in compliance, am about to hazard another article. I shall not be surprised if I meet a similar reception to the first, and should fall again into the hands of that digestor of vinagre memory, and receive another instalment of his crab apple similes. Sour Verrons."

Many of our brethren of the "old fogy" school of discipline seem not to understand the times, and the imperative necessity there exists for improvement in our manners, to keep up with the march of progression. They are continually referring to the days of Wesley and primitive Methodism, or, more old fashioned still, to the days of Paul and the Apostles. Now Paul and other New Testament worthies, it must be admitted, were good men and true, and taught practical religion suited to that day and generation; but they were behind the times, and old Philomonos must, in the words of a good old Baptist preacher, beg leave to differ with the great Apostle in several particulars.

It was not so important in apostolic times for Christian people's children to learn to dance. The fashionables of that early day were in the habit of having their dancing performed by slaves and servants, and enjoyed such exercises, much as we of the present day do our praying and singing, to the pieces selected for the purpose. The necessity for this accomplishment did not then exist as it does now. There were no female colleges in those days where things could be properly taught, and even Paul himself was not a Doctor of Divinity, although he was considered a pretty good Greek and Hebrew scholar. But "we live to learn" and improve, and the old croakers who object to dancing as an accomplishment of the day, when it is still taught in colleges presided over by Methodist preachers, must be hard to please indeed. Now I contend if graceful movements, easy manners and polite refinement can only be acquired in the artistic figures and convolutions of the dance, then let us have our children well taught, religiously and methodically, by our own preachers, presidents and doctors of divinity.

Parents, then, who may send their daughters to a distance, and cannot superintend their education in person, will feel assured that the accomplishment of "treading on the light fantastic toe" will be religiously attended to. A matter so important as the poetry and "poetry of motion" should no longer be entrusted to the oversight of Parisian barbers and Italian fiddlers. Let Christian ministers, not foreign paupers, realize the handsome profits accruing from this branch of polite education. A handsome entrance can always be pocketed between the price of tuition and the actual hire of "Johnny Crapeau's" heels and catgut. The correspondent of your paper, who called public attention to this new feature in the Female College at Nashville has set me to thinking on this subject, and I have concluded that of all places for Methodist people's children to learn to dance, Nashville was the best. It is the headquarters of all the great operations of our Church, South, the selected depot of our Book Concern. Here many of our ablest preachers will be necessarily located, and all our learned and pious divines occasionally congregated in the discharge of their important duties. What an opportunity will be thus afforded of superintending in person the proficiency of our daughters in the polite accomplishment? And what delight it will afford their pious hearts to be able to report from time to time to anxious parents abroad the expertness of the pupils in the varied beauties and graces of the cotillion, polka, waltz and hornpipe! The jig and pigeon wing having, I presume, become obsolete, or abandoned to the vulgar.

And why not, too, I would ask, in the name of improvement and progress, introduce this new feature of classic education and elegance into our male colleges? The want of such a professorship has been sadly felt at some of them already. Several of these institutions have closed up the commencement exercises with a ball and a dance. And our sons, who had not been scientifically taught, must have appeared awkward and vulgar on such occasions. Indeed, such has been the present want of such an accession to the other branches, that I am credibly informed the faculty have permitted the students to attend and take lessons in this indispensable accomplishment outside the college walls and under a "professeur" not connected with the institution. How much better now to have this under their own direction and at the profits, which are always large, go to the benefit of the institution, which generally has hard work "to make both ends meet."

Another argument, it seems to me, in favor of establishing such a chair(?) in our male colleges, is this: Here our young men are prepared and qualified for divines and preachers. In time, these will take charge themselves of our educational institutions, and it will be a great desideratum if these can either teach the graceful art themselves or be able to supervise the instruction with a practical knowledge of all its fascinating details of attitude and motion. Holding all, too, as they no doubt will, subordinate to religion and Methodism, they will more carefully discriminate between the genteel and the immodest circumvolutions of this inspiring and soul elevating exercise. Thus the dance, pruned and depurated, might be presented in a religious and Methodist shape. Why, Mr. Editor, there is no calculating our means of improvement. We are truly a great people, and may, by taking control in the fashions and refinements of the day, as easily take the lead in them as our fathers did in spreading the gospel through these lands.

You shall hear from me again.

PHILOSKOMMONOS.

RICHARD WATSON'S LOVE OF CLASS.

Mr. Watson not only considered class meetings necessary to our system, but beneficial to his own growth in grace. Thomas Jackson, in his life of Watson, gives us the following information:

"When he was no longer pastor, meeting the classes, as well as attending to other duties of his office, and was appointed missionary secretary, he was afraid he might suffer spiritual loss, for he knew by experience that one principal means of preserving his affections in a state of growing piety and vigor was the 'communion of saints,' maintained by united prayer and by spiritual conversation, according to the apostolic admonition, 'Not forsaking the assembling of yourselves together, as the manner of some is, but exhorting one another daily, and so much the more as ye see the day approaching.'

As an itinerant preacher, Mr. Watson had enjoyed the advantage of Christian fellowship in the quarterly visitation of the classes, and other meetings of a similar kind; but in his present connection he was cut off from his former intimate connection with the societies, and his 'pure mind' was no longer 'stirred up by way of remembrance' as it had formerly been, by regularly listening to the recital of religious experience. To meet this deficiency, and with reference to his own spiritual improvement, he entered his name as a private member of a class, under the care of Mr. Wright Turnell, which held its meetings at a house in Myddleton street, Spafields.

Mr. Turnell was an aged Methodist, whose religious character had been tried by great vicissitudes of life, and he had invariably maintained his integrity. He could tell many a tale of early Methodism, and describe the preaching of the Wesleys, Mr. Fletcher, Walter Sellon and their cotemporaries; but that which recommended him to Mr. Watson was his deep and simple piety. The class consisted mostly of poor people, accustomed to daily labor; but they were spiritual worshippers of the most high God; their hearts and treasure were in heaven; and they used to meet together weekly to declare the goodness of the Lord, and to be helpers of each other's joy. With these simple hearted people Mr. Watson was wont to associate once a week, in the evening, when his health would permit; and their meetings, unobserved by the world, were often seasons of great spiritual refreshment and education. On his appearance in the room among his humble friends, he was generally requested to act the part of a class leader, and it was observed the advice he gave to each, after inquiring into his state, was almost always in the language of Scripture, in the application of which he possessed a remarkable facility.

Mr. Turnell has long since been gathered to his fathers, but some members of the class survive; and they often refer with considerable emotion to the time when Mr. Watson belonged to the fraternity, took his seat among them as a brother, and appeared

"An easy, free, but more knowing friend."

We commend the example of Mr. Watson to the preachers and people who undervalue class meetings as a means of grace. We would commend it to those who would abolish class meetings, as no longer necessary to the Methodist system.

We commend his example to missionary secretaries, book agents and editors, presidents and professors in colleges, and principals and teachers in our seminaries, who are no longer in the regular work of the ministry, that their hearts may be kept warm and their souls be kept alive while their heads and hands are busily employed.

We commend his example to those who do not go to class because "they cannot learn anything. The common people only attend, and they are not edified by the relation of their experience." Mr. Watson's intellect was almost equal to theirs; his education, too, and so was his standing. And yet he found much to instruct and profit him in the class room. Mr. Watson met in the "class in reference to his own spiritual improvement." "The class did not consist of the nobility, of the wise, of the learned, or the wealthy, but consisted mostly of poor people, accustomed to daily labor." "With these simple hearted people he associated once a week, and their meetings, unobserved by the world, were often seasons of spiritual refreshment and edification."

SHARON FENALE COLLEGE.

The undersigned majority of the Visiting Committee appointed by the last Mississippi Conference to visit the above named institution, take this method of informing the Conference, the Church and the public generally, that they have attended the late annual examination of the pupils, which included the 24th, 25th and 26th of July.

The examination was satisfactory to us in every department, especially in view of the fact that since the resignation of President Eckles the college has been in rather a disorganized state, and that President Shelton has only had charge about five months. When he entered upon his duties as President there were only about thirty pupils. These had been kept together by the energies of the Board of Trustees and the care of Miss Ann Shrock; the accomplished lady who had the charge ad interim.

There was a steady increase almost to the close of the session, until there were sixty-six matriculations. In view of this fact it was difficult to preserve system in the exercises of the college, or to effect a permanent classification. The examination, notwithstanding, was creditable, and, as far as we have heard any expression, gave entire satisfaction. The last day was especially interesting, and will be regarded as an era in the history of the college; for on that day, be it remembered, the chief difficulty was removed—an old debt was settled. A few men, some of whom had already contributed largely, and others, traveling Methodist preachers, resolved to discharge the debt. And then, in the course of an hour, the sum of $700 was contributed for the purpose of erecting a new college building.

The Mississippi Conference should foster this institution, for the natural and moral advantages of this position render it one of the most eligible in our Conference.

Like most of the members of Conference, until recently we had but limited knowledge of the circumstances which conspire to render this institution so worthy of our patronage. But on intimate acquaintance with the location and the excellent people about Sharon, we are persuaded there is every guaranty that Sharon Female College would be a safe and happy retreat for the young ladies and little girls of the surrounding country. We earnestly recommend the friends and members of our Church to encourage it. There is here the presence of every literary and religious privilege that can be enjoyed at any point in the State; and the people seem to have appreciated them. There is here the most strictly moral and religious community that can be found in the State; while here are none of the ordinary temptations to vice or even vain amusements. By an act of the Legislature, chartering the town of Sharon, are these excluded.

This college stands a monument to the liberality of a few noble spirited men and women, who have stood by it in every time of trial, and now rejoice to see a brighter day dawning. The Trustees have at their command about $1600 towards the erection of the new building, and we feel confident an appeal to our people will not be in vain in behalf of so noble a cause. Brethren, for God's sake and the sake of the Church you love, lend your aid and help the Conference to build up a college here that shall be an ornament to the State and an honor to the whole Church. You have only to will and it is done. The neighboring conferences are far outstripping us in educational enterprise. We are not meeting the demand upon us. But now Mississippi Conference has the opportunity to do much; and surely, with the help of our brethren throughout the Conference, we can secure for Sharon Female College a splendid endowment.

The present Faculty consists of: Rev. J. A. Shelton, A. M., President; Mrs. M. A. Shelton, Vice Principal: Miss M. A. Boyd, Assistant Teacher; C. J. Mers, Professor of Music, French, and teacher of other modern languages.

It is designed to increase the Faculty for the next session; and we are happy to learn that the prospect of increased patronage is such as to justify the President in making more extensive arrangements.

President Shelton is a gentleman, a scholar and a pious Methodist preacher. He has showed himself worthy and well qualified for his position. His estimable lady is an ornament to any circle, and is an efficient instructress. Miss Boyd seems to be eminently qualified both in mind and spirit for the work she is engaged in. Prof. Mers is a gentleman of fine literary attainments, polished manner, of unexceptionable morality, and considered by all those who profess to be judges an able professor in his department. With such a Faculty, to be increased as circumstances may demand, and the support which is due from the Church, Sharon Female College is destined to prosper.

Respectfully,

THE MISSIONARY.

What and How He is Doing Among Southern Slaves.

An intelligent cotton planter, in that fertile region of Alabama called the "Canebrake," gives this voluntary testimony. He is not a member of the M. E. Church.—ED.

MARENGO COUNTY, July, 1855.

On the first Sunday of the present month it was my good fortune to be present at the religious services of Rev. Alex. McBryde, who is doing so much good as a missionary among the slaves in the Canebrake. It was on the plantation of Col. Isaac Croom, on Cottonwood Creek. The place, the assembly and the services all gave peculiar interest to the occasion.

The meeting was held in a forest of large oaks, whose wide spreading tops furnished a grateful shelter from the sun, while within sight and near at hand was a copious jetcom of pure and sparkling water from an artesian well.

The congregation was made up of the slaves of the Colonel's two adjoining plantations, including some thirty children and forty or fifty adults from neighboring plantations, who were permitted to attend. The last day was especially interesting, and will be regarded as an era in the history of the college; for on that day, be it remembered, the chief difficulty was removed—an old debt was settled. A few men, some of whom had already contributed largely, and others, traveling Methodist preachers, resolved to discharge the debt. In conclusion, let me say that the exertions of Christian ministers have done and are doing more to Christianize the African race in our Southern States than the united exertions of all other missionary societies in the world have effected towards Christianizing and civilizing the Heathen and Pagan.

Is not this a significant truth, and should it not make the fanatic pause, if he really values the welfare of the slave, or believes in the supervision and control of an overruling Providence?

MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE TRACT SOCIETY.

REPORT

OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE MEETING OF THE OFFICERS AND MANAGERS OF THE MISS. CON. TRACT SOCIETY.

The officers and managers of the Mississippi Conference Tract Society met, pursuant to adjournment, at Sharon, Miss., on Wednesday, July 25, 1855.

A quorum being present, the meeting was opened with prayer by the President.

Rev. R. Abbey, Agent of the Society, made a statement of his operations, the substance of which is appended to this report.

The following resolutions were adopted by the Board, viz:

Resolved, That we earnestly request the Presiding Elders of the Conference to form Quarterly Conference Tract Societies through out their respective districts, and obtain complete statistical reports from each society, and present them to the Conference Tract Society at our approaching session.

Resolved, That we request each traveling preacher to use his best endeavors to obtain the most liberal contribution possible from each adult member of the Church in aid of the Society, and that we recommend that said contributions be raised with a view to establishing a Tract Depot at Vicksburg.

Resolved, That the Agent be, and he is hereby, requested to establish such a depot so soon as a sufficient amount can be obtained for that purpose.

Resolved, That we recommend for general distribution a tract lately published by our Book Agents, entitled, "The Creed of all Men."

Resolved, That our Book Agents be requested to publish in tract form a series of numbers lately published in the Nashville Christian Advocate, entitled, "The Divine Assessment for the Support of the Ministry;" and that we earnestly recommend to all our preachers that, when so published, they should use their endeavors to give it a general circulation.

Resolved, That the Secretary be requested to publish a synopsis of the proceedings of this Board in the Nashville and New Orleans Christian Advocates, and that he and the Agent be requested to address a circular to the members of the Conference, setting forth the importance of the enterprise, and urging the preachers and people generally to immediate action in behalf of the cause.

J. A. LIGHT, Secretary.

AGENT'S REPORT.

The Agent of the Tract Society of the Mississippi Conference is able to present to the Board of Managers, at this time, but a partial report.

He is unable to exhibit the precise condition of the agency, for the reason that very much of the business under his charge is in an unfinished condition. This is owing, in part, to the fact that he has but recently entered upon the duties of his office, and that the business is necessarily spread over a large space of country, and much of it has not been in the immediate hands of the Agent.

The following outline will, however, give a pretty fair idea of the business, from which you can perhaps make such conclusions as may be practically useful.

I have received in money, over and above expenses, about $230. Other sums, however, are known to be collected by societies which have not yet come into the hands of the Agent.

Quarterly Conference Tract Societies are known to be formed in the circuits and stations generally throughout the Yazoo and Sharon Districts, as also in some of the charges of other districts. Many other societies are no doubt formed, of which the Agent has not been specifically informed.

There have been received from the Publishing House, at Nashville, between four and five hundred dollars worth of tracts and books, all of which are either sold or engaged, except a box sent to Natchez, to await my visit to that place, and also excepting a few books on hand at Vicksburg.

The Agent has the satisfaction, further, to state to the Board that the tract cause is well received by our people generally. It is believed that very much good can be done in this way in establishing religion, morals and the doctrine and usages of our Church.

R. ABBEY, Agent.

Yazoo City, August 7, 1855.

CIRCULAR.

The Board of Managers of the Tract Society of the Mississippi Conference have directed the Secretary and Agent to address a circular to the preachers and friends of the cause.

In doing so, we find little that is necessary to say beyond what has already been said in a circular issued some time since, and which has been sent to most of the preachers of the Conference, and also to many other persons. Surely not much need be said to the friends of Methodism to enlist their hearty co-operation in this great enterprise; one so well calculated to advance Methodism, morality and religion generally, far beyond what most persons anticipate.

It is sincerely hoped that no time will be lost in forming Quarterly Conference Tract Societies in all the circuits and stations, and that each will be reported to the Agent with out delay.

The contemplated establishment of a tract depot at Vicksburg, to be under the care of an efficient clerk and colporteur, is greatly desirable, and calls for additional liberality.

The preachers and all will please to note particularly that the present plan of operation proposes to return to the circuits, respectively, one-half the amount raised, in tract and books for the local use of such circuits.

Will the preachers be so good as to inform the Agent of their camp meetings coming on this fall, as he desires to attend as many of them as practicable.

We wish to call the special attention of the preachers and others in the Eastern part of our Conference, and to request them to inform the Agent with regard to the practicability, propriety and usefulness of distributing in that region of country a pretty large number of tracts gratuitously. Give him, as early as convenient, such practical information on this point as you can.

Please, brethren, to bring this matter before the congregation at every one of your preaching places.

J. A. LIGHT, Secretary.
R. ABBEY, Agent.

Yazoo City, August 7, 1855.

LATER FROM HAVANA AND CALIFORNIA.

The United States mail steamship Granada, Captain Griffin, arrived Saturday morning from New York via Havana, bringing from the latter place the California United States mails and passengers via the Panama route.

The United States mail steamship Empire City, Captain Windle, from Aspinwall, arrived at Havana on the 6th inst., and left the California mails and passengers, and proceeded to New York.

Our dates by the Granada are to the 16th ult., and the news is not of a very interesting character.

The John L. Stephens arrived at San Francisco on the 13th ult. Passengers in good health. The Sierra Nevada arrived from San Juan on the 14th, with cholera on board. She lost forty-five passengers, among whom were Rev. C. B. West, Joshua Lord, Miss Rose (a Hibernian, T. H. Brown, wife and child; H. Arnew, Charles Birg, Thomas Morrison, James Rogers, G. Behnken, John Collins, infant of Mrs. Riley, Wm. Slatterly, Charles Dale, Wm. Scottey, S. Campos, P. Council, J. H. Pope, Jesse Barstow, Hugh Mealy, James Fox, Auguste Mayer, Ralph Seymour, James Gallagher, J. Madden, John Perry, Sarah Mullon, Ann Allen and James Buckley. Two died after reaching port. The health of San Francisco was good, as also that of the interior towns.

The friends of Gov. Henry S. Foote will be pained to hear of the death of his wife, which took place in Alameda, on the 10th ult. Her remains are to be taken to the Atlantic States for interment.

From the mines all accounts agree in pronouncing the present one of the most successful years since the discovery of the gold. The number of workmen is steadily increasing, and the yield will probably exceed that of any other twelve months in the history of California. The State is generally healthy.

Elworth, the pedestrian, has completed his great feat, at Sacramento, of walking 1000 miles in 1000 consecutive hours. He was able to walk another day when the task was done.

One of the most foul outrages ever perpetrated in California, was committed in the village of San Antonio, Alameda county, on Sunday night, July 1. A party of regulators from the Redwoods, without form or ceremony, dragged a man named John Fanning from his bed and hung him to a neighboring tree. The man resembled another suspected of horse stealing, and the resemblance cost him his life.

A desperate fight occurred on the 9th ult. at Cave City, and another at Calaveritas, in the interior, in which three men were killed. The wounding of Justice Reems, in Cave City, by Cherokee Brown, is also noticed.

Capt Doran, of the British ship Nazarine, was arrested on the 9th ult. for shooting three men (boarding-house runners) who attempted to board his vessel to entice the crew to leave while entering the harbor. The men were badly wounded. The Captain was held in the sum of $6000 to appear at the Court of Sessions.

The community has been relieved of its suspense for the past three months, by a decision rendered in the Supreme Court of the State, setting aside the assignment in the case of Adams & Co., and declaring that bankers in this State cannot take the benefit of the insolvent act. This decision affects Page, Bacon & Co.'s affairs and others.

Independence day, as usual, was the cause of many accidents. At Mormon Island a man named John Barricklo, was badly injured about his arms, head, shoulders, etc., by the premature discharge of a cannon. J. F. Clark was injured at the same time, but less severely. In San Francisco Bay, during a boat-race, two of the yachts upset and one man named Jas. K. Perkins, was drowned. Captain Johns, of the California Guards, was thrown from his horse and horribly bruised. A man named Brady had his arm and hand mangled in a shocking manner by the explosion of a small pistol in this place. A boy named Wm Wilkes was drowned in the Sacramento river on the 6th instant. A young man named Walter Danvers, alias Little Joe, was drowned recently on the South Fork of the Feather river. Charles Wilcox was mortally wounded by the bursting of a cannon at Yankee Jim's on the Fourth. Richard W. Heath, Esq., accidentally shot himself at San Mateo on the 8th inst., while practicing at a target. A young man named Kenisberg, was drowned in the Yuba, opposite Marysville.

Two companies of Col. Steptoe's command, under charge of Major Reynolds, had arrived at Benecia, from Salt Lake, after a march of one hundred days. Dates from Salt Lake were to the 30th of May. Some trouble had sprung up among the Saints and Gentiles about the freedom of bridges. The grasshoppers were very destructive in the Valley.

On the 27th April, Lieuts Mowry and Chandler left Salt Lake City with a detachment of dragoon recruits, wagons, horses, etc., by the Southern route for the Tejon Pass. This division arrived some time since, as we have learned through advices from San Diego. About the same time the remainder of the force, the entire of which number some five hundred men in the valley, left the city, part for California, and a part for Oregon. These were under command of the following officers: Col. Steptoe, Capt Ingalls, Quartermaster, Major John F. Reynolds, Lieut. L. L. Livingston, R. O. Tyler and Alston.

On the 18th June, the troops arrived at Lawson's Meadows, at which point the Quartermaster, Captain Ingalls, and Lieutenant Alston together with some sixty dragoon recruits, two hundred horses, wagons, etc., left the main force, diverged from the main road, and took the route to Fort Lane, Oregon Territory. The remainder of the troops came directly on to Carson's Valley, which they reached on the 26th June.

Many Indians were seen, who trembled a number of cattle trains in the rear of the command but assistance was promptly rendered by the latter, and their depredations speedily checked.

The troops were favored with an excellent guide, and found grass and water abundant beyond Carson Valley.

The San Francisco papers contain some accounts of the defeat of Walker and his party in Nicaragua. The Herald says:

There is a letter in town, written in pencil by Walker himself, just on the eve of his departure from San Juan. He gives the particulars of his fight with Bosko, and says: "The boys behaved as well as could be expected." He was hopeful, and considered his apparent defeat equivalent to a victory, considering the very large odds arrayed against him.

Capt Blethen, of the steamer Sierra Nevada, informs the editors of the Placer Times that he spoke two full rigged ships at anchor close to shore, with all their canvass spread and colors flying, about six miles to the northward of Cape Mendocino. Darkness prevented him from making them out. They were evidently in want of assistance.

Capt. James R. Perkins, of New York, was drowned at San Francisco on the 4th ult., by upsetting of his yacht in a race. John P. Hill, late of Hill & Broadhead, Boston, was killed on the 2d ult., by falling on an anchor of clipper Northern Empire.

A. A. Cohen, late receiver, and I. C. Wood, late partner of the house of Adams & Co., have been held to bail in the sum of $450,000, in answer to the charge of adulterating and selling a Page & Bacon gold dust on which their loss was alleged to be $200,000. The charge was made by David Chamber, late of Page & Bacon, and was generally believed to be unfounded.

The complaint charges fraud of the worst character, and may be summed up as follows: The defendants are charged with so altering the color and appearance of gold dust of inferior value, by chemicals, acids and mechanical means, as to make it resemble what is known as "gold dust," and selling the same to plaintiffs, through miners, and persons disguised as miners, in the employ of Woods & Cohen. These transactions extend back to December, 1850. The defendants, in a card, ask a suspension of public opinion until the matter is investigated, and pronounce the charges false. The warrant of arrest is made returnable on the 20th instant. The complainant brings as witnesses H. A. Whiting, Esq., and James King, of William, a leading banker of San Francisco.

A destructive fire occurred at San Francisco on the morning of the 4th. Thirty houses were burnt.

The clipper arrivals had been Castillion, Northern Empire, Arabia, Atlanta, Paragon, Witchcraft, John Milton, Sporting Star and Eagle—all from New York.

Mr. Charles Bryan, of Yuba, has received the Democratic nomination for Judge of the Supreme Court for the short term. Mr. Myron Norton, of Los Angeles, has received the nomination for Judge of the Supreme Court for the long term.

It seems that the visitation of the plague of grasshoppers, says the Marysville Herald, has been general all over California. In the counties of Shasta and Siskiyou, many fine wheat fields have been utterly ruined.

Judge Creaner has passed sentence of death upon Escobar and Sebada, two Mexicans convicted of the murder of John Sheldon, in the streets of Sonora.

During the present year there has been a very considerable falling off in the immigration to California. The statistics published at the close of the first half of the year, exhibit the fact that the excess of arrivals by sea, over the departures, was only four thousand eight hundred and twenty three, showing a falling off when compared with the corresponding half of the preceding year, of no less than twelve thousand five hundred and ninety-one.

In Oregon the gold excitement continues. On the Pend Oreille river the diggings are said to be very rich indeed. Men with pans make from $20 to $30 per day. Wells, Fargo & Co. have sent an express to Fort Colville to ascertain the truth or falsity of these statements. The Oregon Times speaks very doubtfully about them. There has been a Fremont convention at Albany, Oregon. A large body of troops under the the command of Capt. Hailer, have started out to hunt the Indians who committed the ward murder in August last. They will be joined by dragoons from California. The question of a State Government has been decided. There is a majority of 416 against it.

Exciting news has been received from Lower California, announcing the arrest of Melendres and his Secretary, Jose Nicholeas, by a party of government troops. The cause has not yet been made public. Both were placed in irons and conveyed away.

In Washington Territory, the people had declared against a State organization.

The election was over, and as far as heard from the Democratic ticket was ahead.

Our advices from the Sandwich Islands are to the 16th of June. The Polynesian is in mourning for the death of the Hon. A. Paki, the last of the family of the old High Chiefs.

FROM SAN JUAN DEL NORTE.

Letters received in Aspinwall and published in the Courier of the 21st ult., announce that Colonel Kinney arrived at Greytown, on the 18th, with thirty-five men in the barque Honduras, which sailed from Philadelphia. The Transit Company refused to give him any kind of encouragement or permission to travel on their steamers. He was, however, received by the inhabitants of Greytown, with great enthusiasm. Col. Kinney asserts in the most positive manner that he has no filibustering designs, and that his object is only to take possession of the land to which he holds a claim. Many of the expedition preceded him, and others are daily expected.

The last steamer from New York to San Juan brought out a number of French, Germans and Irishmen, said to be soldiers, who are in charge of the United States officers, and intended for the service of the Nicaraguan Government. They were immediately sent up to Virgin Bay.

CHILI.—Our dates from Valparaiso are to the 30th of June.

Congress was engaged in preparing and discussing important bills, having for their object to facilitate the industrial activity of the nation, and to fill certain wants in the legislation of the country.

BOLIVIA.—Belzu has concentrated the army at Chuquisaca, without leaving a soldier in any other part of the Republic. It is thought that he seeks to make Gen Cordova (his son in-law) President by force; but Sr. Linares is the popular candidate, and it is probable that the nation will sustain him.

PERU.—There is no news of importance, and this unfortunate Republic appears to be but little improved by her change of rulers.

We hear of more gold mining expeditions. One party started on the 11th, and the American company was to leave in about a month. The Government had issued the orders to supply them with fire-arms, including two pieces of cannon, ammunition, provisions, mules, etc.

SHIPWRECKS IN THE BAHAMAS.—Capt. Canes, of schooner Azorian, from the Bahamas, arrived in Saturday; Reports the Danish brig Jenette to have put into Acklins (Bahamas) on the 14th of July; all her crew dead; all her sails loose. Supposed the crew had been murdered the day before, as a brig was seen with a schooner alongside on that day, and it is supposed that the Jenette was the brig.

A French bark from St. Domingo, for France, was cast away at the same time on Atwood's Key. The captain and crew were saved, but the vessel and cargo are a total loss.

An Eastern bark, loaded with lumber, with all her spars gone, was abandoned and drifted into Acklins about the same time.

There were two other vessels cast away near the same place; names unknown. [New York Express, 6th inst.

The Law of Newspapers.

1. Subscribers who do not give express notice to the contrary are considered as wishing to continue their subscription.

2. If subscribers order the discontinuance of their papers, the publisher may continue to send them until all arrearages are paid.

3. If subscribers neglect or refuse to take their newspapers from the offices to which they are directed, they are held responsible until they have settled the bills and ordered them discontinued.

4. If subscribers remove to other places without informing the publishers, and the newspapers are sent to the former direction, they are held responsible.

5. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers from the office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is prima facie evidence of intentional fraud.

6. The United States courts have also repeatedly decided that a postmaster who neglects to perform his duty of giving seasonable notice, as required by the Post Office Department, of the neglect of a person to take from the office newspapers addressed to him, renders the postmaster liable to the publisher for the subscription price.

Bascom's Lectures.

By mail, the first volume of Bishop B.'s posthumous books has reached us, edited by Rev. T. N. Ralston, A. M. The editor thinks the material on hand will make three volumes of the size of the "Sermons." The lined and interlined, abridged and corrected state of the MSS. makes it necessary for the whole to be copied. This volume embraces Lectures on Infidelity, Centenary Address, Colonization Address, Madison College Inaugural, and a few other pieces. Printed by Stevenson & Owen, for Mrs. Bascom.

MONEY WANTED.—Will our friends believe us when we say that their remittances are anxiously expected by every mail? These dull summer months receipts have fallen behind expenses! Will not this announcement stir up every true friend of the Advocate and every delinquent subscriber?—Our brethren, the agents, let us hear from you. Subscribers who cannot see the agent may remit by mail, registering, and their receipts will be acknowledged. Business is dull, our expenses are heavy and our wants are pressing. Is not this enough?

AGENTS who have not received accounts for collection, in Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and Ouachitta Conferences, will do us a favor by letting us know their post offices.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE FOR JULY.—The present number of this monthly does not contain an article which is not of the liveliest interest.

DEATHS.—On Saturday died one of our most eminent and useful citizens, Samuel J. Peters. A few days before, of Apoplexy, L. C. Duncan. The death of such men is a public loss and a great one.

AN ITINERANT EMBLEM.—The Mexican saddle presented to Bishop Early by the Texas Conference passed through our office a few days ago, by express, on its way to Lynchburg, Va. We hope it reached the good Bishop by the 15th inst. on which day he was to "commence holding a six days' camp meeting," and then leave for the Western Virginia, Missouri, St. Louis and Kansas Conferences.

EMORY COLLEGE, GA.—Dr. Means having resigned the Presidency, Hon. H. W. Hilliard was elected. It is rumored that Mr. H. will not accept. At the late commencement the degree of D. D. was conferred on our worthy friend, L. D. Huston, editor of the Home Circle.

LIBERIA.—Under date of May 22, ex-President Roberts writes that good health prevailed and steady progress was being made in agriculture, trade and mechanic arts.

Accounts confirm the election to the Presidency of Liberia, at the biennial election 1st May, Stephen A. Benson, of Bassa county. Benson emigrated with his parents to Liberia from Maryland when a mere child. For a series of years he has been a successful merchant at the old Pennsylvania settlement of Bento Cove, has filled the office of judge of one of the highest courts in the country, and at the time of his promotion was Vice President of the Republic, to which he was advanced two years ago. He is an ordained Methodist preacher, and is well spoken of in every respect. Roberts' removal is an experiment.

BRIDLING THE TONGUE.—Resolved, by the grace of God, never to speak much, lest I often speak too much; and not to speak at all, rather than to no purpose; always to make my tongue and heart go together, so as never to speak with the one what I do not think in the other; always to speak of other men's sins only before their faces, and of their virtues only behind their backs.

Southern (Catholic) Standard.

As promised last week, we now do the last sad honors for our late cotemporary. Is this the third or fourth of that faith for whom we have officiated? We are losing the count. In this case, we are free to say, a better fate was deserved—if typographical neatness, editorial ability, Catholic devotion, religious apathy and American antipathy were merits. But all availed not.

To the "Catholics of the South," who have patronised but not paid, the Standard says:

"They will favor us so far as to send us during the coming week, the sum of one dollar each, as the price of subscription for our paper for the quarter ending August 12.

With the money which we expect to realize in this way, we hope to be enabled to accomplish two things: 1st, to finish out the present quarter; 2d, to return to each of our subscribers who have paid the subscription in advance the sum of $2 25, being the balance which will be due to them as overdraws from the end of the present quarter, when we intend to suspend the publication of our paper. We will also be enabled to return to each of five gentlemen the sum of $25, which they kindly lent us to enable us to pay in part for the material necessary to the publication of the Southern Standard.

Then, if a sufficient number of the readers of the Standard can be induced to prepay the subscription for another quarter, we shall continue to publish it for that term, and so on. It is scarcely necessary to state that hereafter we do not wish to receive subscriptions by the year, preferring not to commit ourselves by receiving money which we may be compelled to return."

Somehow it is that the Pope and Dr. Faust cannot get on together. The Standard did not lack endorsements. "Anthony," Archbishop of New Orleans; "Michael," Bishop of Mobile; "Aug. Martin," of Natchitoches, endorsed it. But all availed not.

Romanism has been such an enemy to printing, that instrument of knowledge and influence now refuses to work for it. Just retribution!

Many of their people cannot read; and among those that can, there is too much servility of judgment and intolerance of opinion for the newspaper to flourish. They are not trained—the best of them—for the support of an independent press. Priests distrust it; people neglect it. This is the fruit of their baneful tree.

Moreover, while Protestantism is regarded and punished as a crime wherever Romanists have ascendency, it goes with an ill grace for them to write about religious freedom and liberty of conscience; asking what they do not give. Their swelling effusions and patriotic editorials have, in this light, an inconsistent, self-condemned, haggard look.

The genius of their system, frequent experiment here and elsewhere, and mocking inconsistency when touching upon any of the leading subjects of discussion, rule Romanism out of the lines of journalism. They had as well quit trying; and, casting themselves on the forbearance of the press, leave their poor cause in its hands, with the standing request of intercession—Ora pro nobis.

Hymns on the Holy Ghost.

Dr. Summers, all ending in the Christian Advocate to our regret that most of the Wesleyan hymns on the "Offices of the Holy Ghost," in the present collection, were in metres impracticable to congregations, says:

"This is a sad reflection on our Church. We deeply deplore the neglect of psalmody among us."

So it is—so do we. Perhaps one cause of the falling off in congregational singing is that singing is not practiced at home, and too seldom has a place in family prayers. Organs (an innovation) are excused by some on the score of necessity.

A minister, not easily put out, has told us of a certain Sabbath, in a large city congregation, when he gave out four L. M. hymns, and every one was sung to the tune of "Old Hundred." They were short of long metres. Now even choir singing is better than such congregational failures.

Dr. S. has conferred a benefit on the whole subject by the following competent remarks. We advise worshippers to cut this extract out and paste it in the hymn book, and it may promote the use and appreciation of this rich but neglected portion of it:

"It is a pity that our congregations cannot sing any tune to the measure of the 'Rock of Ages,' suited to Hymn 202; or so plain and old fashioned a tune as Amsterdam, suited to Hymn 203; or any tune like 'Wrestling Jacob,' suited to Hymns 211, 215, 219; or 'Martin's Lane,' or any other like 'I'll praise my Maker while I've breath,' suited to Hymn 216; or 'Missionary Hymn,' suited to Hymn 218; or any like 'How tedious and tasteless the hours,' suited to Hymn 223. There are several long, common and short metre hymns written by the Wesleys, and two altered by them from old Henry More, in this department; and many others in those sections of the book where the distinctive operations of the Spirit are treated of in awakening, witnessing, sanctifying, &c. Indeed, we explored nearly the whole realm of Wesleyan psalmody in quest of hymns in easy metres, omitting many fine ones in peculiar metres, to correct this department of the Hymn Book. The best in Watts, Doddridge, Beddome, Cowper and Montgomery were introduced because of their easy metres. We could have omitted all of the Wesleyan peculiar metres, and supplied their places with common metres from other sources; we would, however, rather have the Methodist people read the former than sing the latter. But why does not every Methodist preacher 'give out' peculiar metres, and encourage the people to learn tunes for every one of them? We can conceive of scarcely anything that would more enlarge the experience and improve the worship of the Church. We once repeated Hymn 440 in a sermon at a camp meeting in Virginia, recommended it to be sung in a tune like 'Come on, my partners in distress,' and the grove was afterwards vocal with the celestial strains. The hymn was written by C. Wesley to assist his mother when seeking for the witnessing Spirit; and it is adapted to help others as well as her into the experience of the glorious liberty of the children of God. Let such glorious hymns be sung."

LETTER FROM BISHOP ANDREW.

NO. III.

Some Objections to the California Work Noticed.

I am not unapprised that many of our good brethren are opposed to the California work, and shall now proceed to notice some of the objections which I have heard alleged against the propriety of the Southern Church prosecuting her work in that country.

One argument mainly urged has been, that California being a free State, the Southern Church ought not to attempt to establish herself there. I have in a former number made some suggestions on this subject, but perhaps it deserves a more extended notice.

If it is the doctrine of the M. E. Church, South, that her ministers are only fit to preach the gospel in slaveholding communities, and that her mission as a Church is entirely to them, then I have only to say that I have wholly misunderstood the matter, and am wholly mistaken in my church relations; and, if I am not wholly mistaken in my views, this opinion, if made the basis of our Church action, will exclude us from almost the whole missionary field now open to us.

What business have we in China? That is not slave territory; and besides our Northern brethren and our Wesleyan brethren are there, and it is certainly among the possibilities that we may come in contact with them some time or other, and thus Methodist altar may be raised against Methodist altar, which seems to be the thing so greatly dreaded by some good souls among us. Where, then, shall we look? Our Missionary Board, at its last meeting, recommended the attempt to establish missions in Central and South America; but these are all free from slavery—at least, such I believe is the fact. The Board are wrong altogether in their recommendation; it is useless to take any steps in that direction; all this territory is tabooed, so far as the Church, South, is concerned.

It seems we are shut up, on this principle, to the slave-holding States of this Republic. We have not even the consolation of hoping for an outlet in any of the new territory which may hereafter be connected with this great Republic; for I believe it is generally understood that there is very little prospect of extending the area of slavery in that direction.

I know that the South looks to Kansas with some confidence, but all must admit that the fate of Kansas is yet very uncertain. If, then, we intend to establish the doctrine that our branch of the Church has nothing to do on free soil, our foreign work is swept away at a stroke, and to a large extent our domestic missions must soon share the same fate.

"But," says some good brother, "not quite so fast. We are only opposed to operating on free soil over which the American flag waves. Our consciences give us no trouble in sending missionaries to free soil over which waves a foreign flag." It seems to me that this is rather a singular position for conscience to take. A foreign flag interposes no difficulty at all in our way, although all the institutions of the country are avowedly hostile to slavery, and although our brethren from the free States are there. What's the difference? We don't send missionaries there to war with the civil institutions of the country, but to preach to the people the gospel of the grace of God. Sail a few leagues away, to some land over which the glorious stars and stripes are waving, and straightway our missionaries must pause, and although the people need the gospel, and implore them to preach it to them, the answer must be, "No, we cannot establish churches among you; slavery does not exist here; and besides, our beloved brethren of the Meth. Epis. Church have churches in some parts of the country, and if we establish ourselves here we shall very likely at some time come in contact with them, and that would be very bad. To be sure, we have missions and are doing all we can to establish ourselves at A, B and C, but then, remember that yonder glorious eagle and that brilliant field of stars and stripes waves not over those lands; if they did, our lips would be sealed; for free soil over which waves our nation's ensign is interdicted to us."

Are we prepared, as a Church, to take this position? I hope not. It seems to me that if we adopt the principle noticed above we shall go very far to establish the doctrine which some of our opponents have urged, that the great object of the leaders of the Southern movement was to conform our ecclesiastical legislation and Church operations to the civil and political movements of the slave States; or that our prime object in the separation was to extend the area of slavery and promote its establishment. Now, if I understand the reasons of the Southern organization, and the basis on which it rests, they were and are simply these: We believe that the Church, in her associate capacity, has no right to meddle with the relations of master and slave, except to instruct each class in the duties appropriate to each, and to use every appliance within our control to make all better by leading them to fear God and keep his commandments; and that consequently, when the Church, in her chief councils, undertook to declare any member or minister worthy of censure or punishment of any sort for the reason first—he was the owner of slaves, she took a position and pursued a course of action violative of her constitution, unauthorized by the word of God, and destructive of the peace of society.

Such were the views and feelings which influenced my course in the memorable struggle of 1844; and I believe that similar convictions operated in producing the course adopted by the Southern portion of the Methodist Church in that painful conflict. My views on this subject have undergone no change. I regard the Church and her ministers as distinctly committed to the spiritual evangelization of the world; and that the ministers of Christ should confine themselves to their proper spiritual functions, without turning aside to take part in the political and party strifes that are constantly arising to tempt them from their avowed path. To me, as a minister of Jesus Christ, it is of no consequence whether I preach to slaveholders or free sollers. I leave them to regulate these relations according to their own individual convictions of right and propriety. I come to them, in whatever relation they may sustain, with an authoritative message from God, distinctly announcing to each his duty to his Maker and his fellows.

Such is, I believe, our course in California. The preachers whom we have sent there have been instructed to keep themselves aloof from political and partizan strifes, and confine themselves to their proper ministerial work, according to the example of Christ and his apostles. They are not sent there to promote slavery or anti-slavery; they are not sent to the people of California because they are pro-slavery or anti-slavery, but because they are sinners, and must be converted or damned!

And permit me to say, just here, that if there is any place on earth where the gospel is needed, in all its strength and spirituality, divested of all foreign elements, that place is California.

There are some other points on which we design to touch hereafter. We have perhaps said enough for the present.

THE CONCERT OF PRAYER.

Mr. Editor—Several of our Annual Conferences, at their last sessions, adopted resolutions recommending the holding of prayer meetings throughout their bounds on the first Monday night in each month, for the special purpose of invoking the Divine blessing upon the missionary cause. But it was not a general movement with all the Conferences.

Having been apprised for many years that several of the religious denominations of this country have their monthly concerts of prayer for this purpose, I have often been surprised that our Church has never adopted a similar movement. And is it not a subject worthy of the consideration of our entire connection, and should not all the Conferences heartily recommend it to their people?

Now I suggest that each Conference, at its next session, set apart the first Sunday night in each month for that special purpose. I propose Sunday night instead of Monday night, because it seems difficult to secure the hearty co-operation of the Church in every place on any other night of the week, on account of various conflicting appointments of other societies and associations. And besides it is the night that has been thus appropriated by the other denominations alluded to.

Who, sir, is prepared to estimate the great amount of good that would result from such a movement? It will give a new impulse to the missionary cause at home and abroad. Let the people assemble themselves together, and accompany their contributions with their fervent prayers, and the blessing of Heaven will follow.

On such occasions, let the minister, or whoever conducts the exercises, in addition to the usual routine of services, be furnished with such documents to read to the people as will impart instruction upon this great subject, such as extracts from reports, journals, and the correspondence of our various missionaries from their respective fields.

There is no doubt that such a movement would not only greatly increase our missionary collections, but would exert a powerful reflex influence at home. Revivals deep and thorough would pervade the land, and it would result in a large accession to our missionary force in foreign lands; and other fields would be occupied as they are thrown open.

And besides, it would be a great encouragement to those noble men who are engaged in this work to know that at one and the same time there are thousands of their brethren praying for God's special blessing upon their labors.

Dr. Taylor remarked, at the last session of the Alabama Conference, that often amid the great discouragements he met with in his labors among the Chinese, his heart had been cheered up by the thought that at least some one in his own native land was praying for him. With telegraphic despatch the petition is sent to Heaven, and from thence is transported heavenly consolation to the hearts of those self-sacrificing men, by which they are reminded of that precious promise, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

Much more might be said upon this subject were it necessary. Let it be presented to all the Conferences at their approaching sessions, and let one grand concert of action be had by the entire Church; and, under the direction of the great Head of the Church, we shall soon see "nations born in a day," "and the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ."

Marion, Ala. Y.

REMARKS.—The matter certainly deserves the consideration invoked for it by our correspondent, and is well put by him. The Monday night appointment, doubtless for the causes assigned, is, in our experience, a failure. It is attended by few, inasmuch as if it be only a Monday night meeting, it recurs too seldom to get up a church going habit. If it be not sustained by special information get up for the occasion and suitably dispensed, even on Sunday night, the special interest will fail. For this end the Missionary Advocate is a desideratum.

The people know what to pray for when the concrete case is before them. The prayer meeting at "the house of Mary, the mother of John, whose surname was Mark," had no uncertain aim, when, by the power of God, it effected the jail delivery of Peter. The souls gathered there knew where and why he was kept in prison.

Such a monthly concert would have great power of Christian development. Missionary collections would accumulate, and an enlightened missionary spirit be fostered—ED.

HOME CORRESPONDENCE.

MANSFIELD, LA., July 25, 1855.

I have not at any time before ventured to correspond with you, and doubt now my ability to give you a letter which will interest you and your readers. Yet, having been thrown into this interesting region of country, and witnessed on yesterday the closing exercises of the first session of Mansfield Female College, I cannot forego the pleasure of making known, through the medium of your paper, to the friends of education, not only in this State but throughout the South, the highly satisfactory manner in which both teachers and scholars acquitted themselves in the examination. It was indeed worthy of any institution in any State or community, and has fully established the reputation of the highly intelligent, high-toned and refined President, Dr. Thweatt, to ability of the highest order as an instructor of youth and manager of a female college. The Doctor, indeed, is one of nature's noblemen, and has won for himself the friendship and admiration of this entire community, which, in point of liberality, hospitality, intelligence and morality is not excelled or surpassed by any community or village in the South.

The success of the first session of the college is a sure guarantee that its progress is upward and onward, and that it will soon reach a position of such prominence that it will reflect credit upon the State and the Church which endorses its claims and takes its interest under its fostering care.

The very handsome manner in which the young ladies of the school acquitted themselves in their readings, recitations, declamations and performance upon the piano, won the admiration and applause of a large and intelligent assemblage, many of whom, ladies and gentlemen, were from neighboring parishes. Indeed, Commencement day was a great day for all interested in the school, and particularly for the citizens of Mansfield and DeSoto parish.

When the scholastic exercises were ended, Hinton Smith, Esq., in behalf of the young ladies of the college, delivered the regular address, which was done in good style and touched in handsome language. His allusions to the importance of educating our daughters at home, sustaining Southern institutions of learning, and of inculcating a purely Southern sentiment of mind and heart, which cannot be done when they come in contact with the corrupting moral, political and religious atmosphere of the North, were very forcible, and told successfully upon the minds of the audience.

Mr. Smith through, Mr. D. Creswell took the stand, in advocacy of a subscription to furnish the institution with philosophical, chemical and other necessary and useful apparatus, which movement and measure was seconded by Gen. Phillips with such success that the handsome sum of sixteen hundred dollars was raised in not many more minutes, telling volumes in favor of the liberality, independence and appreciation of this people, who are determined to leave nothing undone to make the institution one of the first in the South. It is therefore to be hoped that the friends of education throughout the State, and particularly the friends of the Methodist Church, will rally to the support of Mansfield College.

Mansfield is well located in a high and healthy country, free from epidemics, surrounded by as independent, moral and intelligent people, and peopled itself by moral and enlightened citizens. Contrasted with the characteristics of my portion of the State, which in nature is the garden spot of the South, I am forcibly struck with the liberality and enterprise of this region, and feel that a man can afford to till poorer soil, to accumulate less money, and bear other inconveniences for the pleasure of the society of this purely American community.

I found little or no news in my travel in the country through which I have passed. The crops generally have very much improved in the last month or six weeks, during which time rains have fallen more or less in nearly every section. The corn crop is very nearly made, and it may be said that enough has been or will be made to answer the wants. The cotton crop will not likely, under favorable circumstances from this out, exceed two-thirds of a crop. The stand was bad, and the plant is yet small. The health of the country generally is very good. No excitement of any kind prevails. I find religion in statu quo; have had the pleasure of meeting here several friends of the ministry, to say, Rev. Messrs. Doty, Randall and Sugg, all of whom seem to be doing well, physically and mentally.

RED RIVER COUNTY, TEXAS, July 30, 1855.

McKenzie Institute is situated in Red River county, Texas, three miles west of Clarksville, the county seat. The eye of the stranger, as he approaches the building, is greeted by four large frame buildings, two stories and a half high, with double piazzas, situated about fifty yards apart, presenting quite an imposing aspect. The first floor of the centre building, (the full square of the house,) is the recitation room, and is also used for church purposes. The past session there were one hundred and sixty pupils, not as many as the previous session numbered, if correctly informed, but now that there is more room, doubtless the increase for the next session will be large. The Principal receives young ladies as well as young gentlemen. They are not associated together, but kept apart by rigid discipline. This institution has been reared by the untiring personal efforts of the Principal. Sixteen years ago, with about fifteen pupils, the foundation was laid, and by the report of the last General Conference, the number had reached 230 pupils.* How many well cultivated minds and sanctified hearts have gone forth from this classic spot to adorn the Church and country!

The secret of its success may be attributable not only to the Principal, but to the fact that the Bible stands as the text-book, the luminary, throwing its sanctifying rays into every department.

It was the privilege of the writer to attend the last few days of the examination; just passed off; and, without a disposition to exaggerate, I must accord a commendation beyond my expectations. Every class, whether in algebra, mathematics, Spanish, Greek, Hebrew, or the strains of music, instrumental or vocal, or in their addresses, won upon my soul, until I found already I had become with them a unit.

I left the place with the thought, truly, Texas is a great country.

Let all who wish to place their sons or daughters at this institution of parental government, early secure a place before the 1st of October next, or it may be told them at the door, the register is full, and there is no room for another.

SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH.

The first great step towards bringing Europe and America in telegraphic communication is about being taken. A submarine telegraph across the Gulf of St. Lawrence is about being completed. We regard this as only the beginning of the end; and certain little doubt that before the lapse of a decade, we will be receiving messages direct from the old world as we do now from Halifax. There is nothing startling in this proposition, although any man who would have made it ten years ago would have been declared a fit subject for a lunatic asylum. The vast improvements which have marked the history of telegraphing the past five years, would alone warrant and sustain any one in making it, even on the supposition that perfection had been arrived at, and that further advancement was impossible.

Just think of the sublime idea for a moment. Imagine, for an instant, the new world connected by a magnetic cable with the old. Why, we would have news of the warlike operations in the Crimea as fast as electricity could transmit the intelligence. Should Sebastopol be taken, the information would reach New Orleans, be published and read almost as soon as in Paris or London! Why, the very thought is full of sublimity, and calculated to make every American heart thrill and throb with unbounded pride—for it was American genius that tamed the lightning, and American skill that made it subservient to the wants, interests and happiness of mankind.

But to our immediate purpose: Some weeks since the New York Herald gave an interesting account of the great submarine telegraph project by which it is proposed to connect the two continents. The enterprise is progressing swimmingly. The parties by whom it has been undertaken have been organized under the title of "The New York, Newfoundland and London Telegraph Company." Their names are, Peter Cooper, Moses Taylor, Cyrus W. Field, Marshall O. Roberts, Chandler White and Samuel F. B. Morse—all good and substantial citizens, with the father of telegraphing, S. F. B. Morse, among them. The points of connection, according to the Herald, are St. Johns in Newfoundland, and Cork on the southern coast of Ireland, and the distance 1,080 miles. From St. Johns a line is in course of construction across the southern part of Newfoundland to Port au Basque, and will be completed in eight or ten weeks. The distance between Port au Basque and Cape North across a portion of the Gulf of St. Lawrence is seventy-four miles, and the connection of these points will be effected by a submarine cable of three wires, and about an inch and a half thick. This cable was shipped from London on the 28th of last month, in the ship Sarah L. Bryant, which is now lying at Port au Basque. Mr. Canning, the engineer who superintended the laying of the Mediterranean cable, sailed for America on the 7th inst., in the steamer Canada, and is at present in Newfoundland, waiting to oversee the execution of the new enterprise.

This is the first submarine cable of any great importance ever laid in this country, and will undoubtedly inaugurate a new era in the history of telegraphing this side of the water. The weight of the cable, says our New York cotemporary, is four hundred tons, and the time required for putting it down will not exceed two days at the utmost, unless the weather should prove very unfavorable. As the occasion will be one of more than usual interest, quite a considerable number of ladies and gentlemen, we understand, have taken passage on board the steamer Calhoun, which has been engaged by the Company to tow the Sarah L. Bryant across the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and which was to sail on the 2d of August. Some of the most distinguished ladies and gentlemen of New York were to be of the party. The excursion must have been a most delightful one, although business was the leading feature of the undertaking. We shall await the result of the enterprise with much interest, and trust that everything turned out prosperously and pleasantly.

The Herald then goes on to state that it is the intention of the Company to stop at several points on the southern and western coasts of Newfoundland, which may be regarded almost as a terra incognito. The island is rich in mineral wealth, as proved by the explorations of the geologists and mineralogists who were employed by the Company to select the fifty miles of land that had been granted them by the Colonial Government as an encouragement to them to carry out the enterprise.

The establishment of this telegraph, while it will be of great importance to the people of Newfoundland, derives its national, world-wide importance, from the fact that it will be the first great link in the chain that is, at no distant period, to bring the two continents into almost instant communication with each other.

Here is the modus operandi of the work. The steamer Calhoun will take the vessel having the submarine cable on board in tow at Port au Basque and proceed across the Gulf to Cape North, the nearest point on the coast of Cape Breton. While she is steaming at the rate of between two and three miles an hour, the cable will be paid out from the stern of the Sarah L. Bryant. About thirty men will be employed in this process, which is very simple, the cable being run out over a wheel from the coil as it lies in the hold of the vessel. We ardently trust no accident will mar the pleasure of the trip, or impair the success of the undertaking. Failure might impair the prestige which now surrounds the enterprise, while complete success would render the assurance now felt that Europe and America will be speedily united by telegraphic hands, double sure.

HEALTH OF VICKSBURG.—The Vicksburg Whig, of the 9th, says: "The health of our city continues to be excellent. The quarantine is in full and successful operation. Dr. Brickell, the efficient quarantine physician, with his assistants and officers, are diligent and firm in discharging their duties, and we trust will succeed in keeping the yellow fever, now epidemic in New Orleans, out of our limits. Our readers may safely rely on our giving ample notice of the appearance of Yellow Jack here, should we again be visited by it—in which event we will be scourged once more.

A writer has compared worldly friendship to our shadow—while we walk in sunshine it sticks to us; but the moment we enter the shade it deserts us.

NEW ORLEANS DOOMED!

Under the foregoing fearful heading we find the subjoined paragraph "going the rounds" of journalism:

The Memphis Eagle predicts that twenty years from this time grass will be growing in the streets of New Orleans, and the completed railway system of the South will have transferred the merchants of that city to Savannah and Charleston. It says that the deepening of the navigation of the Gulf must and will be avoided.

Our Memphis cotemporary "predicts" with so much emphasis, that one would naturally infer the "wish was father to the thought" in him. We have been well aware, for years, that New Orleans had no friends among rival cities, that she had nothing to expect from their generosity; that no scruples were indulged in when it was practicable to deprive her of a portion of her trade; and that conventions have been gathered together with the principal object of devising ways and means, railroad systems, plans, etc., whereby still further diversions could be made, and our neighbors still more largely benefitted at our expense. But this is the first time we have heard the doom of New Orleans denounced against us—for this practically amounts to little less.

But, our Memphis cotemporary is, we are inclined to believe, entirely at fault in his prediction. It is quite evident that he is neither prophet nor the son of a true prophet. He is blind to all interests and purposes, judging by the history of the past, the experience of the present and the promises of the future—a false prophet. We have reflected somewhat upon the subject, and have been unable to discover the smallest foundation, or even the slightest sign of foundation, upon which to base the prediction.

Even abroad—in quarters where feelings adverse to a Southern city is not to be looked for—the predictions of the Memphis Eagle is viewed with incredulity. The Philadelphia North Americans, of the 30th ult., speaks of it as follows:

The Memphis Eagle anticipates a rather unpleasant result as likely to flow from the railway system of the South, than will, in all probability, ever be known. This is nothing less than the transfer of the whole commerce of New Orleans to Savannah and Charleston, by means of the railways connecting these ports with the Mississippi river, which traverse the heart of the whole region. That those lines may work important changes is not to be doubted, but the admirable commercial position of New Orleans, and the constantly swelling tide of the Mississippi river, render it very problematical that "twenty-five years from this time, the grass would be growing in the streets" of the Crescent City.

The North Americans speaks sensibly. It does not ignore the existence of the Mississippi river, as too many hot-headed, impracticable blockheads do. Why, the "swelling trade" of the Father of Waters will continue to augment for countries; and enough of that trade will seek its natural market—New Orleans—to make it a magnificent commercial emporium, even if every petty town on its margin had a railroad running direct to Savannah and Charleston.

But, not content with predicting an evil destiny for us; not satisfied with ignoring the existence of the great "inland sea" of the West, as Mr. Calhoun beautifully termed the Mississippi, the Memphis Eagle omitted all mention of our railroad system, which will protect us against the terrible calamities alluded to, to a great measure, as well as of the efforts in progress, with good prospects of success, to construct a railroad across the peninsula of Florida, which will do away with the "dangerous" navigation of the Gulf."

The New Orleans, Jackson and Great Northern Railroad—which is slowly, but surely progressing—the editor of the Eagle appears to have entirely lost sight of. Rather strange forgetfulness, truly. To take the widest margin, that road will be built through the State of Tennessee in less than five years. In its course it will cross, and consequently tap, every river running in the direction of Savannah and Charleston. Under such circumstances, with better facilities are afforded, time and space, both subserved, does the Eagle suppose that the people are going to leave an old, natural, well-known market—the best in the South—for the sales of their produce—for distant and strange markets, because expensive railroad companies ask the privilege of transporting the freight? If he does, he will find himself very much mistaken. At all events, we as citizens of New Orleans, are perfectly willing to abide the issue; and if we live long enough to see the stress is transformed into grassy avenues, we can scarcely rival, if we do not surpass, the number of years attained by the longest lived patriarch who flourished before the deluge.

We are very well aware our people have been derelict in railroad enterprise. But, considering our condition, we have done wonders. We have a great railroad going North, and two splendid roads going West. A few years will see them completed, and then it will be impossible for anybody to taunt us with being entirely behind our neighbors in the march of improvement and development. [Daily Crescent.

SUGAR PLANTERS' CONVENTION.

There was a meeting of sugar planters in the Court-house of the town of Thibodaux, on the 28th ult. We append the first paragraph of the proceedings, as it will explain the object of this present as well as we can write it: "At a meeting of those interested in removing the Sugar market from the levee at New Orleans to the opposite side of the river, called to meet at the Court-house in Thibodaux, on Saturday, July 28, 1855, the meeting was called to order by C. Beatty, Esq., and John C. Potts, Esq., was appointed President, and Adam Beatty, Secretary."

A committee was appointed to draft and report suitable resolutions for the consideration of the meeting. In a brief period the committee returned and submitted the following preamble and resolutions, which, after being ably supported by J. C. Beatty, Esq., in a speech, were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, The present locality in the city of New Orleans, at which sugar is landed to be sold, is too small to suit the increasing demands of this agricultural interest; and whereas, owing to the too narrow space, sugar has to be sold within thirty-six hours after landing or be warehoused; and whereas, other great evils have been imposed on the sugar interest, and become so great as to require a change,

Therefore resolved, That in order to relieve the sugar interest of this great burden, we respectfully invite the co-operation of all persons interested in the sugar crop of Louisiana to unite in devising ways and means to remedy the evils complained of.

Resolved, That we invite the different parishes interested to hold meetings to express their views on this subject.

Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting, the only way to relieve the sugar interest of the evils complained of is that large and commodious warehouses should be erected on the right bank of the Mississippi river, as convenient to the terminus of the railroad as possible.

Resolved, That we hear with pleasure that the N. O. & G. W. R. R. Company are ready to furnish all needful data to accomplish this desirable result.

Messrs. Bernard and Casey also made speeches explaining the "facilities and advantages of establishing a Sugar-market at Algiers."

Speaking of the storage facilities now afforded in Algiers, a correspondent of the Minerva says:

"I am informed that there is room now for the storage of ten thousand hogsheads, with tracks laid, and railroad enough sufficient for all that would probably be stored at any one time. Can we not unite in giving it a trial? We can lose nothing and may gain much. I think the difficulties are imaginary, and that a properly digested plan of arrangement which might be agreed upon for storage and delivery, soon would become very popular; and the planter and merchant would be able to keep the crop out of market until the price proved satisfactory.

We shall watch the course of this movement with much interest. It is very important and involves considerations of more than common moment.—[Daily Crescent.

A "stuck up" sort of a genius entered a store in Philadelphia, and turning up his nose at some apples in the window, exclaimed: "Are those apples fit for a hog to eat?" "I don't know; try them and see," was the instant reply of the storekeeper.

WANTED.—A young gentleman, a graduate of LaGrange College, at Florence, desires a situation as a teacher in a family or in a seminary. I can commend him very highly both as a moral and intellectual man. For further particulars apply to the undersigned, at Florence, Ala. R. H. RIVERS.

Deaths.

DIED—June 19, in Harrison county, Texas, Mrs. M. ALICE POOLE, second daughter of Langsden East, Esq., St. Helena, La., in the 18th year of her age.

Less than one year ago the deceased left a blooming and joyous bride, the good wishes of many friends and the prayers of Christian parents following her to her new home, where the affability of her manners and the goodness of her heart soon knit strong ties to her in bonds of friendship. Her prospects for a long life were fair, very fair. But, alas! how suddenly may our brightest hopes be blasted! The "insatiate archer" sent his bow, and the work was speedily accomplished.

Happily for her she had in health turned her attention to religion. Near two years since she sought and obtained the pearl of great price at a camp meeting in Amite county; and the same Jesus who there spoke peace to her troubled soul was present to sustain when the world was growing dim and the dark waves of Jordan were swelling about her sinking bark. Her last moments were spent in efforts to console her afflicted husband, and in leaving messages of comfort to parents whose heart-strings she knew would well nigh be severed by a stroke so sudden. May the great Physician heal their wounds, not by the waters of Lethe, but by the balm of grace. M.

DIED—July 7, SARAH JANE, wife of R. D. Keller, Esq.

She was born March 8, 1827, in Greene county, Ga. In the fall of 1843 she embraced religion and attached herself to the M. E. Church at a camp meeting near Columbus, Miss., from which time till her death she lived a consistent member. For over nine years she was the subject of great affliction, which she bore with becoming patience and fortitude. Some time previous to her death she was very low, when it was thought by many one that it was impossible for her to live. She then expressed a readiness and willingness to die. She remarked to her husband that her way seemed perfectly clear. That death was very sudden, and attended with great suffering; and although she then had but little as to the future, her friends remain no doubt as to her salvation.

FRUIT.—We never saw the fruit-shops and market-entrances more appetizingly garnished with the juicy offerings of Pomona than at present. There appears to be a grand mass meeting or southern convention of fruits, from every latitude between Mason and Dixon's line and the equator. That hardy king of fruits, the apple; the pulpy and evanescent peach, which if not quickly consumed, will rot from its outside to its centre; the luscious pear, which brooks as little delay, rotting from the centre to the outside; the rosy-cheeked nectarine; the purple grape; the pink-hearted pomegranate, and the juice-bursting fig—all in their different varieties—constitute the continental army of good things, who meet and fraternize with the golden-hued legions of the sunny Antilles—the pine-apple, orange, lemon, mango, banana and plantain, with an occasional accompaniment of something unknown to many in these parts, the "alligator pear," an uncouth-looking fruit, held at a fabulous price, which has a sign stuck up to call the attention of the passer-by. Mountains of melons of every size, shape and degree, from the watery fifty-pounder to the sugared cantelope, and the little speckled "scated melon," which nature created to be smelt and not eaten, are piled around the small-fry enumerated above.

Altogether, fruit has accumulated in such abundance, and a great part of it is to be had at such cheap prices, that the popular appetite for it seems to be sated; and many a proud pear and blushing peach that on its first arrival coolly asked for a dime, has wasted its sweetness on the stingy crowd until all its beauty and spirit has vanished, and it has terminated its career ignominiously by being carried off half-rotten, and for half a cent, in a nigger boy's hat.

We cannot drop this subject without advertising to that enterprizing class of citizens who receive and dishurse the aforesaid fruits—who preside over the various juicy mass meetings, and by their skill in ranging them out and displaying them to the public eye, render them more tempting than Dame Nature ever intended them to be. These fruit-vendors—Spaniards, or "Dagoes," as they are familiarly styled—show consummate skill and taste in displaying their fruits in their shops; but in the market-places they show genius—doubled genius. Hundreds of persons whose ideas, from poverty or other causes, never soar beyond pork and potatoes, pass hurriedly through the fruit quarters in the markets, without deigning to look at what is there displayed, and who only know by the smell that fruit is near. If they would stop and contemplate, as we do occasionally, they would discover not only that fruit is there, and for sale, and for sale cheap and in any quantity, but they would discern also that it is ranged with real artistic skill into the seeming of a landscape—the different shades and colors of the various fruits being as effectively commingled and shaped into ideality as a painter's colors on his canvas.

We will consider, good reader, that the current of people in which we pass one of those fruity triumphs is a river. Nearest to us is a rough beach or shore, made up of almond, filbert and pecan gravel, yam stumps, ginger roots and cocoa-nut rocks. Next is a sloping bank of peaches, pears, nectarines, etc. Then, abrupt hills of apples and oranges, with melon precipices in proper proximity. So much for earth. The celestial scenery is represented by gorgeous clouds of purple grapes, with a sunset glory of pine-apples and red and yellow bananas. Nature being thus fully represented, architecture comes in. Little Bunker-hill monuments of apples and peaches are ranged along the base of the apple and orange hills, while split melons are scattered over the beach like boats ready for launching. All these things we discover by taking a deliberate and proper view of what so many give the go-by, as an incongruous and chaotic heaping of fruit.

But it is in the architectural department that the swarthy fruiterer displays his choicest skill—in the little peach and apple monuments of which we spoke. These monuments are built when the material descends to a certain stage of cheapness—say five or six for a picayune. Three constitute the base or abutment, and three more the shaft. So numerous are these monuments, and so universally do they exist the year round, from the perpetually cheapening process of some fruit or other, that people in general think it is nothing to build them. Those who hold to this opinion have only to make the experiment to ascertain the difficulty of it. Yet these Spaniards have so effectually reduced the thing to a science, that it is nothing to them. We have often seen one of these geniuses take a handful of peaches or apples, and pile them up monumentally, as it seemed, by just dropping them down, one upon another. One would think this the acme of that kind of genius; but it is not. We have long had a distrust of those little monuments, and never purchase one without first taking a peep at the rear side of it; and our distrust has in nearly all instances been well-founded. The freckles and moles, or, more plainly speaking, the rotten spots, in the fruit, are always to be found on the rear side. This would seem to betoken great care and study in the building process; but no such mental labor is requisite, according to what we have seen.

"If them would'st view th' French Market aright, Go visit it by the dawn's gray light."

Another wonderful exercise of skill by these Spanish frulterers, is the precision with which they classify their fruits according to their size. An invoice of apples or peaches is received—all, perhaps, off the same tree, but varying in size. The Spaniard, sitting in front of the newly-purchased barrel, and with a basket on each side, lifts out the luscious globules with both hands, and throws them according to their size into the respective baskets. With the large and small apples no skill is requisite; but with the middle-sized ones there must be some skill, although the Spaniard loses no time in deciding which basket must receive them. There must be a line between a "a pleayune apiece" and "three for a dime," and that line the Spaniard determines as nicely by his long-hand practice as another person would with a pair of scales. You may at any time select peaches or apples from the different baskets, in whose size or weight you can discover no difference; yet if you will test the matter with a pair of scales, you will find there is a difference, small though it be. The Spaniard sees you select three for a dime from one basket, in preference to two for a dime from the other; he knows you get nearly a third more by it; but it never troubles him. He has classified them, and conducts all his business according to strict mathematical rules, from which he never swerves. When the rotten spots begin to appear, then comes another rigid classification, which runs into the little monuments already treated of. The monuments, if not sold, are taken down at night and re-built in the morning—the more rotten fruit, after having finished its monumental career, being required to do pyramid service for several days more, at the end of which time, if nobody buys, it is thrown stolenly into the street by its presiding genius.

Napoleon's last physician, Dr. Archibald Arnott, of the 20th Foot, is dead, in the 84th year of his age. He was on the Nile, in Calabria, Portugal, Spain and Holland, and earning a medal with clasps for Egypt, Madai, Vimiera, Corunna, Vittoria, the Pyrenees, Nivoile, Nivo, Orthes and Toulouse. After the war, Dr. Arnott accompanied his brave companions in arms to St. Helena and India, and at the former station became the medical attendant of Napoleon. Shortly previous to his dissolution, Napoleon gave a very interesting testimony of his respect for Dr. Arnott. To use the words of Napoleon on the island, "The Emperor on his death-bed desired that a valuable gold snuff-box might be brought to him, and having, with his dying hand and last effort of departing strength, engraved upon its lid with a pen-knife the letter N, he presented it to his kind and valued friend, as a parting memorial of his deep esteem and heartfelt gratitude.

General du Murquis de Rochemore has just died at Arbec, at the age of 90, in consequence of injury from being thrown from a carriage. The deceased accompanied Louis XVIII through out his exile, and at the Restoration in 1814, returned with that Monarch to France, and filled several important military commands. He was afterwards Master of the Ceremonies at the Courts of Louis XVIII and Charles X. In 1830 he retired into private life, where he has ever since remained, devoting himself to agricultural pursuits.

Our Spanish accounts do not confirm the departure of the Pope's Nuncio, nor of French negotiations for a Spanish legation for the Crimea. Order has been restored among the workmen, who return at the wages established before the strike, but with an agreement that any future differences which might arise should be submitted to a mixed jury of masters and workmen; and that the men arrested were to be punished. "Already," says the Colonel, in conclusion, "numerous manufactories have recommenced their operations, the assemblages have ceased and order reigns."

On the 15th of July, Calvi, a devoted agent of the propaganda of Young Italy, expiated at Mantua, on the scaffold, his excessive confidence in the plans of the apostle at London. Since then a revolutionary conspiracy has been discovered in the Duchy of Parma, and the conspirators, thirteen in number, have been arrested. Numerous arrests have been made at Carrara and Massa, on the Modenese frontiers.

The Sardinian Government is carrying out the bill relative to religious orders, and its doing so creates no emotion amongst the people. Almost all the religious houses for men have contented themselves with a verbal protest, and a refusal to give any indication calculated to assist the government agents. In some of the convents the nuns refused to open their doors, and force was consequently employed to effect an entrance.

The revolutionary commotion which convulsed Europe in 1848 extended to Norway, and a great number of workmen at Christiania, and of towns of the provinces of Ackershuus and Drontheim, formed themselves into illegal associations and committed various excesses. The government took energetic measures for the re-establishment of order, and 149 of the workmen were arrested.

The Rev. Theobold Mathew has remained in London since his return from Madeira, for the purpose of obtaining medical advice. His friends will be glad to learn his health has improved.

It is reported at Clonmel that Mr. John O'Connell has accepted a government situation in London worth £1200 a year.

Mr. John Adye Curran, a liberal barrister, is a candidate for the office of Lord Mayor of Dublin.

Russia.

A tremendous fire broke out during the great Fair at Novogorod, in Russia, by which merchandise to the amount of three millions of roubles (or 12 millions of francs) was destroyed.

American Ships at Constantinople.

American ships continue to come up to Constantinople from France and England, in large numbers. The Great Republic and Queen of Clippers recently passed on up to Kamiesh. They attracted much attention, and the Turks greatly admired them. Several of the finest American clippers are in the employ of the Allies as transports. Several large ships have been and are still there with cargoes for the use of the Allies.

On the "glorious fourth" a large collection of Italian and Hungarian refugees gave a serenade to the American Minister, who made them a speech on the occasion.

LATER FROM MEXICO.

The U. S. mail steamship Orizaba, Capt. Forbes, arrived Saturday morning from Vera Cruz, whence she sailed on the 8th inst.

There was a rumor afloat when the steamship Orizaba left Vera Cruz on the 8th inst., that the revolutionists were within twelve miles of that place. The stages and all communication between Vera Cruz, and Orizaba, and Jalapa, had been stopped on the 6th inst.

The conducta coming down from the City of Mexico with a convoy of 800 troops had stopped at the Puente Nacional, and fortified themselves there, for the purpose of giving battle to the revolutionists.

We have papers from Vera Cruz to the 8th inst. They contain, however, no notice of anything of the kind. On the contrary, most plausible reason are given, copied from the Diario Oficial, for the departure of the lady of Santa Anna from the country. Accounts are given of the triumphant marches of Blanco in pursuit of the rebels, and his return to the capital. A report is given of the rout of Commodore Gen. Marquez, in Tamazula, and of the desertion of three officers and some soldiers from him to the Government side; troops under General Zires are said to have returned to the capital from Michoacan, because the department was almost universally reduced to quiet; reports are given of great preparations being made in Vera Cruz to celebrate the September fetes; Gen. Galindo is said to have completely destroyed a band of revolutionists near Morelia.

AGRICULTURAL CONVENTION.—Columbia, Aug. 8.—The Convention to form an Agricultural Society in this State met to-day, and 130 delegates were present, representing twenty-one Districts. Dr. James P. Barratt was chosen President, and several Vice Presidents were also elected. A Committee of one from each Agricultural Society, and one from each district not having a society, were appointed to prepare business, and the Convention then adjourned until to-morrow. Details of the Baltic's News.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

The U. S. Mail Steamship Baltic, Capt. Comstock, from Liverpool, July 28th, arrived at the New York Quarantine about 6 o'clock on the morning of the 7th, bringing one week's later news from Europe.

The clipper ship Red Jacket, Capt Millard, arrived at Liverpool on the 25th July, in 81 days from Melbourne, with 138,000 ounces of gold, including two nuggets, weighing respectively 43 and 47 pounds.

The Cunard steamer Arabia, (now "transport No. 95,") embarked dragoons and horses, and sailed from Liverpool, 24th ult., for the Crimea. Several other steamships were embarking reinforcements.

The war news is not important. It was rumored that Gen. Simpson and Omar Pacha have resigned. The French continue to approach the Malakoff, which the Russians continue to fortify without relaxation. There had been neither sorties nor assaults since previous advices.

The position of all parties in the open field remains unchanged.

The British in the Sea of Azoff destroyed the bridge of boats at Genitschi without loss.

Operations in the Baltic were unimportant.

The Russians remain near Kars, but have not infested the city.

Spanish uneasiness seems mostly appeased.

Having made a narrow escape on the Turkish loan bill, the British ministry will be able to keep their places.

Sir William Molesworth is definitely appointed Colonial Secretary.

The War.

The following are the daily dispatches:

July 10.—Gen. Simpson encloses the returns of casualties to the 8th of July; regrets they are so heavy in killed and wounded; states that the general health of the army is good, and announces that at 5 o'clock on the morning of the 10th, a heavy fire was opened on the Redan by the allied batteries.

July 11.—Gortschnikoff telegraphs: The enemy has renewed a vigorous cannonade. Yesterday at 8 P. M., Admiral Nachimoff received a severe wound and has since died. Until further orders, Admiral Pnnloff is appointed to succeed the deceased as Commander of the Naval Garrison and Port, and Military Governor of Sebastopol.

July 13.—The Times' correspondent writes: Last night the Russians kept up a tremendous fire. "I am sorry to say that the battery which the French constructed between the Mamelon and the Malakoff has been knocked to pieces by the powerful fire of the latter fort. A colonel and thirty officers and men were put hors de combat, and the siege works have received a decided check.

July 10th—Prince Gortschakoff announces having made two sorties on the 14th and 15th, before the bastion Kornileff, which were satisfactory. Nothing of importance had occurred in other parts of the Crimea.

July 23d—Gen. Pelissier telegraphs: The enemy appeared to have taken alarm last night, and opened a very brisk fire on the right and left of our lines of attack. Our batteries replied successfully. I have good intelligence from Yenikais. Everything there is going on well under the direction of Col. Osmont, who has taken measures to establish order at Kertch.

July 25th—Gen. Simpson telegraphs: Cholera has not increased since my last report, and the general health of the army continues satisfactory.

Sea of Azoff.

A dispatch from Capt. Hewett, of the British ship Bonglo, announces that he had sent his boats to examine the communication between the town of Gonitchisk and Arahat Spit, and found it to be by means of a ferry of two large flats and hawsers. Both the hawsers were cut and the flats turned adrift by the ship's boats, July 3d. A body of Russian troops came to the beach and opened a fire of musketry, at about 80 yards, but without effect; while the ships and boats fired grape on the exposed troops and inflicted much loss.

The Russians are fortifying the Spit of Arahat.

Since the bombardment of Taganrog measures of defence have been adopted. The arms of the Don have been closed, and rendered inaccessible. Batteries have been erected on the coast and a flotilla of gun-boats established on the river. There is also a strong body of Cossacks and other troops, under the orders of Gen. Bagovort, collected near Nicolaieff. Strong fortifications are being erected at Rostoff, and the channel of the Don is obstructed.

Asia.

In the British House of Lords the Earl of Clurendon, on the 23d ult., gave some information as to the position of affairs in Asia Minor. On the 23d of June, the Russians made advances on the Kars; got within firs of the batteries, and were repelled. Notwithstanding the sufferings of the Turkish army last winter, the garrison now shewed no symptoms of demoralization. On the contrary, the citizens had requested to be supplied with arms to aid in the defence, and Col. Williams had assured the British Government that there was no apprehension of Kars being taken by a coup de main.

A private dispatch at Marseilles announced that the Russians had suddenly abandoned the siege of Kars, but a letter from Trebizonde, of July the 9th, states as follows: "The Russians are still encamped at about an hour's distance from Kars. They have only detached a few squadrons of Cossacks to the neighbouring villages to collect corn. We are still in ignorance of their motive in disarming the attack on Kars, whether to await reinforcements, or heavier artillery, or to march towards Erzeroum. We shall soon learn. A Russian corps of 9000 men is at Keni-keni, which intercepts communication between Kars and Trebizonde.

The Principalities.

A letter from Silistria, of the 11th, states that Ishmael Pacha has announced to his troops the approaching opening of a campaign in Bessarabia. Turkish reinforcements continue to be sent to the fortified places on the lower Danube, and the force now quartered from Shumla to Bahadagh is called 40,000 men. The Russians do not appear to fear any attack in the Dobrudscha. Preparations were making at Varna for the expected arrival of a French and English force early in August. The English are collecting large supplies at Sinope.

The Baltic.

Dispatches from Admiral Deans Dundas, of July 17th, enclose reports from Captain Yniverson, of his cruise with the Magicienne and Ruby. On July 14th, he (Capt. Y.) proceeded to Kounda Bay, on the south coast, where he dislodged an encampment of Cossacks, by throwing shell and rockets; and afterwards landed to inspect the place, but found nothing to destroy. Next morning he anchored at the mouth of the river Portsolki, and landing on its right bank, destroyed a Cossack barrack and stables, and drove the soldiers into the country. He next proceeded in the direction of Wyborg and anchored the ships as close as possible to the Island of Stralsund.

Having opened the bay called Trangsund, a Russian war steamer towing two gun-boats was discovered not far off. The Ruby immediately opened fire, and she retired out of range. Proceeding to the entrance of the Sound, Wyborg came in sight, also another Russian steamer and three gun-boats at anchor under an island about a mile off. The English ships proceeded towards them, but were brought up by a sunken barrier across the channel, and at the same moment, a masked battery on the left bank, not more than 350 yards off, opened a fire of round shot, grape and musketry, and the Russian ships advancing to the barrier also commenced a smart fire, whereupon the British retired towards Stralsund, the enemy's riflemen following them along the banks, but being driven from their position as fast as they took them, by the ship's fire.

Admiral Baynes remains with the bulk of the fleet off Croastadt, while all the gun-boats and mortar vessels, forming a squadron of fifty sail, are at Nargen. Admirals Dundas, Seymour and the French Admiral had been in consultation at Nargen, and the belief in the fleet was that "something" would soon be attempted "somewhere."

White Sea.

Commercial letters from Archangel, of July 8, mention that the Allied squadron in the White Sea consisted of six ships, and they had captured two or three vessels laden with grain. There remained at Archangel and other ports, only enough grain for current supply, the main stock of breadstuffs having been removed into the interior previous to the opening of navigation.

The Attitude of Austria.

There is reason to believe that at the present moment the attitude of Austria occasions some anxiety, if not positive disquietude, to the Western Cabinets. Ever since the rupture of the Vienna Conference, the numerous Russian agents at Vienna have labored with redoubled energy to detach Austria completely from England and France. During the past fortnight much progress has been made, but particularly during the last six or eight days the results are more and more observable. At St. Petersburg the most friendly social relations are again extended to the Russian Ambassador and his countrymen, who were previously treated with more than hauteur.

There is no truth in the statement recently put forth that France and England has sent a circular to the German Courts, announcing that the Western Powers no longer consider themselves bound by the treaty of December, or the four points of guarantee, in consequence of the rupture of the Conferences of Vienna.

Britain.

Our Liverpool correspondent was enabled to transmit by the Asia, which left Liverpool on Saturday, the 21st ult., copies of the London Times of that day, containing the totally unlooked-for attempt of the opposition in Parliament to unseat Government on the motion to guarantee the Turkish loan of £5,000,000 sterling—an attempt in which the Ministry saved themselves by a majority of only three.

An extract from the instructions given to Lord John Russell for his guidance at the Vienna Conference has been laid before Parliament, but no discussion had ensued thereon.

The obsequies of the late Lord Raglan were performed with every mark of respect by the citizens of Bristol and the crowd of strangers who were attracted to that city to witness the ceremonial.

No report has yet been received from the commanders of the British naval squadron in the Pacific, with reference to the search after deposits of guano within the bounds of that station.

Ireland.

The weather is once more gloriously fine, and it does not appear that any of the crops were injuriously affected by the recent rains. The appearance of the potatoes is most luxuriant, and no well authenticated report of potato disease has yet been received. An appalling thunderstorm visited the central counties on the 19th.

France.

Letters from Paris anticipate that the applications for the new French loan of 750,000,000 francs will reach 2,500,000,000 francs.

M. Vattemere has written to the Moniteur in laudation of the American Department of the Exhibition.

The Emperor has gone to the Pyrenees to escort the Empress to Paris.

Queen Victoria is expected in Paris on the 17th of August.

Spain

The hand of Carlists, commanded by the brothers Hiocos, still wander in Old Castile, evading pursuit by the celerity of their movements, and the assistance given them by the peasantry. The Captain General of the province has therefore issued an edict, enacting fine, imprisonment, court martial, and compulsory service in the army to all who afford Carlists concealment or aid.

It appears from correspondence found on the person of a Carlist chief belonging to Marsal's band, and who was killed in the recent conflict with the government troops, that the Carlist movement was intended to be on a large scale, and take place simultaneously in various parts of Catalonia and the Northern provinces; that the Count of Montemolin himself was to be at the head of it, and his brother Don Juan to have the chief command in Catalonia; and that Cabrera, Marsal, Tristanis, Estarcus, and Borges were all to take leading parts in the undertaking.

The difficulty with Rome continues unabated.

Italy.

The condition of Italy is very unsatisfactory. Rumors of plots and conspiracies pervade the whole Peninsula. Cholera is virulent in Lombardy. In Naples, numerous arrests of officers of the army have been made, and Government is at present suspiciously kind to the luzzaroni—an evil omen.

Switzerland.

The village town of Chamouni has been almost destroyed by fire. Half the village is in ruins. Subscriptions are solicited in England to aid the sufferers.

Russia.

An Imperial ukase forbids Jews to purchase lands or to cattle as agriculturists in the Governments of Tchernigeff and Poltawa. It is reported that the local boards of administration in Poland are to be dissolved, and will be henceforth directed from St. Petersburg. Polish political offenders are to be tried by martial law.

Letters from Russia speak of the Czar's ceaseless energy in the management of the war, but make no allusion to his rumored ill health.

Marshal Paskiewitch is said to have asked leave to resign.

Latest.

July 25, Pelissier telegraphs: "After a brisk cannonade the Russians made a sortie, about midnight, on the left of the little Redan. As we are now close to them, it did not take the enemy one minute to reach our gabionades. The Russians were promptly received, and were repulsed, leaving some wounded and eight dead; the darkness enabled them to carry off the others. Gen. Bisson was on duty in the trenches.

It is rumored in Paris that the preparations of the Black Sea fleet are not for an attack on Odessa, but to make a bold dash at the harbor of Sebastopol with 100 ships and 40,000 men, while simultaneous attack is made from the land.

The Very Latest from Europe.

LONDON, Saturday, July 28, (Frankfort, Thursday.)—To-day, the Federal Diet accepted the Austrian proposition as submitted on the 19th inst., with the additional three points proposed by Prussia.

HELIGOLAND, Friday.—The immediate construction of a citadel has been resolved upon, and the plans and estimates have been sent to London.

The Baltic.

DANTZIC, Friday.—The "Lightning" has arrived from the fleet, and reports that reinforcements had reached the fleet. The order to attack Revel was still looked for.

The Moniteur contains the following:

ERZEROUM, July 3.—Yenikani, a village distant about 18 league from Erzeroum, containing large stores of provisions for the army at Kars, has been occupied by a Russian division, composed of four battalions of infantry and 3,600 Cossacks, 6 regiments of cavalry, and 18 pieces of artillery. The whole force is about 12,000 men. The Turkish army is, in a manner, blockaded at Kars. The Cossacks occupy the entire plain of Kare, but no new attack has been made since the affair of the 16th. It is feared that the Russian division at Bayazid may effect a junction with the forces encamped at Yeniksni to march on Erzeroum.

An Italian Legion.

The London United Service Gazette announces the intention of the Government to form an Italian Legion. It is to be raised at Navaro, where the head quarters will be stationed, under the superintendence of the British Minister at the Court of Sardinia. The command is to be held by Col. H. Mauners Peroy, and the officers are to be Italian and British gentlemen who speak the Italian language.

Lieut. the Hon. E. Fitzclarence died on the 25th of wounds received in the attack on the 18th June. He was the youngest son of the Earl of Munster.

The Russian Frontier.

VIENNA, July 26.—Simultaneous accounts from Brode and Warsaw state that the prohibition to export corn has been taken off by the Russian Government.

The Russo-Austrian frontier is again free.

HIGH FREIGHTS.—The Mansfield (DeSoto) Times, of the 24, says:

The Augusta landed at Grand Bayou on yesterday from Alexandria. She has on board a large cargo, consisting principally of family groceries. A considerable portion of her freight was discharged at Grand Bayou; but the main bulk is destined for Shreveport. Freight from Alexandria rates at $7 50 per barrel, wet; and $5 per barrel, dry.

The people in that section should go in strongly for railroads.

NICARAGUA MOVEMENTS.—The New York Evening Post of the 8th has a blast against the Nicaragua Transit Company—who, the editor is quite certain, are trying to build up a sort of an East India Company in Central America. We quote:

They mean to begin by being hired by one or the other of the rival factions of that distracted country to defend it; if successful, they will continue to defend it until they have engrossed all the political and military power of the country, and this trading association, like its great prototype in the East, becomes an independent nationality.

To bring about this result, troops are enlisted and cannon are shipped in the company's steamers every voyage; but the strange thing about it is, that Mr McKeon, whose concern for our neutrality laws deprives him of a great deal of his natural rest every night, it is said, should never have heard anything of these proceedings; that troops should have been enlisted, landed at Nicaragua, and their arrival reported at Washington before the Attorney of our district hears a word about it.

These allegations appear to be supported in a degree by the following facts:

We understand (says the Post) that the Acting Consul of the United States at Greytown, Mr. Mason, has reported to the State Department that the Nicaragua Transit Company of this city are shipping troops by their steamers in large numbers, from the United States to Nicaragua.

He says that on the evening of the 15th July last, the steamer Star of the West arrived at Point Arenas with a body of forty-four privates and six officers, engaged in New York by M. Marcoleon for the military service of his government, upon conditions that they should have a free passage in the Transit Company's steamer, and if accepted by the government, should be enlisted as soldiers of Nicaragua, and receive for their services at the rate of ten dollars monthly for each man, and between fifty and one hundred dollars for each officer.

This station where the men were to be enlisted was Costillo, and their wages for four months, the terms of the enlistment, are stipulated, says the Consul, to be paid by the Accessory Transit Company from money owed by them to the Nicaragua Government. He says the soldiers have been enlisted, and are now stationed at the fort of Costillo. They are mostly French and German residents of New York, (none of them Americans by birth,) and are under the command of Col. Gasyynski. He also reports, upon the authority of one of the officers, that an additional company of recruits was expected to come at an early day.

Since the Consul's communication was written, we have advices of the arrival of another lot of soldiers, forty-six men and four women, by the Northern Light, and bound also for Costillo.

Capt. Lahuran, the gentlemanly and attentive Secretary of the Board of Health, kept his office open till one o'clock on Sunday afternoon, in the hope of being able to furnish the mortuary returns for publication in Monday's papers. His labors were lost, however, several of the sexton's not seeming to care much whether they furnished a report or not. It seems rather curious that a return of burials up to Saturday night cannot be furnished before Monday forenoon. These easy-going sexton's need a stirring up, and we hope they will get it.

REDUCTION OF SCHOOL TEACHERS' PAY.—In consequence of the reduction of the annual school appropriation by the City Council, the Fourth District School Board have reduced the salaries of the teachers in that district in a corresponding ratio. From the 1st of September the salaries will be as follows:

		Per annum.	Per month.
Superintendent		$2400	$200
Principal High School, Boys		1680	140
1 do. do.	Girls	1200	100
2 do. Intermed.	Boys	1320 each	110
2 do. do.	Girls	960 each	80
1 Assistant High School, Boys		1380	115
1 do. do.	Girls	840	70

4 Female do. do.		720 each	60
2 do. do. do.		600 each	50
19 do. Primary Schools		540 each	45

By the above schedule the reduction in the monthly pay roll is $188 80, equal to 6¾ per cent.

ARTESIAN WELL.—The tubing is down nearly 470 feet, and the sand has been pretty well washed out by the Young America, which squirted away during the last part of Saturday, to the great edification of the crowd who assembled to see. The sand is so soft and juicy at the bottom, that no labor will be requisite, so long as it lasts, other than to screw on sections of tubing, as it sinks by its own weight, and to wash the sand out by means of the Young America. Mr. Reed, we regret to say, is down with the yellow fever.

DISGUSTING EXHIBITION.—The Street Commissioner's animal hunters, it seems, are authorized to spear vagrant hogs. One of these hunters on Saturday got after a large hog in Elysian Fields street, and speared him, as he ran, in such a manner that his entrails fell out and dragged the ground after him. The hog of course soon fell, and was carried to the pound, where he died. The witnesses of the spectacle universally denounced it.

COMMERCIAL MATTERS.

New Orleans Money Market.

CRESCENT OFFICE, No. 70 Camp street,
Thursday Evening, Aug. 16, 1855.

The general feature of the Money market this week is of ease and confidence. There is a decrease from the limited amount of paper offered last week, both in Bank and outside, and with the liberal receipts of Produce arriving, there is sufficient basis to sustain an increased demand for immediate want, though one of the Banks

HINTS OF A GOOD HORSE.—Zadock Pratt, in a late lecture on the horse, gives his opinion on what constitutes good points in the animal:

He should be about fifteen and a half hands high, the head light and clean made; wide between the nostrils, and the nostrils themselves large, transparent and open; broad in the forehead, eyes prominent, clear and sparkling; ears small, neatly set on; neck rather short and well set up; large arm or shoulder well thrown back and high; withers arched and high; legs fine, neat, thin and small boned; body round and rather light, though sufficiently large to afford substance when it is needed; full chest, affording play for the lungs; back short, with the hind quarters set on rather obliquely.

Any one possessing a horse of this make and appearance, and weighing eleven or twelve hundred pounds, may rest assured he has a horse all work, and a bargain well worth getting hold of.

Mr. Pratt is now seventy years of age, and has always been an admirer of fine horses, and is a competent judge. There are in Mr. P.'s lecture many valuable hints. We give two or three:

Care of Horses.—No horse can endure labor all the time. A few months in pasture, after being high fed and worked for several years, will renew his energies, as stated periods of rest and recreation will preserve the vital energies of man unimpaired through a long life; and by a wise law of Providence, which is as beneficial to the beast as to the man, a horse will do more labor in the six days than if he were worked the whole seven.

In reference to the peculiar excellence of the horses in New York, I might say that I have driven a pair 240 miles in three days, or eighty miles per day, without injury. Amongst the many hundreds and perhaps thousands of drivers and teamsters in my employ, I had a slow moulded man by the name of Dana Brown, who drove for me some ten years, and always drew the largest loads in the same time and with less fatigue to his horses than any other driver I ever knew. His horses would look better on the same feed than those of any other, and they always appeared in good condition, while those in charge of others gave unmistakable evidence of improper usage. Forty, fifty and even sixty hundred weight has he drawn over the Catskill mountains with one pair of horses; and I am only doing him justice to say that he never wore out a lash, and hardly a snapper, in the whole time. Whilst the other teamsters had sick horses, his were always in good condition. The whole number of teams I had in one year averaged in every three working days two thousand six hundred pounds to Prattsville, and three thousand pounds to Catskill, a distance of thirty-six miles, making about two and a half millions of pounds in all. I mention these facts as illustrating the great benefit of a good management of horses and roads.

In feeding a horse, it should be remembered that corn has a tendency to make him slow, as may be witnessed in the slow moving corn-fed horse of Ohio. Oats are more suitable to develop all his qualities, and from ten to sixteen quarts per day should be given.

Miscellaneous Foreign Items.

The widow of Count Batthyani, after assigning all her fortune to her heirs, and distributing 20,000 florins to her domestics, has entered the Convent of Sisters of Mercy, founded by her at Pinkafield, upon the frontiers of Hungary, and has assumed the name of "Sister Fanny."

The Grand Duke of Tuscany has released the unfortunate cigar maker, Cecchetti, who was sentenced to a year's imprisonment for reading the Bible in company with the members of his own family. The Marquis of Normandy had interested himself on behalf of Cecchetti, and the Grand Duke has now remitted the remainder of the sentence, on condition of Cecchetti absenting himself from Tuscany.

A correspondent of the London Times bears testimony to the liberty enjoyed by the British and Americans in the Kingdom of Naples, and cites many instances where the activity of the representatives of those nations obtained ample redress lately in cases where their countrymen had been wronged by subaltern officials.

The reception of the King of Portugal at Naples had been on a scale of unusual magnificence; and, it was said, he had arrived to seek a matrimonial alliance with the house of Bourbon. The eldest daughter of the King of Naples is 14 years and some months old, and according to the law of that country, has been marriageable these two years.

TELEGRAPHIC EXCURSION TO NEWFOUNDLAND. The steamship James Adger, punctual to her appointed hour of departure, left pier No. 4, North river, yesterday, says the N. Y. Herald of the 4th, with the principal members of the New York, Newfoundland and London Telegraph Company, and a large number of their friends, 51 in all, for Newfoundland.

The first point at which they will touch is Halifax where they will be received by the authorities of that city. From thence they will proceed direct to Port au Basque, on the southern coast of Newfoundland, where the Sarah Bryant is at present lying with a submarine cable of eighty miles in length coiled up in her hold. This cable will be laid across the Gulf of St. Lawrence, from Port au Basque to Cape Breton, a distance of seventy-four miles. The James Adger will be employed in towing the ship, from which the cable will be laid. This process will take, it is estimated, from two to three days, at the expiration of which the steamer will go to St. Johns, stopping at the various points along the southern coast. The company will thus have an excellent opportunity of seeing some of the principal places on the south of the island. On their arrival at St. Johns they will be received by the municipal and other authorities; and as their visit is an event of no small importance to the interests of Newfoundland, the occasion will, we have no doubt, be signalized in an especial manner by the New Foundlanders.

The excursion will take about three weeks altogether. The day of their departure is certainly most auspicious, so far as a bright sunny sky can make it so; and everything seems to conspire in their favor. We trust they may return with all their most pleasant anticipations realized, and the great object of their mission fulfilled to the complete satisfaction of the company.

SIGNIFICANT.—The Westminster Review for years past has let slip no opportunity of disparaging, to use a mild term, everything American, until within the last twelve months, when its sentiments appear to have undergone a change. In the last number there is an article on America, in which the following passage occurs:

"No one knows not what is to be most admired in the Mexican war; the facility with which an army of volunteers submitted to discipline, the perfection of their weapons, new inventions of America, handled with a skill previously unknown to the commissariat in a wild and vast country, or the flexibility of their mechanical adaptations as to reporting, printing and commanding henceward. For fifty years past, the merchant ships of the United States have been better built than those of Great Britain, and as in 1812 our guesses were inferior to theirs, so at the close of the Mexican war, into which they imported but of a long peace, their practice in naval matters was immeasurably superior to anything the trained British regulars had at any time attained.

FLORENCE EMERSON,

OR, THE YOUNG WIDOW.

BY VIRGINIA DE FORREST.

"Florence!" cried Jessie Lawson, bursting into her cousin's boudoir, one morning, "Florence Emerson, Harry says you are engaged to George Langford!"

"Well, cousin, if I were, have you any objections?"

"Objections! Why, Floy, he is old enough—"

"Just thirty-nine, cousin Jessie."

"Thirty-nine! and a widower with two children. But it is a mistake of Harry's; you are not really going to marry him, are you?"

"I expect so," said Florence, quietly.

"Well, I give you up. You, Florence Emerson, the belle of the season, with a large fortune; you, the beauty and heiress, with lovers, beaux, offers without end or number, to throw yourself away upon a poor widower with two children and no fortune except his profession. Oh, Floy, I thought you had more sense! What are you thinking of?"

"Why, Jessie, you are wasting your eloquence. George Langford is handsome."

"Granted."

"Talented."

"Granted again."

"He loves me."

"So do fifty others."

"And, last of all, my strongest argument, I love him!"

"Well, I suppose you will marry him in spite of my disapproval, so I wish you joy, and hope he'll never hold up Mrs Langford first as a pattern to Mrs. Langford second."

"If Mrs. Langford first was a model for me, I will follow in her footsteps."

"Well, well, there's one comfort. Willie and Edith are very pretty children, and too young to rebel at a new momma, I believe. How old are they exactly, Floy?"

"Willie is four, Edith three."

"Keep you busy, the care of two such babies."

Florence Emerson and Jessie Lawson were cousins, and had, until Jessie's marriage, been almost like sisters. Jessie, who was two years the elder, was a gay, lively blonde, vain and pretty. Florence was a tall, stately beauty, with large dark eyes, black hair, and features like a Greek statue. She was an orphan, and, as Jessie said, an heiress.

George Langford was a lawyer of some standing. Handsome, talented, but grave and quiet in his manners; devotedly attached to Florence, but he was thirty-nine, and a widower! Jessie's sentiments were echoed by all Florence's circle of friends when her engagement was known. She, so beautiful, young, talented, and wealthy! She always was different from other girls, they said. So, after a few days, the matter ceased to be discussed, and some new wonder of the fashionable world took its place.

Florence had been married just two years, when it became necessary for Mr. Langford to go to Paris; his stay was to be very short, so he concluded not to take Florence. She was fond of home, had won the love of both children, and in return loved them fondly, and with their society, her home duties, and a promised visit to Jessie, thought the time of her husband's absence might be made to pass pleasantly. But when the hour of departure came, when his trunk stood waiting in the hall, and he came to say farewell, the whole aspect of things seemed changed. Florence felt that her dearest treasure was leaving her; all looked dark, and a vague presentiment of evil filled her soul.

"Why, Florence, you are white as a corpse," cried George, in a frightened tone. "I thought you had arranged galeties without number to occupy you while your grave old husband was away. Cheer up, Floy; I shall be gone only a short time."

"Oh, George, I did not realize it till now. What can I do without you?"

"You will visit Jessie, take Willie and Edith into the country, ant—aud—oh, you had a whole list of pleasures arranged. The carriage is here. Good-bye, Florence."

Florence tried to speak, but the words died on her lips. She grasped his hand, while her eyes filled with tears, and then let him go.

All her pleasures were forgotten as she watched the carriage rolling from the door, and she only remembered how lonely she would be without him; she looked back upon two years of such perfect happiness that it seemed less like reality then a pleasant dream. Long she stood at the window watching, as if she expected him to return, but the voices of the children roused her, and she stifled her own grief, and went to amuse and comfort them. Willie thought papa was "real unkind" not to take them; while Edith clung close to Florence, and hoped papa would be safe on the "deep water."

Jessie Lawson and Florence Langford were seated in the piazza of the pleasant country house they had hired for the season conversing. Edith and Willie were romping with Rover on the grass, while ever and anon their clear, joyous laughter would make the ladies turn and smile.

"I forgive you now, Floy, for marrying George," said Jessie, fondly. "I think that, if he had asked me, and I could have looked into the future, I should have done just as you did."

At that instant, Jessie felt a hand laid on her shoulder, and, looking up, saw her husband; his face was very grave, and his whole manner betokened that something serious had troubled him.

"Jessie," he said, in a low tone, "come into the parlor. I want to spark with you."

"He is jealous," whispered Jessie to Florence as she rose to obey. "Now for a matrimonial lecture."

"Close the door, Jessie," said Henry, when they entered the parlor. "I do not wish Florence to hear what I have to say now. Poor Floy! we must break it gently to her!"

"Why, Harry, what is the matter? George—"

"Yes. The Eagle, the vessel he sailed in, was wrecked, and but few escaped; a vessel going to Calcutta took a few of the passengers, but the rest were lost. George Langford's name is among the missing."

Harry had forgotten the open window, and was startled to see Florence standing in front of it. She was cold and pale as marble, her hands were tightly clenched, her teeth set, and her whole frame rigid and motionless. Harry sprang to her side and took her hand to lead her in. The touch broke her stupor, and, with a slight shudder, she fell fainting to the ground.

For weeks Florence Langford lay between life and death; fever and delirium succeeded her death-like trance and her life was despaired of. A strong constitution, however, triumphed, and she recovered; but oh, how altered! The pale, thin face, seen now under a close widow's cap, was so wan and sad that few would have recognised the once blooming Florence.

Her sole comfort, now, seemed to lie in the children, his children. She would hardly allow them out of her sight, and her whole time was spent in instructing and amusing them.

Florence Langford had been a widow just one year. It was a bright summer's day, and she sat in the same little parlor where she had first heard of her husband's loss. Willie and Edith were seated on the floor beside her, blowing soap-bubbles. Florence sat watching their innocent delight as the sun shone on the pretty globes, and reflected prismatin colors in them, and then her thoughts flew back over the last three years, sadder and sadder grew the pale face, until Willie noticed it, and leaving his play went softly to her side; Edith knelt beside him, with her face laid caressingly against Florence's hand.

"Tell us about papa," whispered Willie.

"When is papa coming back," asked Edith. "He stays so long."

"Hush, Edith," said Willie. "Papa can never come back; he is dead."

But Edith shook her head. She had always maintained that, as papa went away in a carriage, and said he would come back, and bring them pretty toys from Paris, he could not be dead.

Florence drew Edith upon her lap, and throwing her arm round Willie, the three talked about papa for an hour; how much longer they would have remained in that position I cannot tell. Jessie interrupted them; her whole face was beaming with joy.

"Floy!" she whispered, kneeling on the stool at her cousin's feet, and untying her cap, "take this off for a minute."

"Why, Jessie?" asked Florence, suffering her to remove it.

"Because it is stiff and unbecoming," said Jessie, who was loosening Floy's hair, and twining it over her fingers into old curls. "You must never wear it again."

"Dear Jessie, give it back to me. I shall always wear it."

"But I say you shall never put it on again, dear Florence, a widow's cap is needless now!"

"Jessie," cried Florence, starting up, and looking eagerly into her cousin's face, while she trembled violently, "what do you mean?"

"Can you bear the best of news, Floy?" said Jessie, softly. "George"—

Jessie in answer threw open the door, and said, gayly: "Come in!" and in another moment, Florence was in her husband's arms, and the two children were looking in a kind of joyful astonishment at their father.

All was soon explained. George Langford had been among the passengers taken to Calcutta, and had, from some mistake of the reporters, been put in the list of missing. Cold and exposure had brought on an attack of brain fever, and he had been very ill. As soon as he was able, he had started for home, but the voyage had taken several months; and, after reaching England, he was detained some days before starting for America. He was there at last, and a happier party never met than the one that evening at Oak Lodge, Mr. Lawson's country seat.

SPLENDID PROJECT.—We find the following in an exchange, credited to a "Northern paper:"

Send me three million dollars. (As to what I want with it, a word in your ears privately.) I intend to lay down in every street, court, lane, place and alley of Boston, 10,000 miles of iron main, four feet diameter, with 12-inch service pipes entering each house. So far so good. Then I shall commence at the top of the White Mountains to lay a pipe ten feet in diameter into the ground six yards deep, from the said White Mountains to the main in Boston, which will have been constructed as before remarked; this done, I shall build a steam engine, seven hundred and eighteen thousand horse power, and (loan over this way if you please, I'm afraid somebody might hear) force the freezing atmosphere from the mountains into every house in B! There's no mistake about this—it's bound to go; and when it's finished, I mean to buy me a pair of boots, and go in flatfooted for a line of pipes to the tropics, to pump hot air into the houses in winter. These little jobs completed, and we will have our cool weather in July, and in January it shall be warm and comfortable, as it ought always to have been. I guess Nature's jig is about up, ain't it?

When the enterprising patentee of the above invention gets through his job, he will please turn his steps in this direction. An importation from the North Pole would be exceedingly acceptable about now.

A singular trial has just terminated in the Oneida Circuit Court of New York. It is that of Emily C. Day vs. Volkert W. Roth and Nelson Roth. By the testimony adduced, it appears that Volkert Roth wooed and won the heart of Miss Day in England, and formed an engagement of marriage with her. She had about £2500 in money, which Volkert persuaded her to entrust to his keeping, in order that he might come to America and establish himself sufficiently to enable him to return and marry her. he engaging to pay interest on the sum regularly. For a time he fulfilled this latter stipulation, but finally endeavored to get rid of the marriage, and the obligation to pay the money, by representing to Miss Day that he had failed in business. He had also managed to mix up his brother with the affairs so much that it was a question which had the property. Miss Day, getting alarmed for her little fortune, came to the United States to hunt her faithless swain. She found him at Utica, N. Y., where he had bought, with his brother, the Museum, and was carrying it on as a place of entertainment. She soon took both, and claimed the Museum in part payment of the money due her. After a tedius and protracted trial, the jury has rendered a verdict for the plaintiff of $8,435 25, being the full value of the Museum, we presume. The money taken from Miss Day constituted all the money she had in the world. Much interest has been manifested in the case throughout, and the verdict of the press is emphatically in her favor.

NEW YORK AND BOSTON COMPARED.—The Boston Traveler has an article upon the population of Boston and New York, giving some interesting statistics. In 1730 the population of Boston was 11,000, and of New York 8,000. Now the population of Boston is 150,000, of New York 750,000. Brooklyn, adjoining New York, that was a village a little while ago, has 200,000 people, or 50,000 more than Boston; and there are other towns about New York that will soon be as large as Boston. The increase of people in New York was 285,000 in the last five years, which was 85,000 more than Boston now contains. Relatively Boston has a much greater tunnage, commerce and wealth. The average valuation to person in New York is $700; in Boston it is $2,000. Boston, with but one-fifth the population, spends more money for schools than New York. It is impossible for anybody to conceive how great a city New York may become. Its estimate for 1860 is about one million souls, and with the trade of the whole continent, it may be the whole world, centering there, it may go up to five millions in one century. London and Paris are the only two places of the civilized globe that exceed it to-day. Paris will soon be in the shade, and London cannot keep pace with the mistress of the New World. It only needs the Pacific Railroad, and in fifty years the largest city that exists would be its inferior, and very shortly it would be able to purchase the wealth of the richest of ancient or modern times, and have a surplus left.

IN A BAD WAY.—New Orleans is not the only city in the Union whose financial condition is in a bad way. The Philadelphia City Treasury appears to be in quite as collapsed a condition as ours. Both debts and taxes increase, with no immediate prospects of relief. The Philadelphia Pennsylvanian says:

We see by the recent report of the Board of Supervisers and Commissioners, that the property owners of New York city pay taxes at the rate of $1 21 on every $100, while we in Philadelphia are assessed at $1 80 in the $100, with a deficit in the receipts obtained by this assessment of more than a million dollars in one year. Half this sum has been admitted to be necessary to pay current expenses. We frequently hear of capital being driven away from our city for one cause or another; but what can more forcibly aid in prodneing such a result than having our taxes SIXTY per cent higher than those of New York, with the certainty of an additional increase.

YELLOW FEVER.—We are sorry to learn that this disease has made its appearance in our parish. Miss Vinson, aged about sixteen years, daughter of Mr. Stokley Vinson, of Bayon Sale, returned home from school, on the last trip of the Swiney, and was shortly afterwards taken sick. The disease proved to be yellow fever, attended with black vomit, and she died on Monday last. How she contracted the disease is not satisfactorily known. She had been at school in Clinton, and it is said that either while stopping at the hotel at Bayon Sara, or immediately before her arrival there, a case of yellow fever had terminated fatally. Another account says that there were two cases occurred on the boat, and that the sick remained on board until they reached St. Martinsville. These are the current reports, and as such we give them.

We have also heard that the father of the young lady is dangerously ill, but whether the disease is the same or not appears to be a matter of doubt. A stranger who came to buy property took sick at Pattersonville and died. Other cases throughout the parish are reported.

We understand that a petition is in circulation requesting our Town Council to establish a quarantine, the Police Jury having refused to make it a parochial affair. Our town is now perfectly healthy, we believe, and we hope that such precautionary measures may be adopted as shall be deemed necessary for its preservation. [Franklin (St. Mary) Planters' Banner 9th inst.

HEALTH OF NATCHEZ.—The Natchez Courier of the 9th says that, "After several days of North wind and an occasional shower, we have now a beautiful South breeze, and yesterday about 1 o'clock, a driving wind and heavy storm. The health of the city was never better at this season of the year."

THE OTHER HOME.

Life is full of doubt and sorrow;
All that's beautiful must die;
Joyous smiles to-day—to-morrow
Bitter tears—a heartfelt sigh.
All we ever love and cherish,
But reminds it cannot stay,
And our brightest hopes will perish
In the morning of their day.

Never more! it wakes an echo,
Half of joy and half of pain;
Visions rise in quick succession;
Never will be mine again!
There was one best loved and truest,
Ever near in days of yore;
Went to rest down in the church-yard,
I shall meet her never more!

In the land beyond the river,
Farewell echoes never come;
Life is but a journey thither,
To that other, brighter home!
Though our feet too often falter,
Treading in the weary way,
Let a pure faith guide us ever,
Till we reach the realms of day.

The cochineal insect, from which a beautiful scarlet dye is derived, is imported into Great Britain to the extent of 1,000 tons annually, the estimated value is £149,000. From the silk-worm we obtain no less than 2,716 tons of silk, 2,206 tons of which are in the raw state, and are manufactured in that country; the remaining 510 tons are already fabricated. One thousand tons of pearl shell are imported, the whole of which is manufactured into buttons and studs. "For better or for worse," they import no less than 8,000,000 leeches.

The wrecks on the coast and in the seas of the Kingdom of Great Britain, in the year 1854, may be thus classed: totally wrecked, 451; totally lost in collision, 53; damaged seriously, and had to discharge, 462; damaged seriously in collision, 41—total, 987. Of those, 350 occurred on the east coast of Great Britain; 33 on the south coast, and 104 on the west coast; 66 wrecks took place on the coast of Ireland; 5 were ossat on shore at Scilly; 9 at the Channel Islands; 19 at Orkney and Shetland, and 5 at the Isle of Man; the remaining 341 wrecks occurred in the surrounding seas. Thus the register for the year 1854 shows an increase of 155 wrecks above those recorded in 1853, but, as compared with the year 1852, it shows a less number by 128.

☞ The relaxing heats of summer leave behind them a long train of evils. The most universal of these are general debility, and its sure attendant, torpidness of spirits. For these we can recommend a speedy and unfailing cure, in the shape of HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS, prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson, Philadelphia. It is, in our opinion, a medicine sui generis—alone—unapproachable. It seems to reach the fountain head of the difficulty in the digestive organs alone, and thus to relieve the secretions and the blood of the excessive morbid, or the cause of disease. Its tonic properties gives vigor to the membranes of the stomach, and promote the secretion of the gastric juice, which dissolves the food, while its genial, soothing, and alterative influence imparts general regularity and strength to the action of the secretive organs, and seems to fortify the constitution. Such is our own experience of its effects, and we believe it is confirmed by the evidence of all who have tried it, or had an opportunity of witnessing its operation. For sale by Dr. Jackson, 126 Arch street. See advertisement.

We invite the special attention of parents and guardians to the advantages here offered to young men desirous of a finished collegiate or business education. The location of the college, in a quiet valley, ten miles from a town—the freedom, consequently, from temptation to vice—the full and thorough course of study—the experience and ability of the Faculty—the wholesome discipline—the facilities for lectures afforded by ample apparatus, libraries and cabinets, and withal, the cheapness of terms and healthfulness of position, cannot fail to secure to this college, as heretofore, a liberal patronage.

For further information, address

THE NASHVILLE FEMALE ACADEMY.

The next academic year will commence September 3d. This institution has enjoyed thirty-nine years of uninterrupted prosperity.

In regard to health, it is believed to have no equal in the United States. Cholera, chill and fever, typhoid and scarlet fever and similar fatal diseases have never occurred here. But three deaths of boarders in thirty-nine years.

In regard to maternal influence, claims equality with the best regulated private families, in all that relates to personal habits, moral and mental culture.

Employs, almost exclusively, Southern teachers. No Southern parent, who gives this institution a personal examination, will, we think, find a reason for going further North. [Jy21—4t] O. D. ELLIOTT.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE
FACULTY.

Rev. H. C. TOWNLEY, D. D., President and Professor of Mental and Moral Science, Ancient and Modern languages, Belles-Lettres, &c.

Water, or chromotic painting	10 00
Oil painting	20 00
Ornamental needlework	5 00
Incidental expenses	1 00

Payment to be made at the close of each term. Board, including lodging, washing, lights and fuel, can be procured in the village and immediate neighborhood at ten dollars per month. Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would, however, respectfully urge all parents or guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the institution, to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, for the latting, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.

School books, stationery, &c., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the usual rates.

Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral deportment of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.

As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justify entitle her, nor to pass into another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.

The government of the school is to be understood as that of authority—though parental and mild, yet decided and firm. The institution, in a religious point of view will be conducted without reference to sectarian influences.

Pupils will be required to attend church at least once on the Sabbath, and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.

The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.

The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second session commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July. At which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.

All applications for admission of pupils, &c., to be made to the president of the College.

RICHARD ANGELL, M. D., HOMEOPATHIC PHYSICIAN, 111 St. Charles st., corner of Lafayette Square, New Orleans, takes this method of acquainting his friends and former patrons with his location as a medical practitioner in New Orleans.

Thirty years' experience in general and hospital practice has confirmed his confidence in the superiority of Homœopathy in the treatment of both recent and chronic diseases. He would especially ask the attention of those who have long sought in vain for relief from chronic ailment in other systems of practice, to the happy results of Homœopathic treatment and proffers his services to such as desire to avail themselves of the resources of our system.

Communications from patients asking advice and treatment will be promptly attended to. Terms moderate.

Perhaps to lose it sooner; certainly to prolong it but a brief space at best.

This panic temperament is as little creditable to religion as it is to philosophy. Occasion has been given for the charge that no people on earth are so fearful of death as Christian people. This is unjust in many instances, but quite true in others. These epidemic panics illustrate the fact. Those that have stood their ground most manfully and most courageously have not always been professors. It is a pity and a shame that this is so. The faith which conquers death, which assures its possessor of the life immortal, should be the last to fly from the breath of the pestilence. We are sure that our Christian people here do honor to their faith in maintaining calmness and composure in the midst of death's doing—ministering to the victims of disease, and exhibiting in their lives, and deaths, if need be, the tranquilizing power and exalted hopes of religion.

WOODSMAN.

WALDENSES, ALBIGENSES AND VAUDOIS.

There is a dispute—the Episcopalians, Presbyterians and Congregationalists all laying claim to these old churches.

The "Church," a High Church organ, (Toronto, Canada,) gives this historical account, which, if not accurate, is clearer than any we have met with in the same compass:

The cloud of darkness which envelopes the Waldenses arises from our not sufficiently distinguishing the different sects of people: 1st, the Albigenses; 2d, the Waldenses; 3d, the Vaudois.

Of these the Albigenses arose in the beginning of the eleventh century, or, at least, at that time they were first found in France. They were decided and undoubted heretics, having revived many of the doctrines of the Manichæans and rejected the Scriptures.

The Waldenses have nothing whatever to do with the Albigenses. At the end of the twelfth century there lived in Lyons one Peter Waldo, a layman of earnest and religious mind. After having spent some time in the study of the Scriptures, he felt called upon to serve God in some manner more nearly than he had yet done. Accordingly, having sold all his goods and given to the poor, he chose, instead of going into a monastry, which was the general practice at that time, to begin to exhort and preach. The ecclesiastical authorities interfered to prevent him, but he fearlessly continued, and was at last expelled from Lyons. From their leader his companions and followers received the titles of "Waldenses," and "Poor Men of Lyons."

The history of the Vaudois, or Vallenses was as follows: There had been originally two dirtricts in Italy, in a manner resembling the provinces of York and Canterbury, in England. The southern part had the Archbishop of Rome for its head, while the northern was presided over by the Archbishop of Milan. The northern district retained its independence till the middle of the eleventh century. At this time, in the year 1059, when Wido occupied the archiepiscopal throne of Milan, Nicholas II., Bishop of Rome, attempted to bring it into submission to his authority. Wido at first yielded to the Pope's legate, Damiani, but afterwards reasserted his independence. His successor, Godfrey, adhering to this course, was thereupon excommunicated by the Bishop of Rome. From this time a struggle arose, and the Popes were successful in reducing the greater part of the Northern Italians under their power.

But there was, nevertheless, a party who resisted, on the ground that "the Ambrosian Church ought not be subject to the laws of Rome, and that the Pope of Rome had no right at all of judging and disposing anything there, inasmuch as their Church had always been free in the time of their forefathers." These men, who thus vindicated the ancient liberties of their Church, were called first by the name of Patarini, from having held their first congregation at Pataria. This, as we have said, was in the Diocese of Milan. In the Diocese of Turin a similar occurrence took place; and there these maintainers of their ancient rights were called Suhalpini, while those of them who lived in the valleys of Lacerne and Augrogne derived from thence the title of Vallenses, or Vaudois. The Vallenses, or Vaudois, therefore, existed nearly a century before the Waldenses, and the ground of their Protestantism (a name which they themselves now acknowledge as belonging to them) was a resistance to Papal supremacy and to an enforced celibacy of the clergy. When, however, the Waldenses were driven out of Lyons, many of them came and joined the Vallenses, and so the two names became confused. The Vallenses preserved at first their bishops, priests and deacons; but evil days came upon them, and they suffered bitter persecutions. At last they fell away from their ancient discipline, and in the middle of the seventeenth century their Episcopate became extinct.

Sanctified affliction, like rain after dry weather, lays the dust of passion, softens the soul into resignation, and causes gratitude to spring forth.

Death, to God's people, is but a ferry boat. Every day and every hour the boat pushes off with some of the saints, and returns for more.

LICENSING PREACHERS.

We suppose that no division of Protestantism has produced more able or eloquent preachers, or preachers better adapted to the exigencies of the age, than our own communion. We do not consider this, however, a very remarkable fact. The largeness of our numbers and the peculiar features of our organization should, we think, entirely account for the number and efficiency of our ministry. But no system devised and worked by finite man can be expected to be free from error, if not sometimes abused.

Our Disciplinary rule upon this subject is certainly most judicious and comprehensive. All persons desiring license to preach among us must have "gifts, grace and usefulness." Certainly a plentitude of qualifications. Did the classes recommend none but such, or, if they did, the Conferences refused to license any but such as, in their candid judgment, possessed the prescribed qualifications, we should have a less number of inefficient men in the ministry than we now have.

As it is the season of the year when by far the largest number of candidates are licensed, let us at this writing briefly consider these qualifications.

First, what are we to understand by gifts? We should say, first of all, a respectable measure of common sense. We do not understand by this any extraordinary depth, brilliancy or originality of mind, but a sober and judicious judgment, free from those odd and erratic peculiarities which render ministers useless or ridiculous. In the judgment of charity we must think we have seen some clothed with authority to preach the gospel who were sadly deficient in this essential element of a minister's mental character.

Whatever others may think, we cannot believe that any one was ever called of God to take on him the office and work of the ministry who was not endowed with at least a respectable share of common sense. Let our classes and Quarterly Conferences be observant of this requisition, and insist upon its possession by all who are licensed to preach. Let no respectable concoctions or apparent sincerity on the part of the candidate operate to secure him license without this vital element of character.

Under the head of "gifts," I suppose we should understand a hopeful measure of fluency. We have read that poets are born, and that orators are made. This may be true. But if orators can be made, it does not follow that they can be created. The raw material must exist in the subject himself, or he never will be, never can be made an orator. By orator, in this connection, we simply mean a passably good speaker. If upon fair trial, then, the candidate (making due allowance for embarrassement) gives no encouraging indications of being able to tell what he professes to know and thinks it his duty to communicate, then we should say the Church authorities ought to hesitate, and be anything but precipitate in their action.

We suppose that the Discipline further means, by "gifts," some measure of literary and theological attainment. The candidate should be able to speak his own tongue with some tolerable correctness, as to grammar and pronunciation. He ought to have at least some little theological training, say so much as a careful reading, not only of the Bible, but Wesley's Sermons, Watson's Institutes, Ralston's Elements, or some such works. We are well aware that some have been licensed and sent forth to preach that were almost entirely deficient in even those limited elements of fitness, and that some of them, despite all those auspicious conditions, have risen to a considerable measure of usefulness and distinction. But we know also the deep mortification to themselves and to the Church which marked and marred the first periods of their ministerial career. We cannot see that it would not have been better for them to have been better prepared for the work to which they professed to be called. All, however, have not been able to overcome the discouragements of their circumstances—without qualifications to labor in fields where they might have had books and cloistral associations, they have never risen above the most humble mediocrity, or else, totally discouraged, have abandoned the work and given their lives to secular and apparently more hopeful enterprises. Some little judicious preparation might have prevented this loss to the Church and to themselves. Let the Quarterly Conferences look to this.

Next, it is required that the candidate shall have "grace"—not only give satisfactory evidence of sound conversion to God, but that he have those peculiar graces demanded by the circumstances of the gospel minister: An ardent love of souls bought with a Saviour's blood; a zeal according to knowledge, that shall inspire thought and breathe and kindle words that burn; a zeal that shall urge him with untiring perseverance to labors more abundant than fell to the lot of common men. He must have strong faith in the great and gracious promises of his Master, especially the great commission, "Lo, I am with you always;" faith in that God who feeds the ravens when they cry, and who has said our bread and water shall be sure. He must have humility, a deep and abiding consciousness that he is but an earthen vessel—that his sufficiency is all of God. Of course, no Church authorities can be absolutely assured of the existence of such graces in candidates for the ministry, but, if careful and observant, can arrive at conclusions sufficiently satisfactory for all practical purposes.

And, lastly, the candidate must have "usefulness." Our institutions furnish a most ample and appropriate field for the exercise of any gifts for public ministration which our young men may possess. Our Sunday schools, prayer meetings, class meetings and revival seasons are just the occasions for the exercise of the gifts of singing, prayer, instruction and exhortation. It can generally be known whether the candidate has given evidence of hopeful gifts by his labors in some of these departments of usefulness.

Did our classes and Quarterly Conferences restrict themselves to the rule of the Discipline, some who are unfit would never apply, others would not be licensed, and others would be required to wait a season for greater maturity and fitness for the work. It is to be feared that our classes too often permit themselves to be influenced by purely personal motives, without regard to the great issues involved, and the Quarterly Conferences take for granted what, in fact, they should know, before they vote to confer the power to minister in holy things.

There is an upward educational tendency throughout the whole country, and the times demand a corresponding improvement in the cultivation of our ministry. The honor of the Church, the position and usefulness of the ministry, and the eternal importance of the cause of Christ, demand of the constituted authorities of the Church greater caution and fullness of information than, we fear, is often possessed, before conferring upon candidates for the ministry so responsible and important a trust.

PROGRESS—SASNETT.

THE BOOK FOR THE TIMES.

Progress, is the right direction, is what is needed for the times. All that is needed is the complete development of principles already possessed by the Church to the greatest extent. Consequently, no new doctrine, nor an old one newly dressed, is needed; nor is a new mode of operation desired for true progress. Progress! what is it? Nothing more nor less than to "go on to perfection."

The doctrines of Methodism are true; her mode of operation is the best in the world. What, then, is needed, but to use them as our fathers did? Only, as we have advantages they had not, our influence, and the effect of it, should be commensurate with those advantages.

Such is the progress elaborated and urged by Professor Sasnett. And, without endorsing every sentiment in his book, or the reason assigned for its correctness, the writer of this would say, that it is the book for the times.

If there was ever a time when the Methodist Church needed a more united and extensive movement in the educational and missionary cause than now, we have overlooked it in our observations of the past; and so of all the rest referred to in this book.

It will not, however, meet the notions of some on the subject considered; and if for no other reason, it is really what it purports to be, a book on progress. So that if any should take it, from its title-page, to be a book in favor of old, superannuated and worn out notions, such as organs, pews and theological seminaries, or any other sort of crawfish progression, they need not read it, for they will be egregiously disappointed.

If, however, it be desirable to go on to perfection in Church movements, in the right way, and by the right plan and means, I think we have it fully set forth in this book. As such, I can but hope it will be generally circulated and read by all our people.

There is also peculiar pleasure afforded to the lover of the old landmarks and peculiarities of Methodism that such a book comes to us under the sanction of the General Book Editor. This contrasts, with no little force, with those papers under General Conference appointment that seem to wink at innovations of which our author treats with great power and effect.

By the way, I should like to know by what authority the General Conference papers can gravely advocate theological seminaries, pews or any other usages unknown to Methodism and contrary thereto; especially, how the grave Quarterly can come out in a late notice of a sermon by Dr. Winans holding doctrines and sentiments exactly similar to those of our author, in direct, and, to say the least, immodest opposition? Is this meeting the demands of the Church in the publication of such a periodical?

That the editors of those papers and of the Quarterly have a right to hold their notions on these subjects, is not questioned; but it is seriously doubted by many that they have the right to send out their notions in the official periodicals of the Church, which can result in evil only, as many believe, and as Prof. Sasnett has clearly shown in his book.

Mississippi, Aug. 11, 1855. YOUNG AMERICA.

SOUTH AMERICA.—At Valparaiso, Chili, a British Episcopal chapel in the city is found too small for the increasing congregation, and is now undergoing repairs and enlargement. A Congregational society, composed of English, Scotch and American residents, is much straightened in its place of worship, but is proposing to build without delay. An eligible sight has been secured and nearly paid for, and subscriptions are made for putting up the building the present season. The Seaman's Friend Society co-operate in the enterprise.

CAUSE AND CURE OF SUPERSTITION AND FANATICISM

AMONG THE COLORED PEOPLE.

A writer in the Herald (Richmond, Va.) makes a frank statement on this subject. He is a Baptist minister, and knows whereof he talks. We admire the spirit—not of fear, but of love and a sound mind—that induces the publication. He is not so afraid that his admission of existing evils will be taken advantage of by opponents, as to conceal the evils or extenuate them. Those who do nothing in this laborious field have time to find fault with others who are doing what they can to save souls. Their work is in no danger of criticism—safe as a monentity. This writer observes, in the outset:

"If my memory serves me aright, a distinguished leader of a certain modern 'sect' sneered at the Baptists, a few years ago, because of an alleged 'affinity' between them and the colored people. He seemed disposed to congratulate himself and his followers that while thousands of colored persons were pressing into the Baptist Church, scarcely a hundred could be found in his communion in the whole United States. Any such sneers and insinuations may be endured by us with very great equanimity, in view of the fact that 'common people heard the Saviour gladly,' and he himself announced it as a distinguishing trait of his gospel that it was preached to the poor. But while we should never be ashamed of the fact that the great majority of the colored people attach themselves to us, nay, while we should rejoice in it, still we should be deeply impressed by the responsibility it imposes."

Remarking, from his observation and reflection, a defect too often observable in the religious experience of this large portion of the community, he submits the following:

"Nor is it the result of private instructions by masters. Indeed these last have been afforded so sparingly till within a few years since, that they could produce but little effect of any sort. And besides, those who own servants and are willing to teach them, are far too intelligent to countenance superstition in any. I repeat the inquiry, then, why is it that so many of our colored members are ignorant, superstitious and fanatical? It is the effect of instructions received from leading men amongst themselves, and the churches are responsible for this effect, in so far as they receive into fellowship those who have listened to these instructions, ground their hopes upon them and guide their lives by them. Whatever we may say against superstition, so long as we receive into our churches those who are its slaves, they will believe that we think them Christians, and naturally relying upon our judgment, as expressed by their reception, they will live deluded and die but to be lost. But some one will say, 'We never receive colored persons when they manifest these superstitions, when they talk of visions, dreams, sounds,' &c. This is right, as far as it goes. In every such case they should be rejected. But superstition often exists where nothing is said about dreams or visions. And this is the sort of superstition which now prevails among the colored people. They have found that sights and sounds will not answer before the whites, and now (reserving these, perhaps, for some chosen auditory of their own color) they substitute prayers and feelings. To illustration, permit me to record, no in spirit of levity, the stereotyped experience which generally passes current, and, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred introduces the colored candidate into the church. The pastor is informed by one of the 'colored deacons' that a man wishes to offer to the church with a view to baptism. The fact is announced, a meeting of the church called, and the candidate comes forward.

Pastor—Well, John, tell me in a few words, in your own way, your religious experience. What have been your feelings, and what are your present hopes and purposes?

John—I see other people trying, and so I thought I would try too, as I had a soul to save. So I went to pray, and the more I prayed the wus I felt; so I kept on praying, and the more I prayed the wus I felt; I felt heavy; I felt a weight; and I kept on praying, till at last I felt light; I felt easy; I felt like I loved all Christian people; I felt like I loved everybody.

Now this is positively the whole of the experience which is generally related by colored candidates for baptism. There may be a slight variation of expression now and then, but the sense is almost invariably the same. On this experience hundreds have been received into the churches—I have received many upon it myself. I am somewhat serious to know how many of the seventy baptized by my good brother Bagby told this tale. I'll warrant not less than fifty. Have any of us been right in receiving persons on such a relation as this? In the whole of it there is not one word of gospel—not one word of sorrow for sin—not one word about faith—not one word about Christ. I know all these things are subsequently brought out by questions; and, were this not the case, I have no idea the candidate would in any instance be received. But that these questions may be understood, they are necessarily made 'leading questions,' such as suggest their answers, and consequently these answers are of but little value. It does seem to me that where a person has experienced real sorrow for sin, and has exercised real faith in Christ, he can and will, in some way, (I care not in how broken a manner, but in some way,) say so of his own accord. If he is incapable of saying so, he is equally incapable of exercising the feelings of penitence and faith, and should, on this ground, be rejected. I know that great allowance must be made for the ignorance of the colored people; but I have no warrant in Scripture to allow for the ignorance of Christ and the plan of salvation. I am constrained to conclude that a person who tells such an experience as that I have recorded above—I mean one in which nothing is said of penitence, faith or pardon—should be rejected. To take this course will, I know, be frequently very mortifying to the colored congregation, and very painful to the church and pastor, but it is only thus, so far as I can see, that we can impress the colored people with the danger of that superstition which trusts to prayers and feelings instead of the blood and righteousness of Christ. I am aware that, as Brother Bagby suggests, private instructions by masters have been too much neglected. But these can accomplish but little good so long as they are counteracted by the teachings of leading colored members, in whose views, after all our efforts, the colored people will have the most confidence. These teachings can be corrected more effectually, in my judgment by showing those who impart them that we will not tolerate an unscriptural experience than by any other method. Perhaps it might be well, too, occasionally, to examine the leading members of the Church, and if they betray any of these dangerous superstitions, at once to exclude them."

The class meeting practice, under any name you choose to give it, is very wholesome. The Catechism is a potent solvent of superstition. It drives it away as sure does the mist. Capers' Catechism, Nos. 1 and 2 is good. The American Tract Society has put forth a suitable one with simple questions and answers in Scripture words. The Creed "I believe in God the Father," &c., is an excellent preventive of these evils, also. Knowledge elemental is wanted. Where the Catechism prevails and the Creed can be repeated we have observed little superstition and fanaticism.

FLORENTINE CORRESPONDENCE.

Mr. Editor—The desire expressed in your letter of the 30th ult. is my only apology for inflicting this upon you and your readers. During the winter and spring there was more uneasiness than I have ever known in reference to a famine. All kinds of provisions were exceedingly high, while our water courses were exceedingly low. There was no prospect of being able to send off the cotton to market, and wealthy people even manifested much anxiety for the future. It was at this juncture that the telegraph wires were cut down with the hope that with their fall rain might fall also. Our Governor appointed a day of fasting and prayer that we might have rain. Well, the rain has come, and such crops were never seen in this country. Wheat, rye, oats, corn, in the greatest abundance, with a flattering prospect for cotton. Flour has fallen to a mere nominal price, and corn will be equally low.

The railroad from Charleston to Memphis is being rapidly completed, and it is now confidently asserted that one year will finish it. This will be of incalculable advantage to North Alabama, and will enable us to choose between Charleston and the Crescent City.

The cause of education is receiving much attention, as well in North as in South Alabama. At Huntsville, one of the handsomest and best improved towns in the State, they have the Bascom Institute for females. The building is the largest and best finished for school purposes in the State. It is under the management of President Everhart, who is doing a great and good work.

The Conference Institute, at Athens, has lost much by the resignation of Dr. Finley, a noble Christian gentleman, an elegant scholar and evangelical preacher. His place is not yet filled.

LaGrange College closed its first session in Florence, Ala., on the 11th of July, with a brilliant commencement. It was the most prosperous session in its history. Never during any previous five months had one hundred and fifty-six pupils entered, and never had there been a more brilliant commencement. The Junior exhibition occupied the nights of Monday and Tuesday, and the young gentlemen acquitted themselves admirably. Their pieces were well written and exceedingly well committed. Not one out of a large class had to refer to his manuscript or be prompted. The addresses of Mr. Keyes before the Alumni, and Rev. M. Erwin before the Literary Societies, were just such as might be expected from original thinkers, ripe scholars, polished writers and accomplished speakers. The Graduating class was small, but there was in it talent of the very highest order. I was sorry that your young friend Hoover, of whom Woodsman spoke so highly last year in his notice of the commencement at Centenary, had to leave before he could deliver his speech; sickness at the South called him home. His name was on the programme, and he received his degree with the high commendation of the Faculty. The Baccalaureate of your old friend, Dr. Rivers, was claimed by the class and Trustees for publication, and is, I suppose, in the hands of the printer. It was pronounced sound, practical, and possessed of all the ardor and heartiness which characterize him who was so long connected with you in Louisiana.

The College buildings at Florence are not yet completed. It is a majestic Gothic structure, and when completed will not only take the palm from the Bascom, but will rival any college buildings in the South.

There has recently been great political excitement throughout North Alabama. The American organization, the letter of Senator Clemens, together with his impassioned speeches, the union of a religious element with politics, the breaking up of the old parties, have all tended to make this an exceedingly bitter contest. I have recently visited my old homestead, and have been pained to find that the violence of this conflict has been such as to sever old friends, to burst asunder the cords of affection which have bound friends together for twenty-five years.

In the midst of all this there have been some gracious revivals of religion. This is comfortable, and should be a source of devout thanksgiving. As I am about to make a tour through North Mississippi and West Tennessee, you shall hear from me again.

When a Christian is poor, his Heavenly Father keeps the purse; but the rich keep the purse themselves. It often falls out that it is better to have the purse in our Father's hands than our own.

LATER FROM TEXAS.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMER CHAS. MORGAN.

The U. S. mail steamship Chas. Morgan arrived yesterday morning with full mails, and a large number of passengers. She brought dates from Galveston as late as the 18th ult.

By our Galveston exchanges we learn that they have returns from thirty-five counties, which give Pease a majority over Dickson of two thousand five hundred votes. The Democratic candidates for Lt. Governor and Congress are also ahead. The K. N. candidate for Land Commissioner is ahead, by over seventeen hundred votes. The Democrats have elected, as far as heard, four in the State Senate and fifteen in the House. The K. N.'s have elected one in the Senate and seven in the House.

In regard to the health of Galveston, the Civilian says:

The health of Galveston continues remarkably good. We paid a visit to the Hospital yesterday, and found no cases of yellow fever or other serious disease there. The death from the fever in Mexico, which did not exist last week, was not admitted among the other patients; but kept in an outhouse on the corner of the hospital grounds, which is kept for persons sick of contagious diseases. There is no case of yellow fever in private practice in the city, and physicians inform us that the evidences of a healthy season were never better. The existence of yellow fever at New Orleans does not prove that it will prevail in Galveston. This city has escaped on several occasions when New Orleans was suffering under an epidemic.

The same paper also says:

The Council met last evening to concert measures for the protection of the city against the introduction of yellow fever. It was not thought necessary to establish summary quarantine regulations; but sufficient for the city physicians to board the steamers, and convey all persons sick of contagious diseases to the hospital.

A correspondent of the same paper, writing from Canon de Uvalde, says:

We have a delightful country here, every prospect pleases, only the stealing by the Indians, and it seems that from this we are to have no relief. Many of our worthy citizens have suffered with patience until they have become satisfied that they need not depend upon Government for assistance, and many would soon leave if it was not for their crops, and some are talking of leaving any how. In fact I see no chance myself for us to defend ourselves here; that we only are suffered to guard for our families, the citizens would follow the Indians, to a man, into their camps, and there follow the military tactics of Anthony Wayne.

The Texas Christian Advocate, of the 18th August, says:

The San Antonio and Eagle Pass mail was attacked by Indians during the last week. One Indian was severely wounded by a shot from Mr. Gardner, of Galveston; the others seeing a stout resistance was likely to be made, fled.

CROPS IN TEXAS.—Our Texas exchanges being at this time filled almost entirely with political matters, we find considerable difficulty in getting information as to the state of the crops. From the Central Texan (Grimes county) we take the following:

The cotton caterpillar, we have been informed, has made its appearance on some of the plantations near Plantersville. Very little damage has been done by them as yet, but it is very much feared that in a very short time they will appear in such numbers as to make sad havoc in the fine crops of cotton. Warm, showery weather, such as we now have, is the most favorable for the generation and growth of this destructive worm.

Several of our planters are now engaged in cotton picking. Some hands have picked 250 pounds per day.

We were shown a sweet potato, of this year's growth, on yesterday, by Mr. Lucien Nelms, which was raised on the plantation of Mr. Isaac Parks, that measured eight inches in length by the same in circumference.

A correspondent of the "Nueces Valley" sent the editor of that paper a stalk of corn, which was an average from one hundred hills, only forty-five days old, which measured fourteen feet, one and a half inches in height.

THE FRENCH COLONY IN NORTHERN TEXAS.—Louis Considerant, the head of the French colony in Northern Texas, has addressed a pamphlet to the American people, setting forth their history, principles, wishes and plans. In noticing it, the Galveston Civilian says:

We have given it but a hasty perusal, from which it appears that they do not sympathize with the commonly known Socialists, but hold property like other people; that they leave Europe to escape persecution and enjoy our liberty; that they are intelligent, moral and independent; and it seems they are not Catholics, but rank themselves politically somewhat as the Puritans of New England two hundred and fifty years ago.

They repudiate abolitionism, and declare that they opposed it in Louis Philippe's time when applied to the French West Indies and almost declare themselves the friends of the Know-Nothings. That is, they place a much more liberal construction on the objects of that society than we do. They say they will introduce artizans, laborers, farmers, mechanics and much capital into Texas, and will aid in all improvements, roads and railroads; they will establish English schools as well as French.

The tone of the address is decorous, and it is well written.

The Central Texan, speaking of these people, says:

We feel quite willing to see these people come into the State and become, in due time, entitled to all the rights of citizenship. We, however, do not think that the interest of the country would be at all promoted by granting them lands as a colony. Let them come to the country and have only the same bounties and privileges that are accorded to other immigrants.

SURVEY OF THE BAY AND HARBOR OF ST MARKS, FLA.—We learn from the Tallahassee Floridian and Journal, that the Government of the United States has determined to cause a regular survey of the Bay and Harbor of St. Marks, and of the St. Marks river at least as high as the railroad terminus, which is situated about a mile above the junction of the Wakulla and the St. Marks rivers.

Lieut. E. H. Gardes made a survey of the same place in April, 1852, which was published in the report of the United States Coast Survey for that year, pages 95, 96 and 97.

The people of that section complain that the facts were misrepresented by Lieut. Gardes; that he reported only eleven feet water over the bar when there is full thirteen, and that ten and a half feet may be carried up to the terminus instead of six and a half, as he had it.

As this matter is of considerable importance to the people of Middle Florida, and also to New Orleans, on account of there being quite a large trade between St. Marks and this port, we hope that this survey may be made as soon as possible.

TELEGRAPHIC LINE ACROSS THE ISTHMUS AT PANAMA.—A correspondent of the New York Herald, writing from Panama, July 20, says:

As you will no doubt be glad to learn the progress of the new telegraph line here, I lose no time in letting you hear of our movements. After a very pleasant passage out, we came in sight of the Isthmus, eighteen days from the time of leaving Sandy Hook. Immediately on arriving the line was staked out, and with the assistance of the laborers on the route, holes were dug and every thing was in readiness to raise the poles, which, I am sorry to say, were kept under deck until a large iron boat could be removed. On this account, affairs have been delayed a few days, but now the poles are distributed, the offices arranged, and we expect to have the line in working order, so that we can leave for home in the George Law, which sails on Aspinwall on the 10th of August. Mr. Baker, our contractor, and all hands are in the enjoyment of excellent health and spirits. The weather here is uncommonly fine for this season of the year. The natives say it is the summer of San Juan. Probably it is, but we think it has been gotten up expressly on our account. If the weather favors us for the next ten days, as it has to the present time, the line will be completed in a fortnight without the least trouble.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, AUGUST 27, 1855

Young Men's Christian Association.

This practically benevolent association has now in force a "Relief Committee," of ten members, which, in the name and with the charities of the association, will afford assistance to the sick among the indigent and strangers. A large proportion of annual sufferers from yellow fever are young men who are here, far from families. By calling on J. H. Massey, 47 Camp street, R. Gribble, corner Camp and Magazine streets, or at the rooms of the association, over the Bible House, information may be obtained.

We heartily commend their purpose and bless them in their work.

ONWARD.—The first year of the Texas Christian Advocate is completed, and it is very gratifying to read this substantial sign: "We have [illegible] subscribers than when we issued the first number of the Advocate."

BISHOP PIERCE.—The Georgia Press is pleased to learn that he has given up all idea of making any change in his residence. He will make old Hancock, his long tried and well beloved home, his permanent residence. His address has been changed from Sparta to Culverton.

DR. WAYLAND has resigned the Presidency of Brown University, which he has held since 1827. In 1833 he issued a volume of "Occasional Discourses," commencing with the celebrated sermon on the "Moral Dignity of the Missionary Enterprise," which had already passed to a place in the standard literature of the language. In 1835 appeared his "Elements of Moral Science," which has averaged about three editions a year since that time. Two years later appeared his "Elements of Political Economy," which took similar rank as a text book in that science.

HOUSTON, LA.—The Board of Trustees lately met, and having a full attendance, proceeded to the permanent location of the site for the College buildings. It almost unanimously selected the lot first chosen by the Trustees before their organization. It is known generally as the Gryder lot. After some discussion whether these hard times were the times for starting, the desire for the speedy erection of the buildings prevailed, and a committee was appointed to let out the making of the bricks, &c., with instructions to hasten matters as much as possible. A committee of three was appointed to attend the Ouachita Annual Conference next fall, at Eldorado, with a view to enlisting, as far as possible, the feelings of the members of that Conference in favor of the college, and of inducing, if practicable, some favorable action of the Conference.

AUBURN, ALA.—A committee of gentlemen lately assembled to select an appropriate location for the projected College. The Gazette says:

"We are happy to announce the fact that the committee succeeded in procuring a most eligible location, much to the satisfaction of our citizens, who, in order to secure impartial and disinterested action, did not interfere with the operations of the committee. The location is elevated, central, accessible, and commands a fine view of the railroad, of the entire town, and of the circumjacent country. The grounds are capable of the most graceful ornamentation, and will doubtless be improved to their utmost capacity.

An additional object accomplished by the meeting of the committee was the perfection of arrangements preliminary to the adoption of a suitable plan for the contemplated buildings. Dr. Lapsomb, who has made college architecture an especial study, besides enjoying the benefit of an acquaintance with the best models in the country, presented several plans to which his attention had been directed. The one which received the sanction of the committee is a modification of the building of the Free Academy of New York city, one of the most magnificent college edifices in the Union, combining in the highest degree the indispensable elements of convenience, adaptativeness and comfort. It is in the pure Gothic style of architecture—the most beautiful and imposing in existence."

QUIET CONVERSIONS.—A writer of "Plantation Sermons," (good ideas,) in the Southern Presbyterian, is describing the new birth, as some are "born again:"

"But often God does his great work in sinner's hearts so still and gently that nobody can tell just when it was done. They often doubt about themselves; they wonder whether there can be the new heart; they're afraid they have made some mistake. Especially when some young Christians make such a great sudden change, it makes others say, 'if that is the way we have to be converted, I can't be a Christian.' Now I want to clear up that trouble for you.... Often the change in feelings is just as quiet as the sun's going over our heads at 12 o'clock: it makes no noise at all, but the shadows begin to fall the other way."

If you would keep spring in your hearts, learn to sing. There is more in melody than most people are aware of. A cobler, who smooths his wax ends with a song, will do a much work in a day as one given to ill nature and fretting would effect in a week. Songs are like sunshine—they run to cheerfulness; they fill the bosom with such buoyancy, that for the time being you feel filled with June air, or like a meadow of clover in blossom.

Funeral Ethics and Economics.

The Discipline has an item characteristic and very excellent, on this wise:

"We will, on no account whatever make a charge for administering baptism or burying the dead."

With pleasing confidence we say that Methodist ministers keep that rule, without mending or breaking.

These two sources afford the revenues of the Romish clergy a steady and enormous contribution. By the tariff of prices a funeral can be furnished on any scale, from a pewter cross to gorgeous paraphernalia and numerous priestly attendance.

An epidemic is a greater harvest to the priests than the undertakers. Besides the consecrated burial ground, of which they have monopoly, there are the ghostly perquisites. Any observing citizen here must be struck with the impetus given to their churches, convent buildings, &c., by an epidemic. The ecclesiastical treasury is in funds then.

We do not and would not intimate that the Romish clergy have no higher motive in enduring epidemics; but this alone accounts for the presence of many others with whom it is a business and thriving time—the cream of the harvest.

It is no exaggeration, in our judgment, to estimate the net revenue of the Romish priesthood of this city, accruing from this source alone, for the summer of 1853, at $150,000.

In what might be taken as an average case, we saw a few years ago, and published it at the time, a funeral bill made out by one of our average priests—$30—and he would not go till it was paid in advance. It is otherwise with the Protestant ministry. When they stay by the sick and bury the dead it is a clerical, and not a mercantile transaction.

It is well, in justice to all parties, to look at things in this light. Read the following: which appeared in one of the daily papers this week:

Messrs. Editors—You will agree with me, every one reading this will, that the matter herein set forth is entitled to the serious consideration of the people of New Orleans. Long overlooked, it is not too late to call their attention to it.

Among the benefactors of our summer residents, cast-aways, sick and bereaved, are the ministers of the gospel. All do not take trips North and to Europe—I do not [illegible] it, or the healthful lake shores and gulf coasts. When a friend is sick and wishes a minister's visit; or dead, and surviving friends and family would have the last solemn rites of christian burial performed, these resident pastors are in great demand. How often have we sought them, and felt their services in times of distress and epidemics, to be invaluable! Not fearing infectious disease, mid-day heat, or graveyard vapors, they come at our call.

Bad as our case is in mid summer, and especially in epidemics, it would be inconceivably worse but that these ministers are with us, keeping open churches, still ministering wherever afflction is, or the house of mourning is.

Question—Are not these much needed, much used, and much valued servants of God, badly treated by our people?

Witness a funeral—the minister attends—first at the house, then in procession usually to the tomb. Pronounces there "dust to dust," and is among the last to retire. The sexton is paid, the undertaker is paid, every salesman and carriage driver is paid, and yet he whose time is at least as valuable as theirs, he whose services would not have been dispensed with—the minister—is dismissed with a bow and "thank ye!"

One says, "that is their business—to do good, to minister," etc. Yet they must live. Points bows and thank ye's do not satisfy landlords for monthly rent, or pay grocer's bill, or clothe families. Congregations being rich, and business dull and living expensive, ought their time, and labor, and services, be accepted without some recognition? Required, they cannot be.

They do not make out a bill of charges. They would not sue before the magistrate. They make no demand.

If a minister performed a marriage ceremony, and were dismissed with a bow and "thank ye," it would generally be thought the party saving his fee had lost his credit. Yet a wedding is a pleasant affair, to which any are pleased to be admitted. Ministers burying the members of their church and congregation, who, while living, contributed to their support, are but burying their own dead; but strangers, families and individuals, and associations, not so related, alter the case. Is it right that these should consent to be served by him, at his own cost, and that, too, when they are not indigent, and the funeral appointments are costly? He serves the poor gratis and freely, cheerfully; but they are not poor. The writer knew a faithful Protestant minister of this city, who passed through the dreadful summer of 1853 with us—never deserted his post—was often called upon by all classes, and attended over seventy funerals, not one-tenth of which were for his own congregation—the sexton, undertaker, and remnant of the family often constituting his sole company. He visited the graveyard, and stood at the mouth of tombs, when bystanders held their mouths to escape the prevailing stench, and officiated bare under a smiting sun. One, two, three or four hours, would be taken up by a single funeral. No study, no other labor could be engaged in. Doctors, apothecaries made fortunes; undertakers and nurses also. The minister received, in all, fifteen dollars! A poor man, with a family to support. Messrs Editors, there is an evil in this treatment of our resident and laboring clergy. With many, it is caused by thoughtlessness—a mere oversight. In the gloom of grief and confusion of the time, they do not think of it, and of course are not reminded. But, I ask—from whatever cause it arises—Is it fair? Is it right?

JUSTITIA.

ROMANISM IN THE UNITED STATES.

In looking at the designs of Popery in this country, we are apt to give it credit for far more rapid progress and greater strength than it deserves. Contrasted with Protestantism in these particulars, it shows badly. Witness the following on the subject, from the Boston Transcript:

"Maryland, the first State where the Roman Catholic Church gained a footing, now contains 807 Protestant churches, and only 65 Catholic congregations. In Florida, the Catholics early made a settlement: now there are 170 Protestant, and only 5 Catholic churches! Louisiana was settled by the Catholics, who now have 55 churches in the State, while the Protestants have 247 congregations. In Texas, the Catholics were the first sect, in point of time; they now have 13 churches, but the Protestants report 307 congregations in the State."

INDEPENDENT EDITING.—Hear Rev. Abe Stevens', editor of the National Magazine, a periodical second to none in the country, opinion of what constitutes good editing:

"We do not, in our editorials, hold ourselves responsible to the personal views of any individual patron. For ourselves, personally, we would not subscribe a sixpence to a periodical which should hold itself bound to revolt only received views, or to bring us from mouth to mouth such opinions only as are admitted by common consent, or are a repetition, a rehash of our own individual thinkings. We prefer something independent, something provocative of new and progressive thought—even if it challenge, sometimes, our dissent."

Judge the Tree by its Fruit.

This test is now being searchingly applied among the New England Churches. One Dr. Cooke published a book making a wanton attack on Methodism and its doctrinal feature, Arminianism. Dr. C. is a Calvinistic pastor in Lynn, Mass. His bile has been gathering for years, and he relieves it in a style that we, down here, would call black vomit. Universalism and all other prevalent forms of religious error, immorality, infidelity, all are traced up by this divine to the Methodist altar! In his tirade, he says: "The influence beginning at the Methodist altar, and proceeding down through Universalist and Infidel channels, issues in just those things which are a disgrace to our body politic"—p. 332.

He has arrived at the "discouraging idea" that "the largest religious denomination in the United States is working more evil than good;" and nothing but Calvinism saves the country. In proof, he appeals to facts, practical results and particular places, as Lynn; and goes extensively into a comparison of the fruits of the two systems, as seen in social and religious life.

A fair field, and Zion's Herald has entered it heartily, explored it, accurately, and balanced accounts between Methodist economy and Arminian tendencies, on the one hand, and Congregational economy and Calvinistic tendencies, on the other—to the dismay of plaintiffs.

A writer, 15th inst., evidently posted up, shows that Murray, Huntingdon, Winchester, Hosea Ballou, Balfour, Abner Kneeland, the founders and lights of Universalism, were bred Calvinists, and most of them once Calvinistic preachers. He says, "There is nothing more obvious than that the fathers of the system were pushed into their error by Calvinism." Quoting from the life of Huntingdon, who styled his book "Calvinism Improved"—

"It was not by giving up the peculiarities of his former views that he became a Universalist, but by grafting upon them the hypothesis of universal salvation, and by carrying through the system of Calvin in regard to all mankind, as it had been generally done in reference to the elect alone; and from this he derived the title of his work, 'Calvinism improved.'"

One hundred Calvinistic Churches in New England slid off to Unitarianism!

Some things took place there before Methodist corruptions crept in, as the witch burning, near the close of the sixteenth century:

"Did this proceed from the Methodist altar? No; for it took place in those palmy days of the old churches to which Dr. Cooke looks back with so much rapture, when no wicked Methodism was known, and when Calvinism had its own way, and people were not only taxed to support it, but were fined for absenting themselves from the churches where it was preached. Ministers of high standing took the lead in causing the so-called witches to be put to death, as the same class had done before in hanging the Quakers and whipping the Baptists.

We will suppose that Methodism had been in New England at this time instead of Calvinism, with an influence as unmixed, and the same things had occurred—what would Dr. Cooke, as an historian, now say! He would at once set down such doings as the fruits of Methodism. He would scarcely find language to execrate a system bearing such a horrid fruit!"

This tracing up is a legitimate but very delicate business. The influence of side issues must be allowed for. Zion's Herald has been forced, in self defence, into a rich field. It is intensely interesting to see whereunto creeds do grow. The article quoted from concludes:

"We might name several other heresies which have been put forth to curse New England and the world by Calvinistic men, were it necessary, but we desist. It is extremely unfortunate for a man of Dr. Cooke's pretensions and position that almost every wild and scandalous heresy which has visited New England for two hundred years has either grown legitimately and directly out of Calvinism, or has been put forth by Calvinistic ministers. We beg of him that—before he writes another book of slander upon Methodism and the Methodists, he will take a walk round the Calvinistic altar and see what he can find. If his moral sensibilities are not entirely blunted, we think the view will teach him a little moderation."

INTRODUCTION TO BIBLICAL CHRONOLOGY—From Adam to the Resurrection of Christ—By Rev. P. Akers, D. D. Cinn. Methodist Book Concern, 1855

As neatly put up a book (8vo. pp. 420) as one could wish. Long looked for, it having often been given out that Dr. Akers was preparing it. Makes the eyes ache to think what pains the author, printer and proof reader underwent. A table of logarithms is simplicity, in comparison. Includes 5573 years of the world, synchronized with Julian time. The author claims to have proven in this work that the ancient solar year of the Scriptures and that used by the Jews up to the Exodus and by various nations, without any regard to the precession of equinoxes, consisted of twelve months, of thirty days each, with five added after the last of them, and on leap year, six.

CREED OF ALL MEN.—By Rev. R. Abbey. Stevenson & Owen, Nashville.

We noticed this sermon in its first unworthy dress. It deserved and has a better one now. Propositions, ingeniously elaborated—1. The truth of Christianity was never doubted. 2. The principles of Christianity were never objected to.

CHRISTIAN BENEFICENCE—By W. Hosmer, W. J. Moses: Auburn, N. Y., 1855.

A volume (pp. 219) begun to meet the offer of the Methodist Tract Society, with a prize; but the author not having confined himself to the Society's plan, did not present it to the Committee. It lays down the measure, manner and misuses of giving. The last point is set forth with excellent force.

LETTER FROM BISHOP ANDREW.

NO. IV.

The Golden Argument Answered—Why the California Work has not Succeeded Better.

I have a few thoughts more in favor of prosecuting our work in California, and then I shall cease for the present.

I remember that last winter, in attending one of the Conferences, one of the preachers, a man of no mean note, suggested as a difficulty in the way of making collections for California, that our people could not understand how it was that California, being the land of gold, should appeal to the people in the Atlantic States for aid in planting churches and sustaining the institutions of religion in her midst. This is probably a mere influential objection than might be at first supposed, as it affords to those who regard the support of missions an onerous tax, which God has no right to levy, a specious apology for withholding in this particular case. But we apprehend the objection is the result of defective information on the subject. It seems to be taken for granted by a great many people, that because the mountains and valleys of California abound with the precious metal, a man has only to get there and get a claim in the mines, in order to be rich at once. Such people overlook the fact that getting gold is a very expensive operation, as well as a very uncertain one—that where one succeeds in growing rich at least twenty fail to clear expenses, and are a great deal worse off at the end of two or three years than when they first set foot on the auriferous soil. Thousands annually return home, after laboring two, three, or more years, with lighter pockets than when they started on their gold hunting expedition, and thousands more remain where they are, solely for lack of ability to get home.

And besides, admitting that a goodly number really grow rich, what proportion of this wealth is available for the Church? There is a vast amount of wealth yearly accumulating by the sugar planters or the cotton planters of the great Mississippi Valley; but how much of it is available for the M. E. Church, South? There is also no small measure of wealth in the city of New Orleans; yet what proportion of it can we control for Church purposes? The answer to these questions will be patent to every one who reads our annual missionary reports, or who attends our Annual Conferences and listens to the exhibits made by the preachers from the different stations, circuits and districts. And these reports, too, be it remembered, come from regions where Methodism has long been established, and from fields where the best talents of the Church have long been employed.

What, then, let me ask, can we reasonably expect from a region where the population is gathered from all lands, of all religions or of none—a people whose very gold seeking propensities or employments have tended to secularize them and render them indifferent to the gospel and skeptical as to religion itself, and whose infidel tendencies have been strengthened by hundreds of awful apostates, both among laymen and ministers, (a class with which California has been more awfully cursed than any other land on God's earth,) and who have for most of the time of their gold seeking been in a great measure excluded from the means of grace? No faithful man of God has sought them in their mining homes, to invite them to return to the God of their youth; or, if any wandering evangelist has sought them out, it has been but an occasional call. Can it be expected that such a people will feel the importance of the gospel and its institutions, and will give money sufficient to support the Church in her operations among them? And yet it is probable that the people of California, wherever they have the services of a faithful and efficient ministry among them, give as liberally towards sustaining the institutions of religion as an equal number in similar circumstances in the Atlantic States.

But the fact is, we must act towards the people of California as we have done to communities in similar circumstances at home. We must ply them with the gospel till they see and feel its importance, and then they will respond liberally to its support. And this result, though it may not arrive immediately, will certainly come in due time, if we are faithful in planting and tending the seed which we are commissioned to sow. Of this I can never doubt while I believe that Johovah reigns and CANNOT LIE.

I have heard a good deal of croaking about the wonderful things which the Church, South, has done for California, and the small returns which we have received for our tremendous investment. Perhaps it may be as well for us to inquire a little more definitely into this matter. We sent first into that field three brethren, who represented us there respectably. One of these left in a short time, in consequence of bad health, and has since passed away from the toils of earth to the glories of heaven. Another of them was sick for most of the time of some two years, leaving but one efficient man in the field. They appealed to us frequently and earnestly for help, but we were too prudent to risk any more so far from home till these had time to make full proof of their ministry. It was in vain that they urged the importance of promptness and speed in our attempts on California; that if we intended to occupy the country, we should immediately do so with a force sufficient to occupy every eligible point at once. We judged it very statesmanlike to pursue a sort of masterly inactivity, and wait for coming events.

We have waited, and those events have come. Many of those important points where we ought to have established churches at once, and where if we had done so we might now have had flourishing societies, have been occupied by others, and we are, to a great extent, shut out. At other points, where we made some effort, we have lost the ground by the spasmodic character of our efforts: one year we occupied, and the next abandoned; so that the people lost confidence in us. Or, it may be we have sent to important points inefficient preachers, for lack of more efficient ones, and have lost our congregations.

And this brings us to another cause of want of success. There has not always been sufficient discrimination in the selection of preachers for California. Many preachers who would do well at home, where they are surrounded by sterling Methodists and valuable local preachers, exhorters and class leaders, will fail in California, where none of these helps can be found; where the preacher has to be pastor, steward and class leader, and where the sight of a good, warm-hearted old Methodist brother, who will help him in his work, be class leader, help him in prayer meeting, and be active in other work, is a rare blessing.

A preacher suited for California must be a man deeply baptized with the Holy Ghost, devoted, with all his heart, to the Church and the work of God; willing to sacrifice much, yea, all for the cause of God, and then say but little about the much he has done and suffered for the cause of God. Withal, he should possess at least respectable preaching talents.

We need to-day, in that country, several men of the above type; and we want several men of age and well tried experience, who have fought through many a battle, who understand Methodism in its practical workings, and can train the younger men not to be scared at a few defeats, but to press the battle to the gate, depending implicitly on God, and resolved on victory.

August 4, 1855. JAMES O. ANDREW.

TEXAS CORRESPONDENCE.

SPRINGFIELD, LIMESTONE COUNTY, Aug. 6, 1855.

Mr. Editor—As we have seen no communication from this place describing the country, and as there are many readers of the Advocate looking westward for homes for their children, perhaps it would not be uninteresting to give them a short sketch.

This county might be called a fair average of Texas. The soil is generally of a yellow cast, and a little sandy, though none too much. It is very equally divided with prairie and timber—plenty of the finest post oak and other timber common to Texas on the uplands. On the Navasota River (a small stream running through the county) we have a fine quantity of cedars, fair quality.

The water is generally of the Limestone order, and hence the name of the county. We have not a very great number of springs, but by digging from 15 to 30 feet almost invariably get good water. The soil is adapted to the growing of corn, potatoes, &c. In fact, we can grow many of the Northern productions. On the black sandy soil wheat grows finely, but not equal to the Northern counties. We can raise only about 20 to 30 bushels per acre, whereas the Northern counties produce from 25 to 40 bushels, and that of the best quality. This day four wagon loads of the finest flour arrived at this place, and offers at $5 50 and $6 per hundred. We will not only soon produce our own flour, supplying all Texas, but if we had means of conveyance could help to supply the South generally, and at least a month earlier than it could be obtained from the North. This is also a fair grazing county. A man can have a thousand head of stock, and all that is required is to herd them. It is excellent for sheep growing.

Lands are now beginning to demand a fair price. A few years ago good land could have been bought for fifty cents per acre; now it demands from two to three dollars, and improved land from three to five.

This season we have made fine corn crops. Potatoes and other full vegetables had fair for a good harvest. For the last six weeks we have had the finest growing showers.

If any of the readers of the Advocate think of moving to Texas, they will find a country having many natural advantages, and also some disadvantages; but by industry a pleasant home can be made.

HOW WOMEN MAY PREACH.

A lady was about to leave home for a summer's residence by the sea shore. Before she started, she was impressed by a discourse which her pastor had delivered upon the "duty of preaching the gospel." He considered the subject with reference to the duty of private Christians to do "all that in them lay to spread far and wide the good tidings of salvation." He said that even females could preach the gospel; that they could induce their friends to accompany them to the sanctuary to hear the gospel, and in many ways, by religious counsel, by the presentation and loan of serious works, by the powerful auxiliary of a holy life, might preach the gospel. Now when our Christian lady reached Cape May, she cast in her mind how she should carry out her pastor's counsel. She found at her boarding house a young lady gifted with many excellent qualities of head and heart, but void of the chief grace of female character, without which the most lovely woman presents to the spiritual mind an unlovely, ungracious aspect. This young lady, "living in pleasure, was dead while she lived."

The Christian lady conversed seriously with her, and persuaded her to attend the church where she had been favored to hear the well remembered discourse, the spirit of which she was now endeavoring to carry into execution. Her gay friend followed her advice, became interested, and soon experienced that saving change without which the most amiable female must be forever banished into "utter darkness." She has now been for a number of years a devoted Christian, abounding in good works, and if there is a more useful Christian in the whole extent of the Union than this same once gay, thoughtless girl, we have yet to learn it.

Christian females, let this truthful incident stir you up to active effort for those whom you meet. Let each one who reads this say: "Do I know any whom I can lead to Christ?"

REVIVAL INTELLIGENCE.

MARION CIRCUIT, ALA. CONF., August 16, 1855.

In a meeting of sixteen days, God's power to save has been signally made known at Marion. Many were converted, numbers were reclaimed, and the members of the Church revived, encouraged and strengthened.

Thirty joined the Church, nineteen whites and eleven colored. Bro. McMeans and Bro Hays, the blind preacher, were present during the meeting and rendered most important aid.

Bro. McMeans' spirit-moving exhortations, and Bro. Hays' sweet and soul elevating singing, will not soon be forgotten by those who attended the meeting. Bro. McMeans has had several gracious revivals on his work and expects to have more; for wherever on the circuit a special effort has been made, God has revived his work.

The cloude that hung lowering over us at the first of the year are breaking in blessings on our heads. God alone be praised.

JACKSON CIRCUIT, LA. CONF., August 2, 1855.

On last Saturday we commenced a two days' meeting at Jones' School-House. This neighborhood had the unenviable reputation of caring less for religion than any other. It was styled the "Dark Corner." On Saturday morning we opened with a prayer meeting; four or five in attendance. At 11 Dr. Howell poured cannister into the enemy's forces; at 4, prayer meeting; at night, preaching. We continued to preach and pray until Sunday night without any apparent success; but then, thank God, the enemy began to waver; all at once, during an exhortation, conviction fell upon the people, and with great haste they sought the altar of prayer. The work was now commenced in good earnest. The benches were almost empty and sinners conquered. We continued for three days longer, deep sorrow being manifested by the penitents. But few were converted, though many were moved upon. One sister who found Jesus "fairest among ten thousand" rose shouting, "Saved from sin! saved from sin!" We consider this a victory. The very best state of feeling was exhibited until the meeting closed, and there were seventeen accessions to the Church. We have no doubt but that, if we had continued, many more souls would have been blessed. But for want of help we had to cease. The people have gone to work, resolved to build a good house. A Sunday School will be commenced next Sunday. The prospect is good here. May God assist them.

Bro. Moreland, my beloved senior, was at the same time holding a meeting in another part of the circuit. I have not heard the result. All over the circuit the signs are good. We will have no camp meeting, but I have no doubt we will make it up in protracted meetings. The people are anxious for them.

WARRIOR MISSION, ALA. CONF., August 9, 1855.

The Lord is reviving his work on the Warrior Mission. Including the fifth Sunday in July, there was a two days' meeting held at Five Mile, which was protracted for nine days. The meeting grew better at every appointment. The altar place was filled with anxious penitents. The Church was very small, so we had but little help from that quarter. It was a refreshing time to them. Sinners were powerfully convicted, and cried aloud for mercy. The conversions were clear. I think I can safely say I never have witnessed clearer manifestations of the power of God. On Sabbath evening I closed the meeting, leaving a crowd of mourners at the altar. There were twenty-five conversions. The prospect for a more thorough work upon the mission is quite flattering.

LOUISVILLE CIRCUIT, MISS. CONF., August, 1855.

Say to the friends of Zion we have had a glorious meeting on Louisville Circuit, at Zion Church. It embraced the fifth Sabbath in July and lasted nine days. It was a union meeting by the Methodists and the Cumberland Presbyterians. Truly we had a refreshing from the presence of the Lord. A revival among professors, and between ten and fifteen conversions.

TEXANA, TEXAS, July 20, 1855.

Revivals of religion are getting quite frequent in different parts of Texas. In the parts I am acquainted with there have been two camp meetings to my knowledge, with quarterly meetings, &c., where much good has been done. Many joined, and many professed to find the pearl of great price.

ROMANISM AND CRIME.

It is legitimate to judge a tree by its fruits. Adopting this standard, a most formidable argument is found against Popery. Its rule has been prolific of ignorance and vice. The statistics as to the relative proportion of crime in Papal and Protestant countries tell a gloomy tale as to the influence of Romanism. Crime seems to increase in a ratio almost precisely in accordance with the prevalence of the malign system. The number of convictions for murder in England are, for instance, in proportion of 4 to 1,000,000 of the population; in Ireland, sixteen years ago, they were as 33, and are now 19. In France, they are 31; in Austria, 36; in Bavaria, 68; in the Papal States, 113; in Naples, 174. The illigitimate births are in the same ratio, only in far greater proportion. Whereas, no sooner is Protestantism at all in the ascendant, than the proportion is again reversed. In the province of Galway, in Ireland, where the Irish Church Mission has been in operation, the criminal convictions were, in 1850, 404; in 1851, 399; in 1852, 218; and in 1853, 197. Less than half the accustomed number.

In New York during the week ending on the 11th inst., there were 502 deaths, being an increase of 18 from the week previous. Four-fifths of them were children.

THE TRACT CAUSE.

Mr. Editor—Permit me to speak to the ministers and members of the M. E. Church, South, in the bounds of the Alabama Conference, through the columns of the Advocate.

DEAR BRETHREN—Since my appointment to the Tract Agency I have not been idle, but to the best of my ability have labored to put forward the claims and promote the interests of this cause. But a little reflection will enable the brethren to see that I could not visit every circuit and station with Sabbath appointments in two years, and to give each important Church such a visit would perhaps take five years. What is then to be done? Why, simply this, that the preachers must, if they please, bring this matter before their congregations, and especially at camp meetings and protracted meetings, in every place where the Agent has not been or cannot be. I purpose, the Lord permitting, to spend a large portion of the month of September in the Talladega District, October in the Camden, and November in Eufaula, but by those visits I cannot see one-tenth of the people that ought to be seen on this subject. The brethren must help me, if they please. I am now detained at home on account of sickness in my family. My appointments in the Columbus District are falling through, and I fear the same fate for those in the Gainsville. This is grievous to me, for in a ministry of near twenty-six years I have never learned to miss my appointments.

This cause commends itself to all good and sensible men, because it proposes to furnish to every class of readers a cheap and gratuitous literature, overflowing with the pure streams of evangelism, for which Methodism is so famous. By such means hundreds have been awakened and established in the faith of the gospel of Christ.

Again, because if we—that is, Christians—do not preoccupy the ground, infidelity, with all its attendant evils, will overspread the land. The effort of the age is to educate the masses; the educated will read, and if they cannot get good books, they will read bad ones; and who can estimate the evils of one bad, corrupting book? Millions such are being published! Men and brethren, help! This is a work of faith, a labor of love. The is casting the bread upon the waters, to be found after many days.

Once more, will those who have subscribed at the different places where I have been pay us soon as possible? Will the preachers holding these subscriptions press their payment?

I am and shall continue to be your most obliged and obedient servant,

Summerfield, Aug 13, 1855. F. G. FERGUSON.

Miscellaneous News Items.

TELEGRAPHIC.—We are advised that on and after the 1st prox., the Washington and New Orleans line will increase its tariff of rates to all stations between here and New York, to the amount of two cents per word. With a competing line, working with far more regularity than itself, a more injudicious step could not be pursued. We can imagine no other object than a desire on the part of the directors to reduce the value of the stock in the line, and, perhaps, to kill its entire business prospects. The company also propose to insure messages at the rate of one per cent. on the monies involved in them, or any other amount that may be agreed upon, said rate of insurance in no case to be less than the price of the message itself; a proceeding which we suspect will cause much laughter in the community. The company must be demented.

PROCLAMATION BY THE MAYOR OF NORFOLK.—The Mayor of Norfolk issued the following proclamation on the 13th inst:

"It having been recommended to me by the Clergy, and numerous citizens of Norfolk, that an early day be set aside as a suitable occasion for prayer to the Almighty that He would look down upon the afflicted city with compassion, and in His infinite mercy stay the dreadful scourge that is prevailing to some extent at present in our midst;

Therefore I, Hunter Woodis, Mayor of Norfolk, deeming that such an observance is not only proper, but becoming a christian community, would set aside Friday (the 14th inst.) as a public day of penitence and prayer, and earnestly request my fellow citizens to pay all due respect to the same, and to suspend all business operations during its continuance."

RELIEF FOR NORFOLK.—A public meeting was held in New York, on the 16th ult., for the purpose of adopting measures for the relief of the sufferers at Norfolk, Portsmouth and Gosport.

HEALTH OF PHILADELPHIA.—The Philadelphia North American on this subject says:

The healthy condition of our city this season is a subject of sincere congratulation. We seriously doubt whether any city in America, taking the number of its population into consideration, can show such bills of mortality as our own. Yet this happy state of things should only render us thoughtful, and induce us to adopt necessary precautions to preserve so great blessings throughout. Care and moderation in the consumption of fruit are essential to our safety. The mortality among children is to be expected during this season. Hundreds of the dearly beloved first-born will be swept away before the summer heat is over, leaving behind bright but short memories, that will continue to haunt parents like glimpses of angel wings.

The steamship Star of the South, built for the trade between this city and New York, and which was sent to England a short time since, has been chartered by the British Government as a transport to the Crimea. The French Government has now employed as transports, sixteen of the largest size of American vessels, including the ship Great Republic, of 3 421 tons; Monarch of the Seas, 2 359 tons (this vessel was in our port a few months ago, and carried 6000 bales from here); Queen of Clippers, 2,135 tons; Constitution Herald, 2 135 tons. The steamship Wm. Penn, which was formerly a packet in our trade, is also under charter to the French government and has been since the commencement of the war.

DR. CONE ILL.—We regret to learn that the Rev. Dr. Cone, of the First Baptist Church in this city, was prostrated by a paralytic stroke on Friday morning last. His medical advisers do not deem his life in danger, though the attack precludes him from seeing any but his family. The least intellectual exertion on his part is absolutely forbidden by the attending physicians. He remained in the same state yesterday morning as on Friday. [N. Y. Tribune, 14th Aug.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS CONVENTION.—We learn from the N. Y. Express that a Women's Rights Convention assembled at Saratoga on the 15th inst., and resolutions of the usual stamp were passed. Among the principal speakers were Mrs. Rev. Antoinette Brown and T. H. Higginson.

Among the distinguished visitors at the White Sulphur Springs, Va., are John Van Buren, of New York; ex Attorney-General Nelson, of Maryland; Major McCullough, the celebrated Texan Ranger, like Marshal Ney, "bravest of the brave," etc. Ex-President Tyler and family were expected in a few HEALTH OF BATON ROUGE.—The Comet, of 21st inst., says:

Within the past few days, there has been a decided change in this city, and we regret to say that the type of fever is of the character of the usual epidemic of this season. It requires prompt attention, and when it occurs among the most negroes and the poorer class of our fellow-citizens, we fear the parties do not take that care, which is imperatively demanded, to check the tendency of the disease to assume the form of an epidemic. However, the noble bands of brothers and fellows, the Masons and the Odd Fellows, attend promptly to cases that have fraternal claims upon them; and, as usual, we meet many of our benevolent fellow-citizens of both sexes, anxious to do all they can, by individual efforts, to make the afflicted comfortable and to provide for them.

CUSTOM-HOUSE DIVISION—General Permit Goods.—Merchants receiving frequent importations may, to obviate the inconveniences which would be felt in giving the penal bond prescribed by the fourth section of the act of the 28th of July, 1850, for each importation, give one bond in the sum of $20,000, with sufficient sureties, conditioned for the faithful performance of the requirements of the said act, during a period not exceeding twelve months.

In each case, it is the duty of the collectors to see that the security provided by the bond is financial with regard to the pecuniary ability of the obligors. Great care is required to be taken by the collectors and other officers of the customs in the proceedings in the importations, so as to insure beyond doubt the sufficiency of the bond, should the United States be compelled to resort to it. [Washington Union, 10th inst.

POISONING OF A FAMILY BY A SERVANT GIRL.—On Wednesday last the family of Mr. James H. Armstrong, residing on Freeman street, near the upper terminus, was poisoned by a servant girl, who is supposed, named Catherine Bryant. It appears that this girl had been receiving the attentions of an individual whose character Mr. Armstrong did not regard as good, and who, in consequence was ordered by Mr A. to stay away from the house. The following morning, after breakfast, two children belonging to the family were taken sick, and afterwards both Mr and Mrs Armstrong. A physician was called for, who caused a chemical anelization to be made of the coffee, which was found to contain a portion of arsenic. The girl had not partaken of breakfast that morning, assigning as a trivial reason for not doing so. When it was discovered that the coffee had been poisoned, the room was searched, and a druggist's label was found marked "poison." During the excitement attending the sickness, the girl left the house, and has not since been seen. [Cincinnati Commercial, 12th inst.

SUICIDE BY TAKING PRUSSIC ACID.—An inquest was held yesterday upon the body of a man named ——— Husband, residing at the corner of Canal and Hermitage street, who committed suicide at 10 o'clock yesterday morning, by swallowing a bottle of prussic acid. The act was perpetrated in the presence of a friend of the deceased, to whom he said, "Good luck, Tom," as he was in the act of putting the deadly drug to his mouth. As a matter of course, death was instantaneous. The cause assigned for the rash act of the deceased had of late, resulting in his separating from his wife and going to New Orleans, where she now resides. The jury rendered a verdict of death "by suicide." [N. Orleans Herald, Aug. 16.

GOLD ROBBERY.—One of the most barefaced and impudent robberies ever perpetrated in this city was committed at an early hour on Tuesday morning upon the person of Dr Oliver Goss. The Doctor was sitting in the front of his house on the steps, when he was approached by a stranger in a familiar way. After a little conversation, the stranger took a seat by the side of Dr Hollies, and after sitting for a considerable time left. The Doctor went into the house and when he attempted to draw his watch from his pocket to see the time, discovered that his gold guard ribbon guard having been cut without his knowledge. He then examined his pockets, and discovered the loss of a wallet containing about two hundred dollars. The robbery was adroitly effected, and no idea is had who the party is, nor could a proper description be given of his person, owing to the darkness of the evening. [Balt. American, Aug 16.

ACCOUNTABLE.—According to a letter received in Lynchburg, from a highly respectable man, says the Virginian, a neighborhood not far from Scottsville has been thrown into great excitement and consternation by the following remarkable phenomenon: About 12 o'clock every day rocks commence falling and flying in every direction around a certain negro quarter, and continues until about 4 o'clock in the evening. The negroes have, in consequence, all fled from the houses. A party of gentlemen have left Scottsville to investigate the matter. A letter who had been present vouches for the accuracy of the statement. [Richmond Whig, Aug. 17.

GUANO A PREVENTIVE OF YELLOW FEVER

A correspondent of the Norfolk Herald suggests that guano be tested as a preventive of yellow fever. He gives the following as the reason of his suggestion:

I take leave now to state a fact which was related to me by Capt H. H. Cocke, U. S. N., whilst he was in command of the sloop-of-war St. Louis, on the coast of Brazil, during the awful ravage of yellow fever there some years back. He stated to me that the crews of the merchant vessels were swept off in the most awful manner, and every ship of war in Rio, save the St. Louis, shared the same fate; and she, if my memory holds good, did not lose a soul. This he attributed solely to a quantity of guano he had purchased for his own farm, as an experiment when the returned home. There was not more than one or two barrels of it, and such was his faith in it as a preventive, that he had it slued about on the berth deck of the ship.

We direct the particular attention of our Board of Health to the foregoing significant paragraph. Maybe there's something in it! Who knows? Heretofore, cleanliness in person and premises, streets, alleys, by-ways, etc., with frequent and regular sprinklings of chloride of lime, and other disinfectants, have been relied upon to secure health; but as the cleanliness of Natchez and Mobile did not save them in 1853 from as bad a visitation of the yellow fever as we had, as the city was as filthy then as it could possibly be, as it has "got an better list" over since, and as we are now both dirty and sickly, suppose the experiment be tried and the city guanoed forthwith!

Guano is a filthy substance—but if it will save life and arrest the progress of a terrible disease, all the power (perfume) of the article should at once be brought to bear! What a wonderful substance. Fertilize sand-hills and kill the yellow fever at the same time. Then, again, it could be so conveniently handled. It could be put up in bags of any size, and appropriately distributed throughout any house; and, if a patient was very low—suppose he had the black vomit, for instance—to effect a cure it would only be necessary to fill his bolsters and pillow-cases with guano, or if deemed proper, remove the blankets and cover him with it entirely. No respectable Yellow Jack could stand such treatment, and would, as a matter of course, incontinently "vamose the ranche."

Then, again, to look at the matter in another point of view, this guano remedy may lead to the abolition of quarantines, the Board of Health, and all other cumbrous and expensive machinery. If the discovery be well founded, there is nothing necessary to do to keep the yellow fever out of New Orleans than to build a rampart of guano all around the city! A wall, ten feet high, would suffice to keep out all foreign epidemics and enemies, we imagine. There would be no necessity for another Andrew Jackson to protect the city against the onslaught of all christendom. Cronstadt and Sebastopol would be nowhere so far as one sort of strength was concerned!

What would become of the people inside the fortification, we cannot pretend to say, and never expect to know from personal experience, as we shall leave before the first section of the wall is completed; but as a distinguished physician said, in 1853, that filth did not aggravate yellow fever, we suppose they will be enabled to get along "after a fashion." If not, it will be their misfortune, not their fault.

OHIO AND MISSISSIPPI RAILROAD.—We learn from the St. Louis Republican that the Directors of this Company have resolved upon a plan by which they hope to get the road out of some if not all its difficulties. The plan is to lease the road to Mr. Geo. W. Jonks. The conditions of this lease are set forth at great length, but their scope may be inferred from the following statement: The lease is to run for fifteen years. Mr. Jenks binds himself to put the road in first rate condition for business, and to keep and maintain it in that condition during the lease. During the next five years he is to expend at least $500,000 in railing stock and structures for the road, and is to pay, semi-annually, the interest on the first and second mortgage bonds issued by the Company. After the expiration of the first five years, he is to pay to the Company, in addition to what is named above, the sum of $25,000 per annum. And at the expiration of the lease he is to surrender to the Company all that he has added to the property of the road without payment therefor.

HOME PROTECTION.—Under this head the Richmond Dispatch of the 15th says:

The amount of $150,000 is annually spent by the city of Richmond in the purchase of Northern boots and shoes. Would it not be wiser to establish southern manufactories on a scale commensurate with our wants, and thus build up our own city, and save the sum annually sent to Northern boot and shoemakers; all of whom, in Massachusetts at least, are probably Abolitionists?

A New York merchant, largely interested in the shoe trade, estimates the value of shoes annually sent to the Southern States, from New York alone, at five millions of dollars! It is believed that Philadelphia and Boston send as many more.

Why should not the South make her own shoes and save this ten millions?

VACANT HOUSES.—The Baltimore American of the 10th ult. says:

There never were probably more vacant houses in the city than at this time, but they are generally of the larger class and high rents. It is particularly the case in the twentieth ward where nearly all the houses erected have been of the character in question. Several years ago the demand for the better class of houses in this section of the city was more than equal to the supply, which caused many persons to build, until many are now vacant, and there is no inquiry for them. The same is the case in other sections of the city, while there is but few small houses to be found unoccupied anywhere. There is a great number of small houses in the city but they all seem to be occupied, and there is still a demand for more. Those houses lying idle are held at rents ranging from three hundred to five hundred dollars, and there seems to be no probability of their being taken, as many have been completed for several months without a tenant.

MORE AID FOR THE SUFFERERS.—Up to 12 o'clock Wednesday, the 15th inst., the sum of $2,100 had been collected in Petersburg, Va., for the sufferers in Portsmouth.

A meeting of the citizens of Lynchburg was held on Wednesday, the 15th inst., to devise means for aiding the sufferers in Norfolk and Portsmouth.

We clip the following from the N. Y. Evening Mirror, of the 14th August:

A little more rain would be acceptable just now, but the crops are past harm, and the grass is not suffering. Now flour is beginning to pour into the lake ports, and will be here in abundance in a week or two. So plentiful a harvest, in everything, has not before blessed our country. The speculators and forestallers cannot long keep the benefits of it from the people.

AID TO THE SUFFERERS IN PORTSMOUTH AND NORFOLK.—We learn from the Richmond Dispatch of the 15th inst. that at a meeting held in Petersburg $1000 was subscribed for the above purpose, and it is expected that the sum would reach double that amount in a day or two.

BURGLARY.—On Sunday night the front door of the residence of James M. Elam, Esq., was forced open. The burglar went into the bedroom of Mr. Elam, rifled his pockets of the money they contained, and then made good his escape. There was lately been several attempts at burglery in the lower end of town. [Baton Rouge Comet, Aug. 21.

Local Sketches.

A MODEL POLICE OFFICER.—We have one in New Orleans—a fact. Not that we have not an abundance of policemen who are all that mortals can be in the arduous duty of night-patrolling; but there are none so universally exempt from the frailties of humanity, as the one we have under consideration. He is to be found in the Second District—has long been connected with the police of that section. Let us enumerate those facts in his history, which entitle him to the name of the Model Police Officer:

1. He has never slept on his beat.
2. He has never got drunk and reported himself sick.
3. He has never arrested the whipped man in a fight.
4. He has never accepted a bribe.
5. He has never suffered himself to become the special guardian of any brothel, groggery, or other haunt of dissipation.
6. He has never meddled with any election.
7. He has never asked a cent for his services, or any compensation whatever.

Now, good reader, you will probably be pleased to hear his name; and you will doubtless be somewhat surprised to learn that the possessor of the above catalogue of virtues owns to no other or better name than the plebeian epithet of LOAFER. A fact, odd as it may seem.

Loafer, however, is not an ordinary officer. He does not belong to that "leather-head" fraternity who hold up unwing-posts, thwack the curbs with their resonant shillelaghs, or shake their rattles at lights in the sky. No, sir; Loafer is a roundsman; has always been such, and never expects to be any thing else. Loafer is, in short, not a human, or a biped of any kind, but is a quadruped—a quadruped of the canine species—briefly, a dog. A fatherless, ownerless, cosmopolitan dog; a dog of no particular breed; who puts on no airs about his ancestry.

What it was that induced Loafer to volunteer his services to this great and wealthy corporation, is not definitely known. He has never taken anybody into his confidence, and keeps his secrets to himself with the gravity of true wisdom. We, however, think we can explain the matter. We have left his head, looked into his eye, and observed his demeanor generally.

His department is that of a blended modesty and dignity, overcast with a shade of melancholy bordering upon misanthropy. He shrinks at the approach of no one; passively endures patting, whistling, and other canine compliments, without ever vouchsafing a smile, a kind look, or even a wag of his tail in return. He acknowledges no particular watchman or superior officer, or any living being as his particular master or protector; but seems to consider himself a sort of Child of the Regiment—the Dog of the Leatherheads. The Mayor, or the Chief of Police, is not a greater personage to him than the humblest supernumerary.

Loafer became known to the police in his youth. He was observed to saunter about the streets at night, always keeping in the vicinity of some watchman or other, in a friendly but not familiar way; circling about him, without ever pretending to see him, and following him to the police-office in the same careless manner in the morning. On another night, he would accompany some other policeman in the same way. Thus he soon became known; was dubbed "Loafer;" and many a watchman, anxious for some kind of company during his lonely nocturnal tramps, endeavored to secure his exclusive affection and patronage; but the such endeavors ever succeeded. Quite the contrary, he is to say, private citizens have endeavored to decoy him, with the same ill-success.

After a short apprenticeship Loafer became imbued fully with the spirit of his calling, and lent his services, so far as he was capable, to the general welfare. When a watchman would spring his rattle, Loafer would open his usually quiet throat, and rush bellowing in the direction of the alarm. In a little while more he began to understand the fire bells, and would sound his alarm accordingly. And these things he does to this day, never opening his throat on any other occasion, save when he devours the frugal meals given him by the negro at the guard-house. Loafer has seen some political changes in his day; but he has never heeded them, having a soul above politics. Whether the watchmen be foreign or native, it is all the same to him. It is not the man that he follows; only the leather cap, club and rattle.

Loafer takes but little sleep—a mere philosophical nap, in a corner of the jail yard. He generally rises with a yawn and a prolonged stretch; takes a drink at the hydrant; goes into the Recorder's office, looks around gravely for a few moments, and, seeing that the current of justice is in proper flow, betakes himself off for day duty with any officer who may be going out.

With this general insight into Loafer's character, our readers will agree with us, that the keystone of his philosophy, the mainspring of his action, the pole-star of his existance, is to be found in one simple little word—SAUSAGES. Poisoned sausages, if you please. Loafer, finding himself thrown upon his own resources at an early age, in the midst of an unfeeling world, speedily appreciated his position, and marked out a line of future action. Nobody would adopt him; he was too honorable to become a thief or a skulk; and foreseeing that he would sooner or later die the death of the rest of his unhappy family—viz: by a nocturnal saueage, presented to him in a moment of hunger—he resolved to avert such a fate, by becoming one of those who administer the fatal morsels. And he has succeeded. He still lives, and walks nightly by the disteuded corpses of his unlucky thick-headed relatives. He feels the injustice of this war of extermination upon his tribe, and hence his imperviousness to human kindness or flattery. He contributes his services to the city for the privilege of living; and there the bargain ends. It is needless to say that he is safe. Despite his dignified reserve, the watchmen all love him, and any one of them would as soon think of offering a sausage to his only son as to Loafer.

Until recently, Loafer was not without a spice of gaiety, or at least of sporting spirit. In common with many of his kind, he confessed to a strong appetite for cats; or at least believed that house and fences were made for cats, and the streets for dogs. His enforcement of this idea has made him a terror to all the cats of the Second District. He was good at chasing, but bad at holing, on account of his size. He therefore associated to himself a little protege of a dog that he picked up somewhere; this dog was instantly recognized by the police, and dubbed "Loafer Junior." Loafer Sr. found it particularly delightful to scare up the felines and send the Junior after them, up alleys and into holes too small for his own corporosity. But, alas! a week or two since, the Junior fell a victim to his greenness. He ate a sausage intended for some other dog, and died. Since then, Loafer has hung his head, and let the cats alone—an actual fact, attested to us by half a dozen policemen. He continues his duty as a roundsman, however, but with a quiet, unhappy air which shows that he does it not from any particular friendship for the human family, but from the instinct of self-preservation—for the privilege of breathing, eating and seeing in this fickle world of ours.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMER PACIFIC.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

THE BOMBARDMENT RENEWED.

Other Places Bombarded, etc.

BY THE NATIONAL AND SOUTHERN LINES.

NEW YORK, August 22.—The Collins steamship Pacific, Capt. Nye from Liverpool on Saturday, the 11th inst. arrived at this port.

Her advices are one week later from all parts of Europe.

The steamship Arago from New York for Havre, arrived off Southampton on the 10th inst.

The news from the seat of war is unimportant.

Liverpool Cotton Market.

Messrs. Dronsdon & Co. quote the Liverpool Cotton market steady at prices without change since the departure of the America.—

The sales of the week were 34,020 bales, of which 3000 bales were to speculators. The sales of Friday were 12,000 bales, the market closing steady at the following quotations: Fair Orleans 7d., Middling Orleans 6 3-16 Fair Mobiles 6 7-8d. Middling Mobiles 6 to 6 1-16d. Fair Uplands 6 7-8d. and Middling Uplands 6 to 6 1-16d. Fair Alabama 6 7-8d. and Middling Alabama 6 per lb. The stock in port was estimated at 611,000 bales, of which 411,000 bales were American.

Breadstuffs.

Messrs. Brown, Shipley & Co. quote breadstuffs considerably lower, with the exception of Indian Corn; and quote Western Canal Flour at 38 to 40 s; Ohio Flour 42 to 43-6d per barrel; White Wheat 11s 9d to 12s. and Red Wheat 10 to 11s 3d per bushel, White Corn 32 to 34s 6d; Yellow Corn 30 6d to 33s, and Mixed Corn 28 6d to 30s per quarter.

Provisions.

The Brokers' circular quotes lard dull at unchanged prices, viz: 54 to 55s per cwt.

Money Console.

The London money market was quite stringent. Consols for money were quoted at 91.

The War.

The news by the Pacific presents no feature of importance.

The bombardment of Sebastopol was resumed by the Allies on the 10th inst.

Taganrog and Berdeousk had been bombarded by the Allied fleet.

It was reported that Revel had also been successfully bombarded.

Spain.

It was stated that a Legitimist conspiracy, favorable to Russia, had been discovered in Spain.

Further News by the Pacific.

NEW YORK, August 22.—The Pacific reached her dock at 6 o'clock this morning, during a dense fog, which defeated the intention of a public reception to Madame Rachel, who was a passenger.

The War.

Omar Pasha has been appointed General-in-Chief of the Turkish troops in Asia.

The seige of Kars continues without definite result.

The report in Paris that Revel had been successfully bombarded, probably originated in the assemblage of the Allied fleet in the Baltic, with the supposed immediate intention of attacking Helsingfors.

France.

The French Government has issued an inflated account of a conspiracy of Legitimists in Spain, to excite an insurrection in France, and thereby further the ends of Russia.

Spain.

It is now definitely stated, though still considered doubtful, that Spain will furnish a contingent of 25,000 troops for the war, who are to be paid by France and England.

Portugal.

Portugal, it is also said, will furnish 10,000 men in the same manner.

Italy.

The Italian General Pepe is dead.

Additional Commercial News.

American stocks were steady at unchanged prices since the departure of the America.

The weather in England had been favorable for agricultural purposes.

In the London market, iron was in active demand, and prices were buoyant. Bar was quoted at £8, and rail at £8 to £8 5s. per ton; pig was at 74s. per ton. Sugar and Coffee were steady.

The bullion in the Bank of England had decreased £130,000.

Freights were steady at unchanged rates.

LATER FROM HAVANA.

We have dates from Havana to the 11th inst.

The cholera was raging with great violence among the soldiers and negroes. Fifty hospitals had been established.

River Intelligence.

LOUISVILLE, August 22.—The river is falling, with 6 feet water in the canal. The steamer Indiana left yesterday for New Orleans.

WEATHER AND CROPS.—The Van Buren (Ark.) Intelligencer gives favorable accounts of the crops in the Indian country and on the Arkansas frontier.

The Shreveport South-Western states that in that parish they have had heavy showers of rain, which will prove very beneficial to the young cotton.

The Natchitoches Chronicle says that the planters in that section are busily engaged in picking cotton, and that, from all appearances, the crop will be an average one. Corn enough for home consumption has not been grown.

From the Caddo Gazette we learn that the weather has been pleasant; rain has fallen in abundance and the crops are doing well.

The San Antonio (Texas) Sentinel says that the crops generally in that vicinity look flourishing. The farmers are confident new of making average crops.

The Feliciana Democrat says that they have showers almost daily and that the planters are busy picking cotton.

From the Point Coupee Echo of the 18th, we clip the following:

Visiting, a short time since, both the upper and lower portions of our parish, we had an opportunity of seeing the condition of the crops. On the Atchafalaya they are looking finely, and rarely have we seen such crops of cotton. Sufficient rains had fallen to greatly benefit both the corn and cotton, and the yield of the former has been larger than anticipated.

On the Grosse Tete, we are sorry to say, the rot has made its appearance on some of the places, but not to any considerable extent. Quite a number of the planters have commenced making their cotton, and some of them, in gathering their corn find that they have made more than they have room for. Those who, on account of the drouth, were compelled to plow up their first crop and replant, have succeeded remarkably well. Too second crop is looking extremely well and promises a yield superior to that planted several months previous.

COTTON.—The receipts of cotton yesterday, up to six o'clock, P. M., were by the steamer Princess, 2250 bales, and W. P. Swiney, 277 bales; total, 2527 bales, of which 1950 bales are reported of this season's growth.

The following are the receipts of new cotton, so termed, from the time of the first bale up to the first of September of each year:

1845,	received previous to 1st September,	6846 bales.

The Frederick correspondent of the Baltimore American says:

I learn with regret that the "Monocacy Flouring Mill," belonging to Mr. S. C. Delaplaine, situate near Buckeystown, about seven miles from this city, was destroyed by fire last night. There was a large quantity of grain (mostly wheat) in the mill at the time, besides flour, which was mostly destroyed.

This was one of the finest and most extensive mills in our country. There was a partial insurance on the mill and contents, but to what extent I have not been informed. It is not yet ascertained how the fire originated.

Foreign News.

LATER BY THE STEAMSHIP AMERICA.

The Royal mail steamship America, Capt Lang, left Liverpool on the afternoon of the 4th inst., and arrived at Halifax on the afternoon of the 15th inst. The following items we clip from a telegraph to the New York Courier and Enquirer, dated Halifax, August 15th:

The America reports on the 13th inst., 9 P. M., passed a steamer bound East.

The America left Halifax at 5:45 this evening, and will be due at Boston at an early hour on Friday morning, so that her mails will probably reach New York on the afternoon of that day.

The steamship Union left Southampton for New York on the 8th inst.

The North Star arrived off Cowes on the afternoon of the 21, en route for Havre.

The Siege of Sevastopol.

A French despatch, dated July 20th, says: "Our approaches on the side of the Malakoff advance considerably. We now touch the place. Everything is prepared for a general action in about fifteen days."

July 21st.—General Simpson telegraphs: "Cholera has nearly disappeared. The Russians continue to hold their strong position on the Mackenzie, and the strong range of heights overlooking Urkusta and the valley of Baidar. It is reported that they have also a force of artillery and infantry at Alushka. The French have pushed forward the whole of their cavalry into the valley of Baidar, resting the battalions upon the left bank of the Somboi river, and communicating with the French upon the Tchernaya, whilst the high ridge protecting Balaklava is guarded by the Turkish army."

The Times correspondent writes: "Stagnation seems to reign in the camp and trenches; even the heavy firing has died away, yet the approaches advance, and every day sees the Allies nearer the crest of the Malakoff, which it will now require all the tenacity of the Russians to hold. A few days since the Russians succeeded in establishing rifle pits in front of the French cap."

Between the 23d and 27th nothing of importance occurred.

July 28th—Gortschakoff telegraphs: "Yesterday the enemy opened a heavy fire, which lasted two hours, against the Flagstaff Bastion. We replied with vigor."

The Latest.

Advices from the Crimea to the 29th announce continued preparations for a grand expedition. All the lighter vessels of the fleet were assembled at Kamiesch.

It was reported in Paris on the 3d instant, that the French Government had official notification that the bombardment of the Malakoff and Redan had been resumed, preparatory to another assault.

July 30.—Gortschakoff telegraphs: "There has been a partial cannonade on both sides, but nothing of importance."

It was telegraphed from Constantinople, on the 25th, that the Bashi-Bozouks had murdered Gen. Beatson, but Lord Palmure, in Parliament, positively contradicts the report.

Correspondence from the Camp says, "that Omar Pacha's visit to Constantinople was not, as asserted, to resign, but to consult with reference to accepting the command of the army in Asia."

The Viceroy of Egypt is negotiating with the Bedouins to serve in the Crimea.

Kamiesh and Balaklava were crowded with vessels recently arrived for the secret expedition. The French Government has chartered seventy-nine small steamers for river navigation, each to convey five hundred men. The boats belong to companies on the Rhone and Saone.

Great Britain.

The Queen had sent the following message to the House of Commons: "Her Majesty deeming it expedient to provide for any additional expense that may arise in consequence of the war in which Her Majesty is now engaged with the Emperor of Russia, relying on her experience of the zeal of her faithful Commons, trust they will make provisions accordingly."

The result of this appeal is a proposal from the Chancellor of the Exchequer to issue £7,000,000 additional exchequer bills.

The limited liabilities bill had been read a third time and passed. Numerous estimates had been voted.

Major Reed's motion that no peace treaty should be concluded without the approval of Parliament was ridiculed and thrown out.

The Turkish Loan bill had been read the first time.

A discussion, without result, had occurred respecting the recent gift of a good service pension to Lord Paget over other officers.

The London Times had an editorial on Consul Roweroft's arrest, and preaches in favor of preserving friendly relations with America.

Milnor Gibson, in Parliament, referred to this editorial, and asked the Government to furnish information on the very important subject of the neutrality of the United States.

Lord Palmerston replied that an arrangement had existed at Halifax by which persons going there from any quarter whatever might be enrolled, but it appearing that it led to questions whether or not the laws of the United States had been violated, the British Government being desirous that no such questions should by possibility arise, has put an end to the enlistment of forces at Halifax.

The inquiry into the recent Hyde Park riots is terminated, and the Commissioners have requested time to consider their report.

Strachan, the bankrupt banker, has been released on bail.

France.

The official report in regard to the loan shows three thousand six hundred millions of francs, six times the amount asked for.

The report of the Minister of Finance describes the loan as the most surprising financial operation ever effected in any country.

The number of subscribers to the loan is three hundred and ten thousand.

The Correctional Tribunal is occupied in the trial of fifty-five prisoners of the secret society called "Marianna."

A brother of the assassin Pianori has been arrested in Jersey.

Spain

The rumors that Spain will send a contingent force to the Crimea are doubtful.

Spain would ask for territorial guarantees, as Sardinia did, which guarantees must include Cuba. It is thought probable, however, that a foreign legion will be recruited in Spain.

French intrigue has broken off the projected marriage of Adelbert, of Bavaria, with the Spanish princess.

Austria.

Archduke Charles Louis has been appointed Governor of the Tyrol.

Germany.

The King has dissolved the Second Chamber of the Hanoverian Diet.

Italy.

The statement that the King of Naples begged for the presence of Austrian troops, is contradicted.

Our Liverpool correspondent has private accounts from Lombardy, and especially from Venice, indicating that important events are nearly ripe.

The rumor is current that France has notified its readiness to suppress insurrectionary movements.

The East

The details of Indian news are published to June 26th.

Profound peace reigns in India, and commercial prospects are again more favorable.

There is no material improvement in the advices from China. The reverses of the insurgents were considered but temporary.

The frigate Vaudalia sailed from Meaille June 2d.

The Very Latest

LONDON, Saturday, Aug. 4, noon.—The Weekly Newspaper, just issued, says: "We learn that the siege of Sevastopol is about to be raised. Also, that a communication has just been received from Germany by the Western Powers which may lead to startling results."

The Sea of Azoff

Letters are to the 16th July. Magazines along the coast were being destroyed, as found, and small steamers were engaged in surveying. The Allied fortifications were progressing.

Asia

The accounts from Asia Minor are contradictory. The Russians are asserted to have suspended operations against Kars and Erzeroun, and to be retiring; but this is considered very doubtful.

TRIBUTE OF RESPECT TO MR. PETERS

The Board of School Directors of the First District held an informal meeting last evening, and on motion of Mr. N. R. Jennings, unanimously adopted the following appropriate tribute to the late SAMUEL J. PETERS:

WHEREAS Death has recently removed from the community a citizen whose public and private general energy not only contributed to the prosperity of our city as a commercial metropolis, but also enshrined her reputation as the patron of a liberal system of public instruction; and whereas this district, as successor of the late Second Municipality in which service he was so long and honorably engaged, is now enjoying the fruits of that enlightened policy which, sustained by the talented Joshua Baldwin and others, first laid the foundation of our happily surviving; be it, therefore,

Resolved, That in the decease of SAMUEL J. PETERS, the friends of public education regret the loss of one of its most ardent advocates and the public schools of New Orleans, and especially those of the First District, of a judicious and constant friend, a man who in private enterprises and anxious interest in their prosperity and by his public acts manifested his consistent and unwearied devotion to the cause of education, even at this time, when the increase of population and heavy taxation would inordinately encourage the greatest zeal and happiness of the community and promote the permanency of our republican institutions.

Resolved, That the heirs of science, literature and the arts, still equally mourn the decease of the enlightened legislator who, by his unexcelled efforts in establishing the Public School System and Library society, and by watchful care of its interests displayed his deep appreciation of the beneficent and humanizing influence of the new science and his unwavering faith in the precepts:

"Ingenuas didicisse fideliter artes,
Emollit mores, nec sinit esse feros."

Resolved, That while we condole with the surviving members of the family, and sincerely regret that he has been taken from his sphere of usefulness in the vigor of the age, we may also express satisfaction to know that the results of his long life, rich in the fruits of intelligent and well-directed labor, will remain as an enduring monument to his memory.

Be it further resolved, That the Library shall be attired in appropriate garbs of mourning for thirty days, in honor of the deceased, and that a copy of the foregoing resolutions be transmitted to his family.

This shows an increase over the previous week of 104 in the total number of deaths, and 103 in the deaths by yellow fever. It was in the corresponding week of 1853 that the greatest number of deaths occurred in that memorable year. So far as we can learn, the fever is now almost at a stand.

WHAT OUGHT TO BE DONE WITH SUCH A MAN.—Day before yesterday a poor man named Green, who had rented and furnished for himself and wife, a room of two in a house on Rampart street, died of yellow fever. He had been oppressed by hard times, when in health and his sickness threw him helpless with his resources. Yesterday he was buried, by a subscription taken up among the sympathizing neighbors. The poor widow went to the funeral and when she returned with a heavy heart to weep in her loneliness, she found her room torn of furniture; everything had been seized by her landlord, without legal authority, and carried off to another house, for which the rent was due him. Some of the neighbors saw him begin the dirty work, as soon as the funeral was out of sight. The thing very naturally excited considerable excitement; the widow was allowed to have him arrested for larceny—for it was a larceny, in the very common kind—and she consented. Yesterday he was tried, by a jury empanelled from among the sympathizing neighbors. The poor widow went in

TO MY SISTER EMILY.

BY JOHN PLEASANTS COTTRELL.

As the purple night-fall closes
Round thy chamber soft and fair,
Thou are turning room wearey
Through thy darkly flowing hair.
Over thy shoulders white and stately
They have thrown the bridal veil;
And thy cheek, so ruthless lately,
Blushes now, and now grows pale.

Him they laid thee, sweetly blushing,
Like some bright, bedecked star,
Through her gossamer draperies flushing
Radiance round the Heaven afar;
Yes, they laid thee to thine Idol—
To his brave and manly side;
And a mortal, at a bridal,
Never claimed a brighter bride.

Vowing to be thine completely
Until death the bond shall part;
Then thine own low voice falls sweetly
On thy lover's listening heart!
But the primal words are ended,
And the solemn rite told,
While the hairs of love have blended
In one chain of precious gold.

Would that I were near to bless thee
And to breathe one earnest prayer;
Would that I too might caress thee,
As the friends who mingle there.
But, alas! my lips would falter,
Ere they breathed one tender tone;
And mine eyes would stain the altar—
Stain with tears the altar-stone!

SONG OF THE MECHANIC.

The hum of a thousand wheels in our ear,
Like some old prophetic song;
The grace of a power, as if burdened with care;
The tramp of the iron-horse, faster than air,
And his thundering snort heard everywhere,
'Tis but the symphony that o'er
Accompanies their song.

Men of the brawny arm are we,
Men not ashamed of labor;
Through nobels may sometimes veil our face,
Only labor shows through to nobles and chase
Our shadows from their pathway.

We are the men who forge the bars
That imprison town and sea,
Where captives rushing through the vale—
Our children, racing with the gale—
Are shouting loudly!

The mighty ship that proudly rides
Over the restless deep,
Was reared by us. Her noiseless wings
Bend to the evening breeze that sings,
And wafts her home sleep.

The Press—that throbbing heart where beats
The pulse of every thought;
That shock of mind which strikes the hour
And a nation rises in its power—
Without our aid is naught.

The pen which, dipped in lightning, writes
As one stroke round the earth,
Never shield by mountain nor the river,
Or where bread face the sun-beams quiver,
Owes to our hand its birth.

Then thoughts make gladness in our hearts
Dancing like a bell at play,
And like her voice who waits to greet us,
Or heads our little child to meet us,
More sweet than we may tell.

Then let the joyous song be heard,
Let all be filled with mirth,
Let it be known throughout the land
That the members of our iron band
Are the happiest on earth.

The sound that lingers in our ear,
Like some old prophetic song;
Is but the orchestra that o'er
Accompanies their song.

How Mr. Sparrowgrass went down Stairs.

One evening Mrs. S. had retired and I was busy writing, when it struck me that a glass of ice water would be palatable. So I took a candle and a pitcher and went down to the pump. Our pump is in the kitchen. A country pump in the kitchen is more convenient; but a well with buckets is certainly more picturesque. Unfortunately our well water has not been sweet since it was cleaned out. First, I had to open a bolted door that lets you into the basement hall, and then I went to the kitchen door, which proved to be locked. Then I remembered that our girl always carried the key to bed with her, and slept with it under her pillow. Then I retraced my steps; bolted the basement door, and went up into the dining room. As is always the case, I found when I could not get any water, I was thirstier than I supposed I was. Then I thought I would wake our girl up. Then I concluded not to do it. Then I thought of the well, but gave that up on account of the flavor. Then I opened the closet doors—there was no water there; and then I thought of the dumb waiter! The novelty of the idea made me smile; I took out two of the movable shelves, stood the pitcher on the bottom of the dumb waiter, got in myself with the lamp; let myself down until I supposed I was within a foot of the floor below, and then let go!

We came down so suddenly, that I was shot out of the apparatus as if it had been a catapult. It broke the pitcher, extinguished the lamp, and landed me in the middle of the kitchen at midnight with no fire, and the air not much above the zero point. The truth is I had miscalculated the distance of the descent—instead of falling one foot I had fallen five. My first impulse was to ascend by the way I came down, but I found that impracticable. Then I tried the kitchen door, it was locked; I tried to force it open; it was made of two inch stuff, and held its own. Then I hoisted the window, and there were the rigid iron bars. If I ever felt angry at anybody, it was at myself for putting up those bars to please Mrs. Sparrowgrass. I put them up, not to keep people in but to keep people out.

I laid my cheek against the ice cold barriers and looked out at the sky; not a star was visible; it was as black as ink overhead. Then I thought of Baron Trenck and the prisoner of Chillon. Then I made a noise! I shouted until I was hoarse, and ruined our preserving kettle with the poker. That brought our dogs out in full bark, and between us we made night hideous. Then I thought I heard a voice, and listened—it was Mrs. Sparrowgrass calling me from the top of the staircase. I tried to make her hear me, but the dogs united with howl, growl and bark, so as to drown my voice, which is naturally plaintive and tender. Besides, there were two bolted doors and double deafened floors between us; how could she recognise my voice even if she did hear it? Mrs. Sparrowgrass called once or twice, and then got frightened; the next thing I heard was a sound as if the roof had fallen in, by which I understood that Mrs. Sparrowgrass was springing the rattle. That called our neighbor, already wide awake. He came to the rescue with a bull terrier, a Newfoundland pup, a lantern and a revolver. The moment he saw me he shot at me, but fortunately just missed me. I threw myself under the kitchen table and began to expostulate with him but he would not listen to reason. In the excitement I had forgotten his name, and that made matters worse. It was not until he had roused up everybody around, broken in the basement door with an axe, gotten into the kitchen with his savage dogs and shooting iron, and seized me by the collar, that he recognised me—and then wanted me to explain it! But what kind of an explanation could I make to him? I told him he would have to wait until my mind was composed, and then I would let him understand the whole matter fully. But he never would have had the particulars from me, for I do not approve of neighbors that shoot at you, break in your door, and treat you in your own house as if you were a jail-bird. He knows all about it, however, for somebody has told him; somebody tells everybody everything in our village. [Putnam for June.

CONFERENCE OF ISRAELITES.—The American Rabbis have called a conference, which is to meet in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 17th of October, (5616 A. M.,) to deliberate on the following points.

1. The Institute of Union of American Israel in theory and practice.

2. A plan to organize a regular synod, consisting of delegates chosen by the congregations and societies, whose powers, privileges and duties shall be defined, to be sent to the central committee for their approbation.

3. To discuss and refer to a committee a plan for a Mishna America, to be reported to the next session.

4. A plan for scholastic education in the higher branches of learning.

5. Propositions, either sent in by correspondence or made by the ministers of the delegate conference.

LATE FROM KANSAS.—We extract the following items from the Kansas correspondence of the St. Louis Republican of the 15th ult:

The Legislature had been for several days occupied with the bill fixing county courts. They have not yet passed it, but it is supposed will do so.

The opinion of the Judges of the Supreme Court in the case of Squire Reeder and the Legislature, was received on the 8th Augu[illegible] is against Reeder.

At 11 o'clock on the 8th inst., both Hou[illegible] went into joint session to locate a permanent seat of Government. On the third ballot Lecompton was declared to be the choice of the joint session, for the capital of Kansas.

Lecompton is named for Judge Lecompt, of the Supreme Court of Kansas. It is situated on Kansas river, near the center of the Territory. Convenient as it is to all portions of the Territory, the location will doubtless give general satisfaction. The site is beautiful, timber abounds, water is plenty, and both timber and water are of most excellent quality.

There had been considerable speculation in shares and town lots of this new metropolis, and a great deal of excitement in consequence.

CHOLERA AT FORT LEAVENWORTH.—From a telegraphic dispatch, dated St. Louis, August 11, which we find in the New York Tribune of the 13th inst., we take following:

At Fort Leavenworth forty-six persons have died of cholera. Among the victims are Major Armstead and wife.

Further accounts from Fort Riley confirm the death of Major Ogden of cholera. Major Woods, his wife and four children, have died of it. Dr. Simmons and the ladies at the garrison have left. The chaplain is the only officer now remaining there. The disease is of the very worst character, and very fatal.

The workmen are endeavoring to get the public funds. Lecompt and party have left Fort Leavenworth for Fort Riley.

DISTINGUISHED DARKIES IN PARIS.—Galignani's Messenger says, that during the last few days a party of men of color, of the deepest black, dressed in the newest style of Parisian fashion, have been observed at the Universal Exhibition, the Jardin d'Haver balls, and other public places. These ebon gentlemen are functionaries of the court of his Imperial Majesty, Faustin I,—better known as Soloucque. Among them are Gen. Count Elea, senator, Grand Chancellor of Hayti; Viscount Elea, his son; Baron Simon, senator; and the Count de Val, senator. The above personages, with a numerous suit, lodge at the hotel in the garden of the Cercle de l'Exposition. They are admitted to dine at the club dinner, and may be seen almost any evening smoking segars and taking coffee on the terrace.

Iron manufactures have of late years made gratifying progress in Ohio, as the following statistics of the interest in that State, gathered in the year 1853, will show: Pig Iron—furnaces 35; tons of iron ore used, 140,010; tons of pig iron made, 52,058; bushels of coal consumed, 606,000; bushels of coke and charcoal, 5,428,000; operatives employed, 2,415; capital invested, $1,000,000; value of products, $2,000,000. Iron castings—factories, 183; pig metal, iron and ore used, 41,000; castings made, 38,000 tons; coal consumed, 840,000 bushels; coke and charcoal used, 355,120 bushels; operatives employed, 2,758; capital invested, $2,000,000; value of products, $3,200,000. Wrought Iron—factories, 17; pig metal used, 3,675 tons; blooms, 2,900 tons; coal consumed, 6,000,000 bushels; coke and charcoal used, 480,000 bushels; operatives employed, 708; wrought iron produced, 1,416 tons; capital invested, $700,000; value of products, $1,000,000. This exhibits a total of 235 establishments, producing to the value of $6,700,000, with a capital of $4,300,000, and employing 5,881 operatives.

SHARP BETTING.—The editor of the Albany Register gives the following as the result of his experience in betting on elections: "We were a great Jackson man, we were, the last time the old General ran for the Presidency, and whenever a General Jackson runs for that office, shall be so again. We lived in the country then, and had a neighbor who was on the other side of the political fence, who was a great dealer in horses. Well, we got into an argument with him one day, and so sure was he of success that he offered to bet a horse again $50 that the old hero of New Orleans would not be elected. We took the bet. The argument being one that had no end, was renewed from time to time with the same result, until five horses on one side and $250 on the other were staked on the issue of the election. We won. But we had forgot to designate the animals, and snob a lot of horses as was tendered in payment of the bet was a sight to see. If there was an ailment to which horse flesh is subject that was not exhibited by one of these five horses, we should like to be informed of its diagnosis. There was ringbone, and spavin, and strinqhalt, and blindness, and heaves; and one venerable old roadster had all these, and in addition was as deaf as a post. We kept them a week as a collection of curiosities in the animal line, and then sold them at auction. According to our recollection, four of them sold for $40 in the aggregate, and we gave a tin-peddlar $10 for taking the other. We have not bet on elections since, and don't want to win any more horses."

We extract the following from the New York Daily Times, of the 11th inst. It is very strange that the Tribune never noticed it, it generally being full of philanthropic notices:

It is said that there are over three thousand persons in New York City whose only lodging place is the door-step, the coal-box, or the benches in the public squares.

COAL LOCOMOTIVE.—A locomotive built to burn anthracite has been running a hundred miles a day on the Reading railroad for the past four weeks. Her performance is perfectly satisfactory. Good judges on the road think her the best for passengers they have ever known; has abundance of steam, and throws no dirt or sparks. It will be, if entirely successful, an economy of 43 per cent.

PRICES OF GRAIN IN THE SOUTH.—On this subject the Columbus (Ga.) Enquirer says:

Wheat is selling at Atlanta, Ga., at 85 cents. Old Corn is down to 75 cents and still receding. Flour, and a good article at that, is only selling for $6 per barrel. How can it be otherwise? The crops of wheat, oats and corn, never were finer and more abundant in Georgia and the Carolinas. In East Tennessee all manner of crops are fine and abundant; promising a yield never before equaled. If there is no foreign demand for our surplus grain, we will be unable to consume what we have and certainly unable to sell at anything like living prices.

A GOOD WIFE.—A good wife will never suffer her husband's attention to be distracted by details to which her own time and talents are adequate. If she be prompted by true affection and good sense she will perceive when his spirits are borne down and overwhelmed—she, of all human beings, can best minister to its needs. For the sick soul her nursing is quite as sovereign as it is for corporeal ill.

MORTALITY OF BALTIMORE.—The total number of deaths in the city of Baltimore during the week ending on the 13th August, was 151, which was an increase of 19 over the previous week.

This increase has principally been caused by cholera infantum. The abundance of fruit is assigned as the reason of the prevalence of this disease.

MR. BUCHANAN.—The Washington correspondent of the Charleston Standard of the 13th August, says Mr. Buchanan, our Minister to London, will leave that city on the 6th of October for the United States.

The stock of the Houston Railroad is being taken up rapidly. Twenty-five miles of the grading has been already completed, and the directors are urging on the work with all possi-

PENSACOLA CORRESPONDENCE.

A TRAGEDY.

PENSACOLA, Fla., Aug. 18, 1855.

Wednesday morning, the 15th inst., though as bright and glorious as any since the protracted storm of wind and rain, brought over our community a gloom which has not yet passed off. After breakfast I walked down the street, and was immediately struck with the earnestness of every one; men were collected here and there in little groups, talking in an under tone, and looking occasionally towards a public inn, before the door of which was hitched a horse attached to a buggy. Of course, the question "What is it?" came involuntarily, upon approaching the first group. "L. has killed J." was the laconic answer, sending the blood chilled back to the heart. The cause was told me in a very few words, and with others, I stood for some time, waiting to see the unfortunate man. In a few moments, accompanied by a friend, who had followed him from Warrington with the horse and buggy to facilitate his escape—L. having left there, the scene of the tragedy on horse-back, he came out and approached the buggy. The expression, "poor fellow!" spontaneously and simultaneously coming from several, attested the sympathy felt for him. As he pulled himself into the buggy, and fell back into the seat, he presented an appearance I shall never forget. I had never seen any one under similar circumstances, and this may have increased my sensation. He looked round, as his friend turned the horse to start, and bowed to those standing about the door—but oh! how meaningless, how mechanical! His expression of countenance indicated a soul wrung with an anguish indescribable and inexpressible. In a few minutes they had disappeared—having taken the road leading to Mobile. The particulars were as follows: L. and J. have long been bosom friends—mutually assisting each other—the latter having given the former his first successful start in business. Their intimacy and confidence seemed constant. Last Sunday L. and his wife with J. and one or two other friends spent the day together, recreating on the bay; and on the day previous to the sad event, I dined at L.'s house. L. was making preparations to leave for the North, and desiring to make some female relative a present, selected out of his store what he deemed a suitable one, and went home to consult his wife about it.

It was about 4 o'clock P. M., and he was surprised to find the front door and windows closed. Going round, however, the back way, and finding no one in, he supposed his wife had gone up-stairs to take an evening's lounge. Going up to her room, unsuspecting and unprepared, his feelings may not be easily imagined upon finding his supposed friend with his wife under circumstances which were suggestive of their criminality. J., in the scuffle, made his escape, and secreted himself for the balance of the day. That night the friends of L., hearing of the circumstance, and learning that he was intent upon killing J., chanced with him, and got him to say he would not in the morning, however, when he began to realize the fact that his family was broken up, his happiness forever gone, he seized his gun and went up to J.'s house. As he came out of the gate L. slept at him, but missed; whereupon J. endeavored to escape back into the house, but as he wheeled into the gate, part of the load in the other barrel took effect in the back of his head, killing him almost instantly. These are the facts as I have learned them. I have heard of no attempt to arrest the unfortunate man.

Yesterday I was called to bury the dead man. I went to the house of his mother—an excellent, pious old lady. Three young sisters, broken-hearted and comfortless, were around the mangled corpse of him who was but a few days since in the prime of life—robust and manly in appearance—doubtless considered the pride of the family. I looked in upon the disfigured face, and the thought, "Man, in the image of God!" came over my mind. Marred and mangled, how unlike the Heavenly now! This is all the work of sin. "The wages of sin is death!" Oh! how many are working for such.

The thoughtless, of course, are liberal in their denunciations, and very free in moralising upon the sad transaction. The tongue of scandal is busy, and the poor sufferers may expect the direst heartlessness to continue for some time. For my part, I feel that the reproach is upon our corrupted nature, and with me harsh words, I pray God's mercy upon the unfortunate sufferers. "Oh, God! Thou remembered that we are very dust!" J. B. O.

PARISIAN GOSSIP.—Horace Greeley having lately returned from Europe in the Baltic, writes some interesting gossip touching France and the Napoleons, which appeared in the Tribune of the 10th. We quote:

"In the absence of a lineal heir to his throne—and nothing is heard in France of the prospect of such an heir recently—the elder side of the Atlantic—the succession runs to old Jerome, only surviving brother of Napoleon I., and next to his son Jerome Napoleon, who was a noisy third Republican previous to his cousin's usurpation. Old Jerome is nobody, and is not known to have ever adopted a principle or cherished a conviction. Young Jerome has some talent but no character—or rather a bad reputation, even in profligate Paris. He is there accounted not merely loose in his morals, even when judged by the lax Parisian standard, but is popularly believed to have betrayed a want of pluck while in the Crimea. Louis Napoleon's rule is endured because it is known that he will fight to maintain it, and not run away when it is threatened, as his two last predecessors did."

Greeley especially ridicules the declaration of young Jerome at a public dinner, July 23d, to the Foreign Commissioners of the Public Exhibition that—

"In truth, we are a nation of democracy and equality by our manners, our institutions, and, above all, by our purpose. With us, the clerk becomes a Minister, the workman a master, the peasant a land owner, the soldier a general, and the whole people places the crown on its head by raising to the throne a dynasty (not merely sovereign) of its own choice."

INTER-OCEANIC SHIP CANAL.—The Washington Star learns from a reliable source, that some enterprising citizens of the United States and New Granada have discovered and explored the long sought for route for connecting the Atlantic and Pacific oceans by means of a ship canal. This great desideratum to the commercial world is certainly the most grand and important enterprise of this age, and worthy the attention and consideration of every civilized people and government. The plan is to go up the Atrato river some fifty miles from its mouth, the water being from six to ten fathoms in depth, and from thence to the Pacific—a distance of some sixty miles more—without a single lock or obstruction in the contemplated canal. A liberal grant has been made by the government of New Granada to the persons engaged in this grand undertaking; and the whole route, from one ocean to the other, has been accurately surveyed, and the facts developed are of such a character as to place beyond doubt or question the feasibility of the work.

NEW YORK EATING HOUSES.—A late number of the Journal of Commerce contains some very interesting statistics concerning the eating houses of the city. It is estimated that there are not less than ten establishments of this character in the lower wards of that city, which, feed, on an average, 1,000 persons daily. The two largest supply daily 2,000 persons. One of them—Petit & Crook's—used, in the month of July, the following articles: 11,842 pounds of meat; 1,485 pounds of fish; 158 bushels of potatoes; 2,760 loaves of bread; 6,472 quarts of milk; 2,959 pounds of sugar; and 1,336 pounds of butter. This seems almost incredible, and did it not come from so reliable a source, we should be inclined to discredit it altogether.

From the above statement, the average daily consumption for the hot month of July, was 382 pounds of meat; 48 pounds of fish; 5 bushels of potatoes; 80 loaves of bread; 209 quarts of milk; 95 pounds of sugar; and 43 pounds of butter. It, to some extent, illustrates another matter of some interest, which is the difference in the feed of the animal man in different parts of the country. In the consumption of 382 pounds of meat and 48 pounds of fish, only 5 bushels of potatoes and 80 loaves of bread were used! We will venture to assert that in this city, for an equal consumption of meat and fish, at least four times the quantity of potatoes and bread are called into requisition.

We learn by the Mobile papers that the city is remarkably healthy, there were only twenty-five deaths during the week ending August 19, of which eleven were children under eight years.

They have had several fine rains, which cooled the atmosphere and cleaned the streets, and there is every prospect of a continuance of pleasant weather.

The deaths in Charleston during the week ending on the 12th inst., were 37, twenty of which were children.

☞ The relaxing heats of summer leave behind them a long train of evils. The most universal of these are general debility; and its sure attendants, lowness of spirits. For these we can recommend a speedy and reliable cure, in the shape of HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS, prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson, Philadelphia. It is, in our opinion, a medicine par excellence—unexceptionable. It seems to reach the fountain head of the difficulty in the digestive organization, and then to relieve the secretions and the blood of the excessive acrid, or the cause of disease. Its tonic properties give vigor to the membranes of the stomach, and promote the secretion of the gastric juice, with digestion the food, while its genial, soothing, and alterative influence imparts general regularity and strength to the action of the secretive organs, and seems to fortify the constitution. Such is our own experience of its effects, and we believe it is confirmed by the evidence of all who have tried it, or had an opportunity of witnessing its operation. For sale by Dr. Jackson, 126 Arch street. See advertisement.

We invite the special attention of parents and guardians to the advantages here offered to young men desirous of a finished collegiate or business education. The location of the college, in a quiet valley, ten miles from a town—the freedom, consequently, from temptation to vice—the full and thorough course of study—the experience and ability of the Faculty—the wholesome discipline—the facilities for lecture afforded by ample apparatus, libraries and cabinets, and, withal, the cheapness of terms and healthfulness of position, cannot fail to secure to this college, as heretofore, a liberal patronage.

THE NASHVILLE FEMALE ACADEMY

The next academic year will commence September 3d. This institution has enjoyed thirty-nine years of uninterrupted prosperity.
In regard to health, it is believed to have no equal in the United States. Cholera, chills and fever, typhoid and scarlet fever, and similar fatal diseases, have never occurred here. But three deaths of boarders in thirty-nine years.
In regard to maternal influence, claims equality with the best regulated private families, in all that relates to personal habits, moral and mental culture.
Employs, almost exclusively, Southern teachers. No Southern parent, who gives this institution a personal examination, will, we think, find a reason for going further North. [jy21—4t] C. D. ELLIOTT.

Payment to be made at the close of each term. Board, including lodging, washing, lights and fuel, can be procured in the village and immediate neighborhood at ten dollars per month. Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would however, respectfully urge all parents or guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the institution, to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, facilitating, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.
School books, stationery, &c., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the usual rates.
Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral deportment of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.
As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass into another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.
The government of the school is to be understood as that of authority—though parental and mild, yet decided and firm. The institution is a religious point of view will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.
Pupils will be required to attend church at least once in the Sabbath, and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.
The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.
The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second session commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July. At which time the annual examination will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.
All applications for admission of pupils, &c., to be made to the president of the College.

THOUGHTS IN A GRAVEYARD.

BY JAS. G. CLARKSON.

Borne on the gale—
With misery fraught—
A low sad wail
By sorrow taught,
Breathed by the bier
Of death claimed love,
Breaks on the ear,
Our grief to move;
And whispered name,
And vacant place,
Show where death's aim
We sadly trace.
The child that clasped
A mother's breast,
In death's cold grasp
Has sank to rest;
The young bride's brow,
That yester night,
Glowed with love's light,
The badge of widowhood wears now—
Badge of heart's night.

'Id dreamless trance
Of dark graves cold
Where spectres dance,
On bone-made mold,
Are they who shone
In festal hall,
O'er reason's throne
The grave-worms crawl.
By this dim shore—
Oblivion's fair—
See rich and poor
Together here;
Wealth's magic splendor,
Dimm'd and gone,
Death the conqueror
Reigns alone,
While 'round his throne,
In drear array,
The grinning spectres cheerless moan
"For'er decay."

And life looks on,
Fate's mockery here,
And o'er those gone,
Scarce drops a tear,
Though stone to stone,
A weary tale
Tells of graves filled—
Of cheeks now pale—
Of hearts here stilled—
Of sorrow's wail—
Of heart-strings chilled
By death's cold gale—
Yet on we move,
With lightsome tread,
While those we love,
Are with the dead,
Nor learn we aught
From scene so fraught
Of truth as this cold sod;
Nor care that lessons here are taught,
Of life—of death—of God.

PAUL GATHERING STICKS.

...d was not one of your starched, and ...d, and dignified men, that can never ...their precious fingers except in what ...regard as their special calling. He was ...n to meet any kind of exigences. His ... calling, towering in grandeur above all ..., and magnified by him as by no other ... was the preaching of the gospel. And ...man being ever filled that office with ...er dignity and honor.

...d there were times when it was just as ... Paul's place to do other things as it had ... to preach the gospel. He was as ready, ... the time came, to make a tent as to ... a sermon; as ready to land a hand in ...ing the ship's lading overboard, to ...en her, as to pour gospel tidings on the ... of men; as ready to be squeezed into a ..., when escaping from Damascus, as to ...n Felix tremble with his terrible elo...nce; as ready to gather sticks for a fire, ...n the thing was called for, as to gather ...d into the Kingdom of Christ.

...uch a man was never out of his place, ...d always in the right place. His religion ...ored its brightness upon everything, as the ... does its brightness, and he made a reli...us duty of everything he was called to ...

When the time came for making Mars ... resound with gospel tidings, he was on ...d for the work; and when the time came ... him to be scourged and put into the ...cks, why he was on hand for that too; ... when the time came for being sent a ...oner from Judea to Rome, he was just the ... to go, and without a murmur; and the ... to be thankful that Paganism was at the ...ense of transporting him to so fair a field ... his labors as Rome.

Paul gathering sticks! Why should he ...? A fire was wanted, because of the ...at cold, and because of the rain, on the ... of his shipwreck; and somebody's busi...ss it was to make one. And he went into ... business like a man. And it was just as ...ch his business, at that time, to gather ...ks for the fire, as at other times to utter, ...d's ambassador, the sublimest counsels ...Heaven to men.

...It was not his business to have put himself ...on his dignity, and to feel above such a ...rk, and to stand aloof, as if it were be...ath him to help make a fire. His was a ...re of mere sense than that.

...And we love to look at these little inci...nts in his life. They do him honor; they ...ver belittle him; they exalt him. LETTER FROM BISHOP ANDREW.

NO. V.

Our Interests on the Pacific—What is at Stake There—The Relations of Northern and Southern Methodism.

It is, perhaps, not strange that our people at home, so far removed from our Pacific possessions, should have very inadequate conceptions of the character of the country and its population. The people of California are an enterprizing, restless race, and have among them as large and perhaps a larger share of intelligence and mental cultivation than will be found among an equal number in the olden States. This is particularly the case in all the principal towns; and even among the thousands who delve in the mines will be found not a few men of cultivated taste and classical training. We make this statement that it may be understood what sort of preachers we need for California.

Another difficulty in our way has been that a number of men whom we sent there have returned thence in a short time; thus weakening the hands of the few faithful brethren who have stuck by the work, and furnishing a plea against us to those at home who were opposed to our work on the Pacific. In reference to these good brethren, we may say that some of them returned on account of the impaired health of either themselves or families, and were excusable; some, perhaps, to attend to temporal business, to the proper settlement of which their personal presence was deemed essential; and some, who went there full of zeal, made a terrible onslaught on the foe, and after a few months got homesick, and imitated the Dutch captain who, after mustering the troop for action, on the very eve of battle, gave them very definite instructions how to advance and when to retreat; "And now," said he, "as I am a little lame, I believe I'll be getting away at once!"

One thing more in this connection. Some of those returned have given assurance to their California brethren that they intended to go back there as soon as their business was settled. I wonder if it is not about time their furlough had expired?

But methinks I hear some good brother say, "I am not satisfied, after all. This thing of one Methodist altar rising in opposition to another, in the same place, is unseemly. Let our dear brethren of the Northern Methodist Church occupy that country without our interference." I have previously touched on this, but shall say a few more things by way of closing. The Northern Methodist Church has its proper work to do in California; let them do it. And we have ours to perform; let us see to it that we don't fail in our task. Neither branch of the Church can do the work of the other. In carrying on ours, it must needs be that we shall occasionally come in collision. This cannot be helped. But is it anything new for us to come in contact with other denominations? It certainly sounds strangely to us to hear it intimated that we are to abandon any particular field because we are in danger of conflicting with other denominations. The Northern Church has no such scruple in California, nor anywhere else. They go where they list, without inquiring whether they shall come in contact with the Church, South, or not. And that they regard us as a distinct denomination, and have no scruples of conscience about rooting us out anywhere and establishing themselves upon our ruins, is attested by their whole conduct towards us since the division. Whining over the evils of Southern slavery and denouncing slaveholders with pious horror, they have yet organized several conferences within the limits of slaveholding States, and are annually sending thousands of missionary money and the labor of hundreds of their preachers to get as many slaveholders as possible into their communion! They strive to plant their churches at our very doors, and to root us out of the country where we were born and reared. And yet, while all this is going on around us, we are very affectionately told that we must by no means conflict in our movements with these dearly beloved Northern brethren!

Well, Mr. Editor, I have been reviewing the whole ground from 1844 till now, and I can see no single act of theirs towards us which demands of me any such forbearance.

They have treated us as aliens from the family of Methodism, or as a distinct denomination of Christians; and self-respect compels me to regard them as I do other orthodox and evangelical churches, and to act towards them accordingly.

I have thus thrown out some thoughts in reference to our work on the Pacific coast. I had no thought when I commenced of saying half so much as I have said. And yet there is one more point on which I must touch before I close, and that is, that even if we were wrong in establishing ourselves in California at first, to abandon the field now, after all we have done, and after all our faithful and devoted brethren there have suffered, would be disastrous in the extreme to our reputation as a church, and of fatal tendency to our prospects of success in our future attempts at missionary enterprise in all lands washed by the great ocean of the world which are yet destined to be the grand battle fields of Heathenism and Christianity.

I know that some good brethren, and even some of the Annual Conferences, have been opposed to this movement from the beginning, or have yielded to it a very lukewarm support. Some of them have predicted, with oracular sagacity, that the mission would be a failure; and to these every apparent indication of want of success has been complimentary to their forseeing wisdom. Such men would be hard to convince, seeing that such conviction would be a tacit concession that they had been mistaken! It is possible that there may be many such, whose reputation as prophets depends upon the failure of our work in California. To these good brethren I have only to say, I hope, in this case, that you will prove to be false prophets.

GRIEF AT SIN.

"Being grieved for the hardness of their hearts."
Mark, 3:5.

On this one occasion only is the expression used with reference to Jesus—(what intensity of emotion does it denote, spoken of a sinless nature!)—"He looked around on them with anger!" Never did he grieve for himself. His intensest sorrows were reserved for those who were tampering with their own souls and dishonoring his God. The continual spectacle of moral evil, thrust on the gaze of spotless purity, made his earthly history one consoutive history of grief, one perpetual "cross and passion."

In the tears shed at the grave of Bethany, sympathy, doubtless, for the world's myriad mourners had its own share, (the bereaved could not part with so precious a tribute in their hours of sadness,) but a far more impressive cause was one undiscerned by the weeping sisters and sorrowing crowd; his knowledge of the deep and obdurate impenitence of those who were about to gaze on the mightiest of miracles, only to "despise, and wonder, and perish." "Jesus wept!"—but his profoundest anguish was over rejected grace, abused privileges, scorned mercy. It was the divine artificer mourning over his shattered handiwork; the almighty Creator weeping over his ruined world; God, the God-man, grieving over the temple of the soul, a humiliating wreck of what was once made "after his own image!"

Can we sympathize in any respect with such exalted tears? Do we mourn for sin, our own sin—the deep insult which it inflicts on God, the ruinous consequences it entails on ourselves? Do we grieve at sin in others? Do we know anything of "vexing our souls," like the righteous Lot, from day to day, with the world's "unlawful deeds"—the stupid hardness and obduracy of the depraved heart which resists alike the appliances of wrath and love, judgment and mercy? Ah! it is easy in general terms to condemn vice, and to utter harsh, severe and cutting denunciations on the guilty; it is easy to pass uncharitable comments upon the inconsistencies or follies of others, but to grieve as our Lord did is a different thing; to mourn over the hardness of heart, and yet to have the burning desire to teach it better things; to hate, as he did, the sin, but, like him, also to love the sinner!

Reader, look specially to your own spirit. In one respect the example of Jesus falls short in your case. He had no sin of his own to mourn over. He could only commiserate others. Your intensest grief must begin with yourself. Like the watchful Levite of old, be a guardian at the temple gates of your own soul. Whatever be your besetting iniquity, your constitutional bias to sin, seek to guard it with wakeful vigilance. Grieve at the thought of incurring one passing shadow of displeasure from so kind and compassionate a Saviour. Let this be a holy preservative in your every hour of temptation, "How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?"

Grieve for a perishing world, a groaning creation, fettered and chained in "unwilling subjection to vanity." Do what you can, by effort, by prayer, to hasten on the hour of jubilee, when its ashy robes of sin and sorrow shall be laid aside, and, attired in the "beauties of holiness," it shall exult in "the glorious liberty of the sons of God!"

THE LARGEST CLOCK.—The largest clock, it is said, that was ever constructed, has recently been finished by Mr. Dent for the new English House of Parliament. The dials are twenty-two feet in diameter, the point of the minute hand will therefore move fifteen inches every minute; the pendulum is fifteen feet long; the hour bell is eight feet high and weighs fifteen tons; the hammer weighs four hundred weight. The clock, as a whole, is eight times as large as a full sized cathedral clock.

BEAUTIFUL PASSAGE.—The following is from the pen of Walter Savage Landor: "The damps of autumn sink into the leaves and prepare them for the necessity of the fall; and thus insensibly are we, as years close around us, detached from our tenacity to life by the gentle pressure of recorded sorrows."

It has been beautifully said, that the veil that covers the face of futurity is woven by the hand of mercy. Seek not to raise the veil, therefore, for sadness might be seen to shade the brow that fancy had arrayed in smiles of gladness.

OUR ENGLISH CORRESPONDENCE.

Parliament and the People.

Much cry and little wool may be said of the present session. Beyond the mere routine of keeping in motion the machinery of the State and supplying the sinews of war, little practical business has been done. At one time, backed by large majorities, Ministers have crowed over the Opposition, passed scathless the fierce encounters of party strife; at others, they have writhed beneath the lash, lustily applied, amid the cheers of the House, by men they had thought to extinguish by a smear, escaped an hostile vote by the merest chance, and been plucked in a minority by a silly motion that sent honorable members giggling to a division.

Upon the whole, the business of the House, the management of the internal affairs of the country, the dead lock into which everything rising and progressive has floated and become stationary, and the conduct of the war itself, has been such as will have little tendency to raise us in the estimation of foreigners, or to maintain for us the position gained by the antecedents of the nation.

Is there a needs-be that, as a sop to propitiate the modern Cerberus of the war, we must permit the great absorbing questions of the day to remain in abeyance and prevent those social problems which have so long pressed for solution from reaching the table of the House? Startling episodes have now and then turned up to relieve the monotony of debate, and amid the pitched battles of rival statesmen and opposing politicians the strength of parties has been tested. But important measures, propounded by the great chiefs of parties, and designed to wipe out the dark stains of ignorance, have been quietly abandoned. It is true, they expired accompanied by a hope that from their ashes may arise the Phœnix of more successful efforts.

The Scotch Educational bill, too, after a successful struggle through the Commons, has been consigned to oblivion by the Lords. Other bills will not reach half way; and, as green fields, well kept parks and snug country seats rise before the imagination of honorable members, others will fall still-born on the floor of the House.

The new Beer bill of last session has been put upon its trial. Before a special committee has been presented from the country, and by witnesses summoned to give information, evidence as much opposed and as contradictory as can well be imagined. The question at issue, as we understand it, is not the abstract right of the legislature to interfere upon such matters, but the uneasy feeling on the part of the public that it is an infliction upon them of inconveniences from which the authors, by reason of circumstances and position, are exempt. Our own opinion of the working of the act we suspend until the evidence is before us.

As a rule, we believe that among the people themselves are to be found the elements of their own improvement, and that in their possession are the means of their own redemption. By gradual processes, and by the operation of certain laws, extended coasts and continents are, it is said, constantly rising above their old sea level. And by expansive capabilities common to human nature the inherent tendencies of the lower strata of society is upward. Fitful as may have been the starts, visionary as may have been the schemes, and wild as are the plans and bubbles pompously launched, and impudently labelled, "panacea for the cure of moral or of social evils," by their projectors, there may yet be seen beneath, the earnest promptings of a true spirit.

There is not a vice at all peculiar to the working classes they have not set themselves resolutely to expunge. Improvidence and intemperance are two charges not unjustly made. These are the fruitful parents of untold misery amongst them. Yet it is with these classes benefits, buildings and temperance societies meet with countenance and support.

Too often, it must be admitted, excess has relaxed the iron grasp, paralyzed the giant strength, substituted the palsied hand and tottering gait for the firm step and steady aim. It has also in other classes sought its victims—brushing the bloom of health from the cheek of youth and beauty, holding its revels in the princely palace, in baronial halls, and beneath the debris of ruined reputation and shattered fortune has rolled the thunders of a guilty conscience and an indignant spirit.

Yet where will you find more heroic resolution to conquer vice, more stern determination to overcome temptation? Much, undoubtedly, may be done to facilitate improvement amongst them. It is not, however, by means of harsh laws and stringent enactments, but by kind words, expressed sympathies, counsel and example, that we can hope to succeed.

INDIFFERENTISM MISTAKING ITS AIM.

Gallio assumed airs of dignity when he said to the Jews arraigning Paul, "If it were a matter of wrong or wicked lewdness, O ye Jews, reason would that I should bear with you; but since it is a question of words and names, look ye to it." He scorned all questions of right and wrong in religion as equally beneath his notice. He was an example of a large class of men at the present day, who think religion well enough to occupy the attention of women and children, while they, forsooth, have learned to take broader views of things, and look down on the littleness of all religious questions. For themselves, they are essentially atheistic, having a contempt for all religions, and yet claim great credit for a willingness to be equal justice to all, and for a magnanimity that can tolerate the weakness of others. Indeed, they are so kind and tender hearted, that it grieves them to see neighbors at variance on questions so trivial as those of right or wrong in religion, questions of life or death for eternity. In their view, all religionists are equally sincere and equally silly; equally right and equally wrong. And hence all discussions on such matters are to be ruled out.

This view of things, while it claims to be eminently philosophical, wants, in fact, even common sense. For if men had no interest in the life to come, their interests for the present life are in many ways affected differently by different religions. The civil and social interests of men, to say nothing of any other, are greatly promoted or hindered by right or wrong religious views.

The contemner of all religion may say what he will, yet it is a fact that religion, true or false, runs into all the forms of civilization good or bad, as a powerful formative cause, and he who overlooks this element in the formation of social and national character, comes to most absurd conclusions. It was mainly the difference between the ancient Jews and the heathen world around them. From the reign of David to the opening of Christianity the Jews had a high state of civilization and social morality, excepting when they imitated the religion, and through that, partook of the debasement of the heathen around them. It is religion now that makes all the difference betwen heathen barbarism and Christian civilization. Whatever of civilization exists among the heathen is barbarism in comparison with Christian society. Look at China, now the most civilised of heathen nations. Its civilizing arts and agencies have been in undisturbed operation for thousands of years. It has had many of the arts of civilization longer than any other people; and yet it has been stationary from a time earlier than the Christian era. See what a people its religion has produced, and contrast it with what Christianity has produced, in England, for example; and then say whether the question between a true and a false religion is of no consequence.

But many concede, thus far, that Christianity is a better civilizing agent than heathenism; that it is a good thing to keep the common people in order, though they themselves need it not; that the masses of the people have weaknesses and superstitions which require religion to regulate them. Anything, however, that bears the name of Christianity, though it be wholly contrary to its truth and spirit, will, in their view, answer all this purpose. But it so happens that each of the varieties of professed Christianity produces a form of Christianity best suited to itself. The Greek Church makes Russian serfs; the Romish Church produces serfs of another kind. The difference between the civilization produced by Romanism and that produced by Protestantism is seen by comparing France and England or England and Ireland.

A FRENCHMAN'S RELIGION.—Dr. Thompson, in his letters from France, relates the following as an illustration of the free, easy, good natured religion of the French:

"Now," said a Frenchman, as we sat down together in his carriage, "I must confess to you I am a Catholic. I cross myself, I say prayers, I go to mass and confession, I teach my children to do so too. I do all this because my father did, and it does no harm. It does me good; when I am well I it makes me better, when I am afflicted, it makes me less afflicted. You are a Protestant. You say I am wrong—the bread is not flesh, the wine is not blood, but God can do all things. Will he make such a transformation? What says his word? I do not know, the priest does, and he says that the Bible teaches this doctrine. It is not my business to examine; it is his—I pay him for it. It is enough for me to take care of my family and support the Church and the State. God knows I have no time to spend in theological controversy. Now, my dear friend, do not argue with me, I cannot argue with you. I refer you to my priest."

There is something in your Bible exactly adapted to every trying hour.

IMPORTANT FROM MEXICO.

Santa Anna Again a Fugitive.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMER ORIZABA.

The steamer Orizaba, Capt. Forbes, arrived on Saturday morning from Vera Cruz, having left that port on the 22d ult., bringing twenty-seven passengers, three in the steerage.

The Orizaba brought $36,727 in specie, consigned as follows:

E. Pamerden	$9,000	E. de Puentes & Co.,	1,000
Puig & Avendano	11,000	E. P. Arrigoss,	771
M. Payno	1,000	Bringier & Bo.	1,000
Cramer & Co.	1,522	J. W. Zacharie & Co.,	1,421
L. Jeannette & Co.,	1,813	H. Heppenstedt	5,000

The Orizaba reports: Left at the Island of Sacrificios H. B. M. brig Daring, Capt. Napier, and two Mexican war vessels. At Vera Cruz, Danish brig Ceo, loading for London, with specie. French bark Traun Mexique, discharging.

The political news by the Orizaba is of a most important character.

Santa Anna has fled from Mexico, taking with him his family. He left the city of Mexico on the 9th inst. with 1400 men, for Vera Cruz, for the avowed purpose of quelling the revolution in that State; but on arriving at Perote he threw off the mask. He issued a proclamation, deposing the Government in the hands of Vega, Pavoni and Salas, and left immediately for Vera Cruz. He arrived at Vera Cruz on the night of the 15th inst.; on the day after he endeavored to go on board the war steamer Iturbide, but was prevented by the state of the weather. He was compelled to wait until the night of the 17th before he could embark, which being safely accomplished the steamer proceeded to Havana.

Santa Anna's Ministers who had been left at the city of Mexico took French leave in the meantime, and Gen. Carrera, at the head of 700 men, the only troops left in the city, pronounced for the plan of Ayuntla, naming Carrera President pro tem., and Vega, commander-in-chief of the troops.

Part of the regiment of Tres Viejas in Vera Cruz, pronounced on the night of the 18th, and killed one of their officers, and left the city to join La Llave, who was in the immediate vicinity. The remainder of the regiment was marched out of the city the next morning by order of Gen. Corona, to prevent further disturbance.

All continued quiet at Vera Cruz after the above proceedings until the night of the 21st, when a disturbance occurred among the troops of the regiment of Guides. The 2d regiment was ordered out and several shots fired.

The troops who were in Fort Conception and who had pronounced, fired cannon loaded with grape, which killed several of the Guides.

The Guides then assaulted the Fort and took it, after which all became quiet.

Carrera has been appointed Provisional President for six months. It was expected that there would be considerable trouble between him, Alvarez and Commonfort, on this account.

The probable departure of Santa Anna had been discussed since the 8th, the people speaking very freely, and private meetings at the houses of citizens of the Liberal party were matters of frequent occurrence.

On the 12th the Heraldo and Siglo XIX began to publish remarks on the actual state of affairs. They both published the plan of Agutha, which was proclaimed by a part of the garrison, and the same evening by the population, who adopted it.

The gentlemen who had been imprisoned by Santa Anna were set at liberty on the night of the 12th, by the commission that had been appointed by him.

On the 13th there was a meeting of the populace on the Almeda, numbering between 8 and 10,000; the plan of Agutha was confirmed, and provision made for the organization of the National Guards. They marched from the Almeda to the Palace Square, intending to destroy the furniture of Santa Anna. Several shots were fired, and one man was killed.

The populace then went to the office of the Universal newspaper, and destroyed most of the material.

The houses of the bankers Lizardi and Escandon, and Senor Bonillo, late Minister of Finance, were sacked, and all the furniture destroyed, including a valuable library belonging to the latter, valued at $15,000. The damage done is estimated at $40,000.

The other ministers and objects of popular vengeance had taken the precaution to secrete or remove the most of their property. During the above proceedings some forty were killed and as many wounded.

On the 13th the populace overthrew and attempted to drag through the streets the statue of Santa Anna, but were prevented from so doing.

The new Government, on the evening of the 15th, sent, under Gen. Vega, expresses to the various Governors of States, requiring them to pronounce, and to the commanders of the Liberal forces, to advise them that everything had been regulated, and requesting them to come to the capital, leaving their forces behind for the purpose of arranging the Government.

This did not satisfy the Liberal party, who sent to the commanders, telling them that to be able to carry out their plans they must bring their forces with them.

The Liberals refuse to adopt the new government on account of its being composed of a large portion of the members of the old, and is closely united to the church.

Lizardi claims $2,000,000 for bonds and valuable papers destroyed by the populace in the attack on his house.

We shall look with much interest for the next news from Mexico, as we are at a loss to know who the man is that at this junction of affairs is to "save the country." The city of Mexico never had but one good Governor—Gen. John A. Quitman—and we would suggest that the Mexican people would do a wise thing in endeavoring to secure his services at this critical time.

To the Editors of the Louisville Journal:

GENTLEMEN.—Be kind enough to give us the names of the business men of your city that prescribe you for your independent course in relation to the late riots in your city. We deal considerably in Louisville, and, if proscription is the order of the day, it may be we can proscribe some too.

Your obedient servants.

We received this letter from a prominent mercantile firm in Alabama. It is the fourth of the kind that has come to hand. We must decline giving, even privately, the names of those men in this city who have chosen to withdraw their subscription from us, for we have no wish to see them injured. Their discontinuance of our paper hurts them fifty times more than it can us. [Louisville Journal, 20th.

A NOBLE ACT.

Lieutenant Beall, of the United States Navy, is already known to the country, having particularly distinguished himself on several occasions as a bearer of important dispatches to and from California, both through the heart of Mexico during the war, and across the prairies and Rocky Mountains, forcing his way with equal spirit through civilized and savage enemies. As a gallant naval officer and intrepid traveler, with the courage to face and energy to overcome every difficulty and peril, we can well believe he has no superior; but we have recently heard an anecdote told of him, being the account of a circumstance which happened on the last journey to California, from which he has only so lately returned, which, while it illustrates the dangers of the road, proves that there is another quality in him higher than mere resolution and bravery—a humane and generous disposition, which gives to those virtues the character of heroism.

It was, we believe, in the Gila country that Lieut. Beall, having encamped his party and placed it in safety, went out hunting. He set out alone on a favorite saddle mare, which was generally kept or spared for such occasions. About six miles from the camp he had the good fortune to kill a deer; and he was on the ground dressing the carcass, when, on looking up, he suddenly beheld a troop of mounted Apaches, who had discovered him, and were dashing furiously towards him. They had doubtless heard the report or seen the smoke of his rifle, and so were on him before he was aware; but he knew very well that to be overtaken by them, a single white man among those naked hills which they called their own, was certain death, and accordingly, leaving his quarry and mounting in hot haste, he rolled upon the mettle of his mare, which he put to her full speed, to carry him back in safety to the camp. Away darted the young Lieutenant, and on rushed the savages, thundering and yelling in certain assurance of their prey. But confident as they were, the fugitive was quite as well satisfied of his ability to escape, although their horses were fresher than the mare, and it was pretty certain they were gaining slightly upon her, and would give her a severe contest before reaching the camp.

Thus assured of his safety, but not relaxing his speed, Lieutenant B. had recovered half his distance from the camp, when, dashing over the crest of a hill, he was horrified at the sight of one of his own men, on foot, climbing the hill, and in fact, following in his trail to assist him in the hunt. The sight of the Lieutenant flying down the hill at such a furious rate, was, doubtless, enough; perhaps the poor fellow could hear the whoops of the Indians ascending the hill from the opposite side; at all event, he understood his fate, and spreading his arms before the horse's head he cried out, with accents of despair, "Oh, Mr. Beall, save me! I am a husband, and father of six helpless children!" Never was prayer more quickly heard or more heroically answered.

The Lieutenant, though riding for his own life, immediately stopped his mare and dismounted, and giving her to the man, said: "You shall be saved. Ride back to the camp, and send them out to give my body a decent burial!" And so they parted—the footman to escape, the officer as he supposed to be slain; for the hill was utterly bare, without a single hiding place, and he thought of nothing but selling his life as dear as possible. For this purpose he drew his revolver, and, sitting down on the ground, waited for the savages, who in a moment came rushing over the brow of the hill, and then, to the unspeakable amazement of Lieutenant Beall, dashed past him down the descent like madmen, not a soul in fact seeing him. They saw, in reality, nothing but the horse and horseman; they knew nothing of a footman, and the sitting figure of the Lieutenant appeared, to eyes only bent on one attractive object, as a stone or huge cactus, such as abound on those sterile hills.

At all events, Lieutenant Beall, by what seemed to himself almost a direct providential interposition in his behalf, remained wholly undiscovered; and in a moment more the Apaches were out of sight, still pursuing the horse and the rider to the camp. The latter barely succeeded in escaping with his life, the Indians having overhauled him so closely just as he reached the camp as to be able to inflict one or two slight wounds upon him with bullets, or perhaps with arrows. As for Lieutenant Beall, he was not slow to take advantage of his good fortune, and selecting a roundabout course, he succeeded in reaching the camp just about the time the poor fellow whom he had saved, and the other members of the party, were about sallying out to obey his last request, and give his body a decent burial.

Upon such an act as this it were superfluous to comment. It is an act, however, which deserves to live in men's recollections like the story of a great battle and victory.

BEAUTIFUL FIGURE.—Two painters were employed to fresco the walls of a magnificent cathedral; both stood on a rude scaffolding constructed for the purpose some forty feet from the floor. One of them was so silent upon his work that he became wholly absorbed in admiration, and stood off from the picture, gazing at it with intense delight. Forgetting where he was, he moved backwards slowly, surveying critically the work of his pencil, until he had neared the very edge of the plank upon which he stood.

At this critical moment his companion turned suddenly, and almost frozen with horror, beheld his imminent peril; another instant and the enthusiast would be precipitated upon the pavement beneath; if he spoke to him, it was certain death—if he held his peace, it was equally sure. Suddenly he regained his presence of mind, and seizing a wet brush, flung it against the wall, spattering the beautiful picture with unsightly blotches of coloring. The painter flew forward, and turned upon his friend with fierce imprecations but startled at his ghastly face, he listened to the recital of his danger, looked shudderingly over the dread space below, met with tears of gratitude blessed the hand that saved him.

So, said a preacher, we sometimes get absorbed in looking upon the pictures of the world, and in contemplating them, step backward, unconscious of our peril; when the Almighty dashes out the images, and we spring forward to lament their destruction—into the outstretched arms of mercy, and are saved.

Mrs. E. K. Smith likes the people of the great West. She says, in the Rhode Island Schoolmaster:

"The Western man has none of the vices of thrift. He carries on operations upon so vast a scale that he casts out pettiness and meanness wherever he goes. He does not higgle and barter in a bargain. He measures distance by miles, not feet. He counts money by dollars, not pennies. He seems ashamed to come down to pence. He buys a dress for his wife, and gets a few yards extra; his own coat and his shoes are all too large for him; his hat slouches for the same reason; it is as if the imagination of the man was akin to the vastness of the rivers and prairies of the region—the soul quite gets outside of the body. He must have elbow room—he must breathe—therefore, his house is large; the room large, and sometimes uncomfortable. The bed is high and wide; the mosquito ample, heavy, and like the lakes, filled to the brim.

News of the Week.

Fever abating, though virulent. Largest number of yellow fever deaths in Hospital, any one day last week, 23; on yesterday, (we write on Thursday,) 14. Saturday, the Secretary of the Howards left for the relief of Norfolk and Portsmouth, with two physicians and thirteen nurses. Days very warm between 11 and 4 P. M., with showery tokens. North winds not so prevalent—a favorable circumstance.

The Mexican news, on first page, important, morally, as politically. The vamosed dynasty patronized the Papal establishment; the Liberals more favorable to religious liberty. This coup d'etat a series of events, no man can control, opening the whole of that region to the gospel and a higher civilization.

The Beer Garden Church.

Turning swords into ploughshares and spears into pruning hooks does not excel the moral metamorphosis of the Beer Garden, changed into a Sabbath school and preaching place, as described by Bro. Hofer, in his report on the German Missions. Read it, and then you will help the cause he pleads.

At the recent session of the Pittsburgh Conference, the Rev. Dr. Nast delivered an address on the German Methodist work in this country. He said; "No other Church is so favorably organized as the Methodist Episcopal Church to carry on a permanent, efficient mission work among the German population of this country, and at the same time do so much for Americanising them, for there are everywhere English societies ready at hand to receive the second crop of the German mission fields into the garner of the American Church, without taking away the seed corn for the future immigration from Germany. The German work is no more an experiment. What has God wrought in the last fifteen years? The Methodist Episcopal Church had in 1838 but one missionary laboring in Cincinnati. He reported at the close of that year the first German Methodist society, consisting of thirty members. Now there are 15 districts, 161 fields of labor, 189 traveling preachers, 120 local preachers, 11,960 members, 138 houses of worship, and 59 parsonages. And I must not pass over the hundreds that have died in the Lord, and are now safely deposited in the garners of the Church Triumphant, as the fruits of ministerial labor."

The Church, South, has not been remunerated in moral results by any evangelising enterprise more than the German Missions. They have accomplished much. The demand for them increases.

Rev. J. Sydney Hayes.—Mr. Hayes, pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Fourth District, died of yellow fever Sunday evening. He was attacked the previous Tuesday. His end was peace. A widow and orphan are left; but they mourn not alone. Their loss is one felt by his Church and the religious community. A large and serious audience attended his funeral on Monday afternoon.

Mr. Hayes has resided here something over a year, and endeared himself to the numerous individuals and families reached by his ministrations. They were ministrations of mercy and love, as well as truth. Those who sought out the poor and sick in obscure places often met him. He was about thirty years old, and died a sacrifice to his Master's work. Truly, the people of New Orleans are served with gospel privileges at a great sacrifice.

British Wesleyan Periodicals.—At the Conference, the Book Committee reported that notwithstanding the dullness in the general book trade, in consequence of the excitement respecting the war and political affairs, the sales of the Book Room increased during the year. Of hymn books, 6,000 more were sold than in the previous year. The circulation of the periodicals has been kept up, except that of the large Wesleyan Magazine, which has declined. The sale of Newton's Life has exceeded expectations. Of tracts, 1,200,000 have been circulated; and a new "Biographical Series" has been commenced, which is to contain sketches of the life and experience of old Methodist worthies. There will be original tracts from the pens of some of the ablest ministers in the connection.

Spanish Societies.—The societies that have been formed in England and Scotland for the Protestantising of Spain are said to display the greatest activity. Rich contributions have been made in Glasgow and Dundee for spreading the Bible in Spain. A new Protestant paper in the Spanish language, El Alba, which is published in London by converted Spaniards, works successfully; and some presses for printing the Bible and Protestant books in Spain itself are under way.

Stand By the Flock.

The yellow fever is spreading out and reaching into the interior. Pastors of churches within the afflicted districts will have an opportunity of showing their faith by their works. We cannot conceive of a more unenviable position before a community than that of a minister who, having fled from them, returns with returning health.

Having left them to make their own beds in sickness—to be buried without Christian forms—to contend, unsheered by gospel ministrations, with the gloom and sorrow of the solemn and black-palled time—to drag through the dreary months of woe—with only such sympathy as he could extend at a safe distance, he has come back, like a tender and brave shepherd. A congregation must have great charity and forgiveness that gives him a hearing.

A few of these prudent pastors have done more against the character and moral power of the Christian ministry than its professed enemies. We hesitate not to say, in military phrase, it ought to break the renegades.

Honored be the dust of those holy and true ministers who have died at their posts. Their graves among us are "Evidences of Christianity" more forcibly appreciated by our people than arguments drawn out in books.

The pastor of the Methodist Church in C....., La., writes us privately, but in this connection it will be no impropriety to addnce his example and sentiment publicly:

"* * * We have two cases of yellow fever in town and one death. The people are almost all gone. There has been no new case since last Monday. I will have no one scarcely to preach to. If the epidemic prevails here I will remain through it. I think it far better that we should lose a half a dozen preachers every epidemic than for us to run away. Yours, J. J. W."

The bones of such pastors, with the memory of their life and death, are a richer inheritance to a church than the most eloquent pulpititian alive of whom it is said, at the approach of danger "he ingloriously fled."

A moral power attaches to the faithful pastor who passes with his flock through a trying time, that mere talent never bestowe. A sympathy, a confidence grows up that is rooted in the heart when the hardest is cleft deep and thoroughly. The very sound of the voice that mourned with them, when mourners were few, is associated with painful and pleasing memories; and a propitious medium for sacred truth is that voice ever after.

A season of peril is equaled by no other for doing good instantly to the souls of men and laying the foundations of future good.

STAND BY THE FLOCK!

Jesuits in New Orleans.

This active society of Romanists have suffered severe losses by the death of their most eminent men. Rev. Blackney, President of the Jesuit College on Baronne street, and a highly accomplished man and scholar, died of yellow fever last summer; his successor, Rev. J. Adams, died of the same malady August 23d, in Baton Rouge, whither he went to address the students of St. Peter and St. Paul's College, and to admit "Father Lave" into the Society of Jesuits; but his attack with fever, almost immediately upon his arrival, prevented the performance of either mission.

He was born in 1816, near Bardstown, Ky., educated at St. Joseph's College, Bardstown, and at St. Mary's College, Baltimore; after which he served several years as priest in Kentucky. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1848, and about the same time was made Vice-President of Spring Hill College, near Mobile.

Two weeks since died Rev. Plats, in this city, a native of Savoy and member of S. J.

Their college goes on. Near it is rising, with characteristic patience and substantialness, one of the largest double tower churches in the city.

This people seem to be in no hurry—lay their plans deeply and quietly, and far ahead—play for a grand stake—work with alarming though secret energy, make sure of the main points, and suffer nothing to stand between them and success.

ROWLAND HILL PREACHING PURITY OF HEART.

Not long after Rev. Richard Watson had become resident in London, says his biographer, he met a number of dissenting ministers, on some public occasion. The venerable Rowland Hill, supposing him to belong to the Independent denomination, said to him: "Whatever shall we do, sir, to prevent the spread of Antinomianism, which is making such dreadful havoc of many of our churches? Don't you think, sir, that there is something in our Calvinistic doctrines which is calculated to produce this terrible evil?" Mr. Watson, who was taken by surprise, and felt himself placed in a somewhat peculiar position, assented to Mr. Hill's suggestion; and the aged apostle of Calvinian theology added, in his own emphatic manner, "I spent my younger days in fighting the Arminian devil, but I will spend the rest of my life in fighting the devil of Antinomianism."

This pledge that excellent man fully redeemed. For several years no minister of his age was more strenuous in the inculcation of purity of heart and of universal holiness, than he; and though it is not pretended that he renounced the peculiarities of his creed, they were less prominent in his ministrations than they had formerly been; while his zeal for practical religion and righteousness, it was often said, led him occasionally to preach a higher perfection than his former opponents, Messrs. Wesley and Fletcher, deemed to be attainable in this life.

THE HORNS OF THE CRESCENT.

Wrinkle No 2

There was a vein of true philosophy in the rankled Quaker who laid off his broad brim and enter drab, in order that he might fight consistently. If his Quakerism was embodied in his coat or hat, it is as clear as daylight that, these articles aside, the Quaker did not resist evil. It was the man, and not the Quaker. If bloody noses followed in the encounter, or even an event which called for a coroner's inquest, results that the story has not revealed, will any one presume to assert that Quakerism had made the blood to run, or that it was chargeable with homicide? If this principle was in the coat and hat, certain we are that it had nothing to do with these consequences, save the silent protest that it entered against them. The broad-brim and the drab were guiltless of blood and murder.

We have no use for this reasoning farther than the suggestion it affords. At a time when the churches are brought within the gauge of political discussion, when some are for pulling them in and others for pulling them out, and when their every movement is watched by the eye of party jealousy and sectarian prejudice, a notice of our home status may not be amiss. If we are asked about the politics of Methodism in the Crescent, we would answer in the language of facts.

The political questions of the day have not been mooted in our pulpits. The same gospel is still preached. Its expositions are the same orthodox expositions they have been since the Bible, Hymn Book and Discipline came amongst us. Texts are not twisted into a Know-Nothing nor into a Democratic phase. There is no preaching for a rising or a sinking party. The Bible is God's book, this is God's world, and the pulpit simply brings God's world and book together. The worshippers in Methodist sanctuaries are of all opinions in politics, but very much of one religion. Our members of all parties are one in heart at the sacramental board.

If the Church has felt this influence elsewhere, it is happily delivered from it here. On communion Sabbaths, natives and foreigners, Know-Nothings and Democrats, (so known in the world,) kneel at the same altar and receive the emblems of a common faith. They are brethren on Sundays and on week days—in church clothes or in working dresses they are one in Christ.

These facts are enough. But let us return to broad-brim. Everything has its identity—it is itself distinguished from everything else. Quakerism has its identity—say it is a coat or a hat, or both, or neither of those, but a body of doctrines and morals. Now, if it is not a fighting principle, whether in the shape of a coat, hat, or body of doctrines and morals, it must lose its identity and become something else before it can fight. If we would determine the politics of Methodism, we must look at Methodism. What is it, and where is it? It is Christianity, understood in a certain way. It is a specific exposition and reception of the gospel, and a peculiar organization of ecclesiastical government. It is a religious platform, every plank of which is in the book of Discipline. This is the embodiment. It is just as identical a thing as a coat or a hat, and is just as easily eliminated from men and parties and all irrelevant matters. Methodism is not a man, it is not a number of men: it is a system of doctrines and rules. Politics in Methodism meet he in this system, or nowhere. Is there anything here to justify the slanderous imputation? We find the doctrines of the Holy Trinity, of justification by faith only, of original or birth sin. The Church is defined as "a congregation of faithful men, in which the pure word of God is preached and the sacraments duly administered, according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that of necessity are requisite to the same." The duty of obedience to rulers and the authority of federal and State constitutions are set forth. A foot note to Article XXIII. says: "It is expected that all our preachers and people who may be under any government will behave themselves as peaceable and orderly subjects." Then, again, look at the general rules. We are commanded to do no harm, to keep the Sabbath, to avoid fighting, brawling, and the drinking of spirituous liquors. This is a specimen of what they contain. So far as our peculiarities of church government make up what we call, and what is Methodism, it is equally free from political taint. In the narrow and partizan sense of the term, there is nothing political in it. There never has been, and it is impossible that there ever should be. The existence of parties, ballot boxes and elections are ignored—they are unknown.

If this is the right place to look for what we are after, then may it be confirmed that this identity, Methodism, never cast a vote, never met in a political caucus, or mingled in the excited arena of the hustings. To suppose it could be otherwise, is as absurd as to charge bloodshed upon a drab coat, or to indict a broad-brim hat for murder! But do not your New Orleans Methodists vote? And do they not fraternize with party organizations? We believe the most of them vote, and very many of them are identified with parties. If, however, they voted as Methodists, they would all vote the same way—or rather, as Methodism is not a political thing, they would not vote at all. But they vote differently, and they vote. In the party aspect of the question, the elements of a prejudice or of an opinion are not in the system—either in its doctrines, morals, or government. If a man has opinions and prejudices, he cannot hold them as a Methodist, and it is not possible that he has derived them from Methodism. Here, the man and the citizen come in view. As such, he is a Democrat, an American, or whatever he likes. It is not the Methodism that is in him, breaking forth; but the man and the citizen, that he is, doing what it listeth and going whither it will.

But what of your ordained politicians? Well, what of the coat and hat? is our answer. Hear the platform: "It appertaineth to the office of a deacon to assist the elder in divine service. And especially when he ministereth the holy communion, to help him in the distribution thereof, and to read and expound the Holy Scriptures, to instruct the youth, and in the absence of the elder to baptize." The deacon, before he is ordained, solemnly expresses the trust "that he is inwardly moved by the Holy Ghost to take upon him the office of the ministry of the Church of Christ, to serve God for the promotion of His glory and the edifying of His people." Reference to the ordination of elders exhibits the obligations and duties of ministers in a still stronger light. There is nothing in this out of which anything political can be educed. On the contrary, we can not conceive of a minister, clothed with such obligations, and admitting their force, leaving the care of souls and the ministration of the Word for the political platform. He may do it as a man and as a citizen, but his ministerial character is necessarily put off, when that of the political advocate is put on. Whatever it is that mounts the stump, it is not the Methodist preacher. It is not the fruit of the system, but it is a development outside of it. Until men gather figs of thistles and grapes grow on thorns, this lamentable phenomenon cannot be charged upon Methodism. It has no representative in the party organizations of the day, it has no mouth-piece for the utterance of political strife. We have not taken this political dog by the ears; we protest against bringing these issues into the Church; and we are sure that the Methodists of New Orleans repudiate the representative character of any one, in a political sense.

WOODSMAN.

Death of the Hon. C. W. Clifton.—We are sorry to hear, says the Baton Rouge Advocate of the 24th, that the Hon. C. W. Clifton, of Pointe Coupee, a candidate for the Senate from the parishes of West Baton Rouge, Pointe Coupee and West Feliciana, went last week to Lobdell's Landing, and while there was attacked with the fever. He started for home but was unable to go further than the residence of Mr. Hunter, on Fausse river, where he died on Wednesday night. Mr. Clifton was a gentleman of education and talent, and in the Senate, last session, commanded a great deal of influence. He was generally beloved by all who knew him.

Crop of Sugar of 1854.—The quantity of sugar made in Louisiana for the above year, was 346,635 hhds. This is a deficiency from the year previous of 102,689 hhds. The product of this now necessary article of consumption, for the last ten years appears to have been as follows:

1854	346,635 hhds.	1849	247,923 hhds.
1853	449,324 "	1848	220,000 "
1852	621,934 "	1847	248,000 "
1851	236,547 "	1846	140,000 "
1850	211,208 "	1845	189,500 "

Average per year, 260,706 hhds. Average for the ten years previous, say from 1835 to 1844, was 97,800 hhds. The crop of 1835 being only 86,000 hhds.

Commerce of Boston.—The Boston Chronicle of the 18th inst., says: "There are now 220 ships, barks and brigs in port, and about 175 schooners, making a fleet of nearly 400 sail of vessels. During the present week, there has arrived at this port the splendid ships Flying Fish, Capt. Nickels; the Winged Arrow, Santa Claus, Dolphin, Crusader, and Cyclone. These six ships brought immense and valuable cargoes of linseed, saltpetre, Manilla hemp, sugar, 11,000 bags Java coffee, pepper, hides, copper, drugs, etc., from Calcutta, Pedang and Manilla."

There are now in Australia, in connection with the Methodist Church, 146 regular clergymen, beside a number of native assistant ministers; 19,897 members, of whom 7199 are Europeans, and the remainder native converts in New Zealand, the Friendly Islands and Feejee; 85,576 Sunday and day scholars; 80,000 attendants upon the ministry; 442 churches and 89 other preaching places.

Alabama and Tennessee River Railroad.—The Selma Sentinel says that the contract has been let out for laying the iron on the above named railroad, from its present terminus to Columbiana, and that the work was to be commenced on the 17th inst.

The St. Louis Democrat of the 14th inst. says they learn from their correspondent in Kansas, that the Legislature has passed a bill affixing the penalty of death for all attempts to interfere with or entice away slaves. The introduction of any abolition document into the territory tending to incite slaves to rebellion, is made punishable with death.

Naval.—Accounts from Canton of June 6, state that there were at Canton the United States guardship J. P. Kennedy; at Macao, the U. S. steamer Powhatan; at Shanghae, the U. S. frigate Macedonian.

The U. S. frigate Vandalia sailed for Manilla on the 2d instant.

Boot and Shoe Trade.—The Boston Chronicle of the 18th inst. says that the business has been unusually active in that city for a few weeks. It is said that more boots and shoes had been sold in Boston within the past three weeks, than were ever before sold in the same length of time.

Receipts of Cotton.—Yesterday the receipt of cotton was extraordinarily large for this season of the year. The Princess brought 3376 bales; D. S. Stacey, 1533; Republic, 770; W. N. Sherman, 550; Jenn Wehre, 186; Aleck Scott, 325; schooner Diamond, 41—making a total of 6779 bales, of which 5139 were of the new crop.

A gentleman, just arrived from the lower part of our parish, informs us that it is quite healthy below, with the exception of Pattersonville, in which there is much sickness prevailing, and some cases of yellow fever. He states, on the authority of a physician, that a young man died from this disease a few days since, and that Mr. McCoy, of the firm of McCoy & Knight, was down with it. We hear of no sickness at Centerville, here, or in the upper part of the parish. Party spirit runs so high here that little is thought of the fever. [Franklin (St. Mary) Banner, 23d inst.

Antiquities at the Lawrence Cemetery.—Workmen employed in the cemetery in Lawrence, on removing a stump which belonged originally to a large pine tree, and which had been cut so long ago that the stump was very much decayed, found beneath it the remains of an old well. When it was dug no one knows.

THE DOCTORATE DEGREE.

Mr. Editor—In your issue of the 11th inst. is a letter from one Mr. Crochet, which, in the opinion of many of your readers, has done neither your paper nor the cause of religion any good. I allude to a paragraph which has reference to the reports brought by Drs. Green and McFerrin and Rev. A. R. Erwin from the "various college commencements" they had been honoring with their attendance and addresses. Among other matters of appropriate clerical and charitable gossip which Crotchet reports these dignitaries to have come back with, are "wondrous accounts of the temerity shown by these institutions in conferring degrees." "One good brother was made a D. D. who has been noted, it is said, for only two things, viz., an utter want of all the qualifications requisite for the legitimate possession of such an honor, and an anxious desire to possess it. There would, perhaps, have been no harm in gratifying his desire, had not the doing so involved the literary and theological reputation of the Church to which he belongs."

Now, Mr. Editor, Drs. Green and McFerrin I know personally, and Rev. A. R. Erwin I know second handedly; but Mr. Crotchet and myself are strangers; and if his nome de plume be as significant an indication of his natural disposition as the paragraph referred to in his letter gives of his Christian charity and brotherly kindness, it will not materially distress me, nor greatly diminish my earthly peace, if we remain so until the judgment meeting. With my knowledge of the brethren referred to, I can hardly think them capable of such a lack of charity as to have spoken thus of any one of the four brethren who recently received the Doctorate Degree from three of our colleges; or, if mistaken in our estimate of their possession of this cardinal grace, it occurs to me that a recollection of the old adage, so familiar to every preacher, "They who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones," ought to have kept them silent. Albeit, as they are accustomed to experience meetings, they may have been "giving their own experience," and applying it to this "good brother," whomsoever he may be.

So much for these reporters of the "temerity of our colleges."

As for Mr. Crotchet, we have only to say, that we think he had better keep his "perverse conceits" (See crotchet, Webster's Dictionary) concerning brethren out of Christian newspapers. It may be in keeping with his gossiping propensities at home, but adds but little to the character of a religious issue, professing to breathe that charity that "thinketh no evil," and to teach that Christianity which forbids "all uncharitableness."

The uncharitable language employed by this scribbler against the brother alluded to is antagonistic to the true spirit of Christianity, and altogether unworthy (it may be) an aspirant of the Doctorate Degree.

I will close this brief communication by saying to Mr. Crotchet that when a man professing that Christiany which the Savior taught, and which all good men strive to exemplify in their lives, descends so low in the scale of jealousy and envy as to speak of the honest reputation of a servant of the Most High with the levity of contempt, he has departed widely from the precepts of the Divine Master, lost all shame, and forgotten all lessons of self-respect for others, and hissing, but stingless, exhibits the glance and venom of the "lean and hungry Cassius," with the tortuous windings of Mark Anthony.

To relieve his mind of any "perverse conceits" concerning the writer of this, I will state that I am in no position to receive the Doctorate, and cannot, even in the widest range of his "perverse conceits," be charged with winning.

A. Z.

Alabama, August 1855.

Editor's Remarks.—Every Editor has more or less acquaintance with the species to which "A. Z." belongs—those clever, amiable people who generally read a borrowed newspaper, and volunteer opinions to the editor how to make his paper more interesting, &c. They have a way—all their own—of speaking for "many of your readers" in modestly propounding their own conceits.

How people differ! Crotchet is one of our best and most liked correspondents. A communication from a finished scholar and genuine Methodist of Alabama lies before us, in which occur these passages: "Your independent and fearless correspondent, 'Crotchet.'" And again: "And yet none of them is found, save Crotchet alone, to lift up his voice against so glaring an evil. We do so admire the moral courage and hardihood of your correspondent. He is not afraid to board the lion in his den." And this is the judgment, we believe, of nine-tenths of our readers. While meekly submitting to the chastisement inflicted upon our editorial indiscretion by a self-constituted censor, we must be allowed to express a little astonishment at the complexion "A. Z." puts upon the "Doctorate Degree." It used to be a question of merit, and conferred pro merito; "A. Z." makes it a charity. If any one objects to its being conferred, in any case, the objector is charged with a "lack of charity;" and if any "religious issue" be so bold as to publish the objections, though shorn of all personalities, said "religious issue" violates "that Christianity which forbids all uncharitableness," &c.

Ah! "A. Z." you may represent some of our readers, but not our patrons. They like an honest, outspoken opinion, a distinct and bold position—communications that have an edge to them. And, forsooth, so do we.

Health of Baton Rouge.—There are many cases of sickness now in town, but all those taken in time yield easily to medicine. We ask the unacclimated, says the Advocate of the 27th, in particular, and citizens generally, to avoid the night air as much as possible.

The antiquities which the agents of the French Government have been employed for years in bringing together, from the various ruins of Assyria and Babylonia, for deposit in the museum of the Louvre, have all been lost.

Missionary Reports.

GERMAN MISSION.

Rev. H. N. McTyeire, Assistant Treasurer of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, South.

As time is rolling fast, and our days of usefulness are shortening with every brief week and month that passes from the shores of time into eternity, we wish to give an account, through you, to the friends of our beloved Zion, of the work of God among our German Missions in the Crescent City.

The great Head of the Church is still prospering this part of missionary labor. It is true, we have not been able to engage our time in collecting funds to build chapels, as we were appointed, but we have not been idle, and never will be as long as health and life remains.

While, for many well grounded causes, we stnid at our post—not however to build up a pile of bricks and mortar, but to blow the gospel trumpet as loud and as importuning as ever—we have been collecting material from the building up of a spiritual house unto God and our Saviour, Jesus Christ. To him we will give all the glory and ascribe the praise for the success we have had thus far.

Since the session of our Conference many precious souls have been gathered into the Church. The most of them were happily converted to God. Some have already gone through the solemn gates of death triumphantly to join the innumerable throng in white before the throne of God and the Lamb. It is indeed a joyful work, to be engaged in inviting the wayfaring multitude with the prophetic cry, "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters; and he that hath no money, come ye and eat; yea, come, buy wine and milk, without money and without price." Thus whilst we are taking such in that give heed to the cry, and appoint them a seat at the water's side, the harvesting angels are passing by, to bring home the ripe sheaves with shouting and rejoicing.

THE FIRST MISSION.

The chapel has been thronged with attentive hearers Sunday after Sunday. God, however, in his unerring providence, saw fit to lay his afflicting hand heavily upon this society. In spring, a sort of fever and cholera, called by some of the physicians the pernicious fever, carried some to the tomb and laid many upon a bed of sickness. But since July until now the yellow fever is mowing them down like grass. About twenty have died, triumphant in a living faith and in the hope of a glorious immortality. Some twenty-five have been sick but are recovering again.

The hard money-and-labor-source times have not a little oppressed us. We saw no possibility of laying the foundations of our projected church, which is so much wanted. The brethren would have built, ere this time, a frame Church, at a cost of about $4,000—$2,000 are in their hands, and about $1,000 subscribed—but as we had been waiting so long with a firm conviction that we must have a brick church here of larger dimensions, we will still wait for a more propitious time to build it. The society was thinned down from 100 to 60 by deaths, removals, &c. The Sunday School is in a healthy condition, with fifty-five children in attendance. It, too, has been thinned by the same causes.

The missionary labors with an untiring zeal; he attends punctually to the temporal as well as to the spiritual wants of the flock.

THE SECOND MISSION.

This mission reminds me of the meandering brook, flowing noiselessly through a large plain, fertilizing as it flows, leaving the passer-by to judge of its influence by the green of its banks. Peace and harmony has ever characterized this society. Every one of its members is a working part of the whole. It is gradually increasing. Hardly ever do we have to perform that painful duty of expelling any. It is true, we lose members by removals, but they are not lost to the Church in general. They have been graciously spared this year from sickness of yellow fever—to this very hour not one is sick among them. Our meetings are well attended on Sundays and week day evenings. The society numbers fifty-six members. The Sunday School has grown up to seventy children, who seem to progress well in the knowledge of the word of God.

We have had the boldness, six weeks ago, to carry our warfare right among the devil's camp. There are on the outskirts of the Third District, between Bagatelle street and the Pontchartrain Railroad, three beer gardens, with dancing saloons, within a stone's-throw of each other, in full operation every Sunday afternoon. One of these establishments did not bring the owner profit enough, so he hauled down his flag and shut it up. As we passed, we thought that it would make a fine place for opening a Sunday School; forthwith some of the brethren went to the proprietor, and he was kind enough to rent it to us at $5 per month. We have now a Sunday school in progress here of 100 children. At the close of the school, we preach a short sermon to the old. Had we the means, a chapel should in a short time supercede the dancing saloon, as it seems to be the strong desire of the neighborhood, which is almost entirely German. The prospect for this mission is at this time as fair as ever.

THE THIRD MISSION.

Here we are not quite so successful. The brother who had charge of this mission was obliged to leave it, on account of ill health. The mission is, however, supplied with preaching by the local brethren. Four of the members have moved away and one has died of yellow fever, in a glorious prospect of eternal life.

A fine parcel of ground has been secured for this mission, to build a chapel upon, as soon as the times will permit. This mission is in Carrollton.

THE FOURTH MISSION.

Here, also, the fell destroyer has done sad work. Much sickness has prevailed in the Fourth District for now nearly two months, and a large share of it fell on the members of this society. Some have died, others are just recovering again. The missionary had almost constantly to attend on the sick and bury the dead. Yet, after all, the work looks promising.

A good parsonage has been built on the church lot, which is now ready for the missionary to move into. This part of our work has been constantly surrounded with difficulties and obstacles of every sort, but, without a prophet's vision, we predict that it will finally become one of our most interesting works in the city.

Our constant and united prayer is, that God would raise us up two or three more able missionaries for our German work in New Orleans. Truly, the harvest is great and the laborers are few. And while our prayers go up day and night to God that he would thrust out laborers, we desire sympathy in the hearts of our more wealthy brethren. Dear brethren in Christ, heirs to the same glorious heaven, could we not excite your benevolent zeal to this promising mission work? Could we show you its magnitude and its results, we are sure that you would willingly open your purses and hand over your surplus money for the cause—to help our infant weakness in the glorious struggle for liberty from sin. O, may the dying love of Jesus Christ interest you to help us, so that we may ultimately be able to help ourselves.

There may be some pious hearts who are yearning for an opportunity to do something for Christ's cause, if they knew where it was most needed. Permit me, dear friends of our beloved Zion, to say, that you cannot invest in a more promising enterprise than our Beer Garden Sunday School. Bro. McTyeire will please kindly to receive all donations that may be sent for this purpose. Do send us something, we are in great need of immediate help. But, above all, may we have the prayers of the Church of Christ for the blessing of God upon our work!

JOHN M. HOFER, Missionary.

Miscellaneous News Items.

The New York News of the 20th inst., gives the following account of a mutiny on ship board at Sandy Hook, on the day previous:

This morning, while the brig Abby Thexter, Capt. Wiswell, bound for Lisbon, was preparing to sail, with a pilot on board, the crew attempted a mutiny, but were subdued by the officers and are now in irons. Their reasons for mutinying are not known. The brig is at anchor in the lower bay awaiting assistance from the revenue cutter Washington, which has been sent for and is momentarily expected.

The deaths in New York for the week ending on the 18th inst., were 663; 78 men, 66 women, 276 boys and 220 girls—30 not given.

This shows an increase of 41 over the previous week. The deaths among the young are unusually large. Of the whole number of deaths but 40 occurred in the public hospitals.

A Texas paper comes out with a long biographical sketch of Col. H. L. Kinney, and announces him as a candidate for the Presidency in 1856.

In the year 1784 the Legislature of Pennsylvania, to abolish a practice then prevailing, passed the following resolution, after considerable opposition: "That hereafter no member shall come into the chamber barefooted, nor eat his bread and cheese on the steps of the capitol."

The Crops.—We hear much complaint, says the Montgomery Advertiser, of the 23d inst., of the damage to the cotton crop by the continuance of wet weather in this region. The planters, it is said, are in the habit of "crooking" more than any other class of our fellow-citizens; but from what we have seen in this vicinity, we incline to the opinion that their complaint in the present instance is not without foundation. The cotton crop in Montgomery and the adjacent counties will, we fear, fall considerably below the expectations indulged some weeks ago. All other crops are reported to be good, the corn crop unusually so.

On the 19th inst. a man named George W. Powers, alias Gildersleeve, was arrested in Louisville charged with forgery. There were found on his person two checks on the Bank of Louisville for $1500 each, one of which was filled up with ink, and the other with pencil. He had in his possession a trunk marked "E. Chassaw," full of children's clothing, and a trunk marked "O. W. Philips," well filled with men's wearing apparel. He also had a lot of blank checks and several letters addressed to a gentleman in Nashville, Tenn.

The Baltimore Sun of the 20th states that the handsome sum of $7,130 had been raised by volunteer subscriptions in that city for the relief of the sufferers in Norfolk and Portsmouth.

Some time since the gutta percha telegraph wire, sunk under the river at the Highlands, N. Y., belonging to the New York and Sandy Hook Telegraph Company, was badly hacked and cut and several hundred feet of it stolen by some unknown scoundrels. Temporary repairs have been made so that the line is now in working order.

Vestiges of the Albany.—A Cambridge correspondent of the Boston Post furnishes to that newspaper the following extract from a private letter, dated Beaufort, S. C. If authentic, it would seem to show that the missing sloop-of-war Albany did not sink so suddenly as not to allow some one to make preparation for saving his life:

"J——'s men picked up two very nice water casks at Bay Point; they were plugged so as to be water-light, and tied together; they also had nails driven in so slightly that we thought they must have had boards nailed to them, and J. tells me to-day that when securing them in order to paint them, he discovered the letters 'U. S. ship Albany.'

"P. S.—J. tells me that the letters on the cask are 'U. S. ship Bany.' The A is not visible, and the B very distinct.

The Kirkland Cotton Mills, near Washington City, were burnt on the 19th inst. Loss, $30,000; insured for $20,000. They were owned by E. S. Brayton.

On Tuesday, the 16th inst., the Hon. John Rowan died at his residence in Nelson county, Ky., in the forty-fifth year of his age.

The Chambers (Ala.) Tribune, of the 24th inst., says that rain has fallen in abundance in that region the past week. The season is quite unfavorable for farmers.

Dr. Reuben Berry, Jr., of Memphis, a young man of much promise, has received an appointment as surgeon in the Russian army, and has left Memphis to proceed by the next European steamer to his post.

The correspondent of the St. Louis Republican, writing from Kansas, says that Dr. Stringfellow has offered a resolution in the Kansas Legislature to take the vote of the people on the question of calling a convention of the people to frame a constitution, prior to Kansas being admitted into the Union. It sets the first Monday in October as the day on which the polls should be opened, and the people are to vote "Convention or "no Convention," on that day. If the majority are in favor of a convention, provided this resolution passes, we may expect a petition from Kansas to be admitted as a State at the next session of Congress. Dr. S.'s resolution was referred to a select committee of Messrs. Marshall, Anderson and Mathias, who will report shortly. The impression was that the resolution would be adopted.

A young man, a stranger, went around in Coburg, (Canada) and summoned a Coroner's jury to meet at a certain place, at twelve o'clock in the day. After the jury had assembled, he walked into the room where they were assembled, and deliberately cut his throat. No cause is assigned for the act.

An attempt was made to burn down the office of the Norfolk Beacon, on the night of the 18th inst. Between 9 and 10 o'clock a fire was discovered in the second story, under the steps leading to the third story. This is the third attempt to burn the office in the past three years.

The Rev. Dr. Sears was, on the 21st inst., unanimously elected President of Brown University.

The Richmond Dispatch speaks of a pamphlet just published, which estimates that, within the last forty years 61,624 slaves have escaped from the South, or about a hundred annually; and that the total loss is $27,740,800.

Queen Isabella of Spain, it is said, has given all the linen in her palace—1500 pieces—for the hospitals where the cholera patients are confined, and is adding to this, very considerable means in money.

The new Five Points House of Industry will be a fine brick building, fire-proof, and, in all respects adapted to the wants of the Mission, with a chapel, school and work-rooms, dormitories, etc. The cost of the building and ground will be $30,000, including $11,000 paid for the latter. It is about 55 by 100 feet, and will have a height of six stories. It stands on the spot formerly known as "Fellow's Court," which was occupied by a wretched class of people, and, according to the landlord, often contained 600 inmates. It will probably be finished by the 1st of December. The old premises will still be retained as a part of the Mission property, and leased to worthy families.

Special Notices.

The managers and directors of the New Orleans Tract Society will hold their monthly meeting at McGehee Church, Carondelet street, on Saturday evening, Sept. 1, at the usual hour. Punctual attendance is respectfully requested. JOHN IRVINE, Sec.

The time of holding the camp meeting at Bethel, Wilkinson Co., Miss., is changed from 5th Sabbath in Sept. to embrace 3d Sabbath in Oct; commencing on previous Wednesday. Ministers, itinerant and local, are invited to attend. W. B. HINES.

Deaths.

DIED—Of typhoid fever, in Copiah county, Miss., August 9, JAMES J. DECELL.

He joined the Church and was converted in a protracted meeting of extraordinary power, held by Bro. S. L. L. Scott, at Pleasant Valley, in the fall of '49 or '50. From that time till his death he continued steadfast in the faith, abounding in the work of the Lord. Religion, deeply rooted in an ardent and enthusiastic nature, full of generous impulses and kind sympathies, bore the richest fruits. He lived from the time of his conversion almost daily with the Spirit. He never was satisfied unless he felt his religion in his heart. He loved the shouting blessing, and often did God give it to him. He loved prayer and class meetings, attending for several years every week, except when detained by sickness, as many as four prayer meetings, at several miles distance, and by foot, besides the class meeting and sermon on the Sabbath. He loved to contribute to the support of the gospel, and to its diffusion among the heathen. He trained up his children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, by showing to them the example of a Christian father, and by gathering them around the alter of family prayer and reading to them God's precious word, and lifting the voice of earnest prayer to him who hears and answers. He was willing to do all he could for his Master; he prayed in public, and exhorted occasionally with great unction and power.

He was mere anxious to grow in grace than in wealth; he talked more about heavenly than about earthly things. He confined to his bed about six weeks, but talked that while lying there he had thought about little else than heaven. He was ready, and the bright angels bore his glad and exulting spirit away to our Father's mansions above.

He leaves a widow and six little children to mourn, and but God will take care of them. Bro. Reid is another victim to the disease that has swept off so many of the purest spirits of Pleasant Valley Church, but it is God's church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. We are but the fragments of broken families, societies, but God is gathering them anew on the better and far off shore, never more to be broken up.

Clinton, La. J. J. WHEAT.

DIED—Near Mobile, July 14, 1855, Mrs. C. STIENBACH, in the 33d year of her age.

She finished her course in the peaceful triumphs of the gospel faith. Her disease, that lingering malady, consumption, whose sufferings were long and severe, but she bore them with Christian meekness and fortitude, giving evidence to all around her of her identity with the church above. She was born in Claiborne, Ala., reared and educated in Virginia, at about fourteen years of age, profession of religion, and during last illness she assured a near friend that at that time she had never doubted her acquaintance with God. With this assurance she died, and we doubt not that she has entered that rest which remains for the people of God, and dwells with those who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." P.

Richmond Christian Advocate please copy.

DIED—At Bolton's Depot, Hinds county, Miss., August 10, SIDNEY E. THOMAS, aged 2 years, less eight days.

The deceased was the son of David C. and Mary J. Thomas, of this county. Rarely are hearts called to mourn the loss of such a child possessed as he was of great amiability of disposition, of a sprightly intellect and of unusual piety, he commanded the love and esteem of all who knew him.

About two years since we had the pleasure of receiving him into the Methodist Church at Brownsville, since which time, during his absence at College, at home, and in every place in which he moved, he sustained and adorned an upright course of Christian conduct, often remarked and always respected both by his comrades. During his last illness, which was painful in the extreme, he deceased evinced a striking resignation to the will of God, and an unshaken confidence in the mediation of his risen Redeemer—that confidence at times associated with audible strains in the hope of the glory revealed and in the gospel of love and triumph.

He has passed from earth and its dangers to heaven's high felicity my friend and brother,

JAMES A. GODFREY.

Jackson, Miss., Aug. 16, 1855.

DIED—At the residence of her father, in Brownsville, on the 23d ult., Mrs. MARGARET A. BAKER, aged 27 years.

She joined the Methodist Episcopal Church at the age of eleven, and remained a worthy member until her death. She was sick about three weeks, and though her sufferings were great, she bore them without a murmur. For several days before her death she had entire resignation to the will of God, and when the final hour came she gently fell asleep without a struggle.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP PACIFIC.

The U. S. mail steamer Pacific, from Liverpool, Saturday, Aug. 11th, arrived at New York on the morning of the 22d inst., at half-past 6 o'clock. M'lle Rechel and suite are among the passengers.

The news by this arrival is unsatisfying—many rumors and few facts. Nothing definite from the Crimea. Private advices say that the bombardment had been resumed, but, as yet, we do not know with what effect. General Markam is spoken of in certain circles as likely to succeed to the command; but the statement is doubtful. Sir Colin Campbell's appointment would be more popular. The Queen is desirous to nominate the Duke of Cambridge, but he prudently declines the honor, offering, however, to go out as second in command. Meantime, General Simpson continues with the army. Omar Pacha is appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Turks in Asia. Some operations, of no great moment, have been executed by the Allies in the Sea of Azoff. The Black Sea fleet is still concentrated for some great movement; a coup de main is confidently expected in the Baltic. Ninety ships are assembled at Nargen, and opinions on board are divided as to whether their destination be Revel or Sweaborg—most probably the latter.

The well informed Paris correspondent of the London Times states that Austria has just made spontaneous advances of more friendly relations towards the Western Powers. Lord Palmerston, in Parliament, conveyed a similar meaning, but the public are slow to believe in Austrian friendship.

Turin correspondence is full of allusion to what is termed a "legitimist conspiracy." The sum and substance of the affair seems to be that two Frenchmen, MM. D'Escare and Chapot, have been in communication with the Count of Montemolino, with the immediate view of encouraging the Carlist insurrection in Spain, and the ulterior hopes of bringing about a favorable chance for Henry V. So-called Russian complicity is proved in the matter, and the French Government has eagerly seized the opportunity of making political capital both at home and in Spain. Closely following on the exposure of this "conspiracy" is an announcement that Spain will definitely contribute 25,000 men to the Allies, (to be paid by France and England) and that France agrees to uphold the throne of Isabella against all danger from whatever source. The intelligence is stated in positive form, but requires further confirmation.

The present visit of the King of Portugal to London is said to be with a view of insuding Portugal in the alliance of the Western Powers.

The King of Hanover has issued a proclamation denuing his position with reference to the modifications of the constitution of 1848, which he virtually repeals. Count Kielmausegge has gone to Frankfort to request the aid of the federal troops to suppress any attempted remonstrance.

THE WAR.

July 28.—Gen. Simpson telegraphs: "Since my dispatch of the 24th, I have nothing of importance to relate. We continue to strengthen and improve our advanced works, which are now so close to the enemy's defences that I regret to say our casualties are necessarily considerable. The enemy exhibit great activity in adding to and improving the defences, and the conveyance of military stores from the north to the south side is increasing. Cholera has nearly ceased in the ranks of the army."

August 2, evening.—Prince Gortschakeff writes: "Nothing of importance is going on. The vigor of the (Russian) fire prevents the works of the besiegere from advancing, and their fire is weaker."

August 4.—General Simpson telegraphs "that the Russians made a night sortie on the Worozeff road, as far as the cheveux-de-frise, but were repulsed without trouble."

August 7, 11 P. M.—Pelissier telegraphs: "Nothing of interest to communicate. The enemy has not undertaken anything against our trenches. Some cases of cholera have reappeared.

Turkish Camp above Kamara.

Letters of date the 28th July mention that the French camp on the Tchernayu, as well as the Turkish and Sardinian contingents, had been kept for some days on the alert, in consequence of a report that the Russians were about to attack the Tchernaya line. The alarm, however, passed off. The Sardinians continue to occupy Tchorgoun, which they have strongly fortified; the French and English cavalry, and recently a Turkish detachment are in the valley of Baidar.

Sea of Azoff.

A dispatch is published, as follows in the Paris papers:

"News has been received, via Vienna, from Taganrog, dated 25th of July. Taganrog had been bombarded for some days by the Allied ships. An English steam sloop had got on shore and was burned by the Russians, but the crew escaped.

"The town of Berdiansk, on the Sea of Azoff, had been again bombarded. The damage done by the Allies is considerable."

Asia—The Siege of Kars.

Letters from Kars are to July 14. There was no truth in the report of the expedition of Schamyl against Tefflis. Between the 7th and 14th frequent engagements took place between the advanced posts near Kars. On the 10th the Russians made a strong reconnoissance and an unsuccessful attack against Kara Dagh, and on the 11th made an equally unsuccessful reconnoissance upon Tchakmak.

On the 12th, they proceeded in the direction of Erzeroum, leaving but an advanced guard within view of Kurs, but on the 13th, again approached the city, with all their force, divided into three columns—one of which formed their reserve. After vainly endeavoring to draw the Ottoman troops out of their entrenchments, by keeping just beyond the range of their guns, the Russians returned in the evening to their camp. Sherif Pasha had abandoned his stores to the Russians between Kurs and Erzeroum.

Gen. Vivian has gone to select a landing place for troops near Batoum.

Omar Pasha is appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Turkish army in Asia Minor.

The Baltic.

There is every indication of a coup de main to be attempted against one or more of the Baltic fortresses. All the ships of both fleets are being collected at Nargen, and letters mention a general anticipation that Sweaborg and Helsingfors will be immediately attacked. A rumor, afterwards contradicted, was current that Revel had actually been bombarded with success.

Dispatches which have been received from Capt. Yelverton, relate that on 29th July, he took possession of the island of Kotka, without resistance, and destroyed the fortifications and stores—the garrison having evacuated.

The White Sea.

Russian accounts of the movements of the Allied squadron in the White Sea are published. On the 9th July, an English steamer approached the village of Iiamtsa, in the Onega district, and sent ashore four boats with a "white and red flag," but the inhabitants fired upon the boats and caused them to return to the steamer, which then fired for three hours upon the place. Two boats again attempted to land, but were again compelled to retire. Next morning the steamer put to sea. Most of the English shells fell without bursting, and they picked up above fifty. The village was not much damaged.

On the 28th June an English steamer called at the island of Solevet, and carried off some sheep, and on the 30th two steamers sent ashore a boat at the Kouzoff islands to carry off some reindeer. On the 14th July, an English steamer loaded a schooner, belonging to a monastery, in the Gulf of Onega, with firewood and furniture, and took it away.

Italy

The celebrated General William Pepe is dead.

Gen. Percy, appointed by the British Government to organize the Italian legion, has arrived at Turin.

A telegraphic dispatch states that the Emperor Napoleon has made an energetic demand that the Pope shall reform and secularize his Government, with the view of remedying the present state of disorganization in the territories of the Church. Two congregations have been held, and decided to refuse the request.

LATER FROM TEXAS.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMER MEXICO.

The United States mail steamship Mexico, Capt. J. Y. Lawless, arrived Tuesday from Indianola via Galveston, bringing $9,500 in specie; to the following consignees:

Union Bank	$7,000
Millaudon, Mollé & Co.	2,250
Hall, Kemp & Co.	100
Thompson, Allen & Co.	90
Total	$9,500

The Galveston News, of 25th inst., says that drenching rains have washed the streets for the two days previous. No new cases of yellow fever had occurred among the citizens. A gentleman from Fort Graham informs the News that the corn crop will be short in that section in consequence of drought. Corn was selling at two dollars a bushel. The wheat crop, harvested some time ago, was very fair. The gentleman had traveled over the best wheat growing section of the Western States, yet he thinks the upper district of Texas superior to them all for raising wheat. One reason is, that the wheat in Texas keeps growing all the winter, and branches more, producing a greater number of heads than in colder regions.

Frost Falls county down to Harris, the rains have been more seasonable, and the prospects for cotton are very good. Our informant heard nothing of the dreaded cotton-worm. The health of the country is excellent, and in the high broken country around Fort Graham, new settlers have not required the services of a physician.

A correspondent of the News from Houston says that the fever which prevailed there had terminated.

The Indianola Bulletin, of the 24th, says the health of that city is excellent—there having been but one death in two months.

The Lavaca Herald, of the 18th, says the health of that place is good, and yellow fever—a few cases of intermittent bilious fever prevail, but to a very limited extent.

The Victoria Advocate, of the 18th, says that from all indications there is reason to hope the coast will escape an epidemic this year. The health of Victoria continues excellent.

From all parts of the country favorable accounts are given of the cotton crops, and there is now little doubt entertained of their abundance.

The political news is not definite—no paper that we have received contains full returns. The vote for and against accepting the "Debt Bill" is very much mixed, so much so that even a guess as to the result would be superfluous.

We have received the Portsmouth Transcript of Friday, 17th inst., in which the editor announces that he will continue to publish the paper occasionally, not being able to do so regularly from want of compositors. It contains the following in relation to the fever there:

Notwithstanding the decrease in our population, probably not more than 1500 to 2000 whites remaining in town, the fever continues with little if any abatement. About an equal number of new cases occur daily, and the deaths average from seven to ten, as will be seen by the list below. Dr. Muupin, whose practice is extensive, informs us that the sickness seems to be changing, and the fever, he thinks, is more of an intermittent character and less fatal than it has been. The panic in the community has subsided to a considerable extent, and the few now left seem disposed to remain and abide the consequences; indeed, it is a matter of necessity. There appears to be no alternative, as we are almost wholly cut off from all communication and association with "the rest of mankind." But while the doors of our sister towns and cities are closed against us, the hearts of many are open to our distresses. Liberal contributions have been forwarded for the relief of the poor and suffering in our midst, and our hearts are filled with gratitude to those who forget us not in the time of our trials.

In a population of 2000, the deaths average eight a day. Miss Lucy Andrews, of Syracuse, New York, had arrived in Norfolk, and offered her services as nurse. Dr. Sylvester, of the Norfolk Board of Health, is dead.

On the 17th, there were twenty-nine new cases. On the 19th, there was no slight abatement in the virulence of the fever at Norfolk, while at Portsmouth it was more violent than ever.

LATE FROM KANSAS.—From a correspondent of the St. Louis Republican, we learn that the hands employed at Fort Riley had rebelled, broken into the arsenal, supplied themselves with arms, ammunition, money and provisions, and started off for the States. The officers of the Fort dispatched the few soldiers, who were spared from the ravages of the cholera, in pursuit of them, but they soon returned with three of their number dead and a fourth mortally wounded, and stated that when they came upon the insurgents they were fired on, pursued, and threatened with instant death, and that they were exceedingly lucky to escape with their lives. The insurgents were armed with muskets and pistols, and declared it to be their intention to die rather than be taken.

The trouble was caused by the physician of the post deserting his place, and the command sent of the post refusing to give them money to go home with before they had worked out their contract with the Government.

THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE FAIR.—The New York Tribune, of August 18th, says the Managers of the American Institute Fair are actively engaged in making their arrangements for the fair to be held in the Crystal Palace in October next. They have commenced putting up the shafting, and a steam engine was yesterday put in operation for facilitating that work. The prospect is that a very large exhibition will be made. Among the attractions will be a show of fire engines and apparatus in the Palace during the fair, to be practically tested. Invitations have been extended to all the fire departments of the neighboring cities, and some are expected from a distance to take part in the contest.

SICKNESS IN BATON ROUGE.—The Gazette of the 26th says: "We are sorry to learn that there were quite a number of new cases of yellow fever yesterday. The disease, though on the increase, we are told by our physicians, yields readily to proper treatment."

The Nurney House has been closed for the time being on account of the sickness.

Owing to the same cause, the Democratic Convention, called for the purpose of making parish nominations, adjourned without doing anything.

We sincerely regret the affliction that has fallen upon our fellow citizens of the State capital. But, looking over the list of interments, we find no familiar names, and therefore conclude that these, as here, nine-tenths of the mortality takes place among the transient, floating, unacclimated population. Still the fatality is deplorable.

Magnetic Telegraph.

ARRIVAL OF THE CANADA.

ONE WEEK LATER FROM EUROPE.

Destruction of Sweaborg.

IMPORTANT FROM THE CRIMEA.

BY THE NATIONAL AND SOUTHERN LINES.

HALIFAX, August 22.—The Cunard steamship Canada from Liverpool on Saturday, the 18th inst., arrived at this port last night.

Her advices from the seat of war are of an important character, and are of course one week later than those by the Pacific at New York.

Destruction of Sweaborg.

The bombardment of Sweaborg by the Allied fleet, which, according to previous accounts, commenced on the 9th inst., had resulted in its total destruction. An immense amount of property was destroyed. The loss of life was trifling.

Russian Defeat.

From the Crimea the most important information is that on the 16th inst., the Russian General, Liprandi, attacked the Allied lines on the Tchernaya, and was repulsed with immense loss.

Sebastopol.

Our dispatch states that the bombardment of Sebastopol was kept for the 17th inst. As we have already had information that it recommenced on the 16th, the presumption is that the first statement was erroneous, or that by the bombardment is meant the assault on Sebastopol.

Queen Victoria in France.

The Queen of England was in France on her visit to the Emperor and Empress.

Liverpool Cotton Market.

According to the circular of Messrs. Denistoun & Co., the Liverpool Cotton Market opened in the beginning of the week with an active speculative demand, at an advance of ⅛ to ¼ of a penny per pound; but during the last two days the market became dull.

The sales for the week were 80,000 bales, including 24,000 bales on speculation, and 4500 for export. The market closed steadily on Friday at the following quotations: Fair Orleans, 7⅞d; Middling Orleans, 6 7-16d; Fair Uplands, 6 7-8d; and Middling Uplands, 6¾d. per lb.

The stock of American in port was estimated at 383,000 bales.

State of Trade.

The advices from Manchester present a favorable aspect.

Breadstuffs

The circular of Messrs. Brown, Shipley & Co. quotes the Flour market dull at a decline of six pence per bbl. Western Canal was quoted at 30s. to 40s., and Ohio 42s. per bbl.

Wheat also was a trifle lower, with very little speculative demand.

Corn was dull and nominal at a decline of one shilling and six pence per quarter.

The accounts from the crops are favorable.

White Corn was quoted at 43s. to 45s., and yellow at 37s. to 37s. 6d. per quarter.

Provisions.

Messrs. Richardson, Spence & Co. quote the Liverpool provision market as generally unchanged.

Consols, Money, etc.

The London money market was more stringent.

Consols for money were quoted at 91 to 91¼.

The bullion in the Bank of England had increased £43,000.

American securities were in active demand at unchanged prices, except railroad bonds, in which there was little doing.

SECOND DISPATCH.

Bombardment of Sweaborg.

Further accounts of the bombardment of Sweaborg represent that the place took fire, and continued to burn for forty-five hours. The magazines, stores and provisions blew up. About sixty of the Allied force were wounded, but none killed. At the latest accounts Sweaborg had not surrendered.

The Crimea.

The attack on the lines of the Tchernaya, it appears, occurred on the 16th inst., and was made by a force of sixty thousand Russians. The fight lasted five hours, and resulted in a loss to the Russians of five thousand killed and four hundred prisoners. The Russians were in full retreat when the French reserve came up.

Omar Pasha.

Omar Pasha has been ordered to return to the Crimea with despatch.

The Russian Fleet.

Accounts from St. Petersburg state that Hortschakoff has been ordered to burn the fleet if Sebastopol falls.

Asia.

From Asia we learn that Kars has been completely invested, and all communication with Erzeroum stopped by the Russians. The Turks were sending out reinforcements.

The Secret Expedition.

The London Post says that unexpected news may soon be looked for from the Crimea, which is supposed to refer to the secret expedition already reported as fitting out.

The Sound Dues

Denmark is reported to have referred to France respecting the settlement of the Sound Dues question with the United States.

Queen Victoria

Queen Victoria was escorted to Boulogne by six ships of war.

The Fever at Norfolk

NEW YORK, August 23.—Dispatches from Norfolk of today indicate that the fever is still on the increase.

NORFOLK, August 23.—The fever in this city and Portsmouth is increasing to a fearful extent. Mayor Woodis is dead. Thirty-six deaths occurred in this city on Sunday and Monday.

Explosion and Loss of Life.

BALTIMORE, August 23.—The U. S. Coast Survey steamer Helisi has exploded in Chesapeake Bay. Five persons were killed and four wounded.

A Death.

Stephen H. Combs, President of the American Bible Society, died this morning in this city.

New York Market.

NEW YORK, August 23.—Our Cotton Market is dull—300 bales were sold before the publication of the Canada's accounts, and nothing since. Flour is easier, but not quotably lower. Corn is dull, with a declining tendency. Corn is a trifle lower, with sales at 88½ cents per bushel. Mess Pork commands $22 50 per bbl. Cotton and other articles are unchanged.

River Intelligence.

LOUISVILLE, Aug. 23.—The river is rising slowly at this point. The steamer Yuba arrived yesterday from New Orleans.

SOUTHERN AND WESTERN COMMERCIAL CONVENTION.—The Committee appointed by the Commercial Convention that met in this city last winter to designate the time and place of the next meeting, have accepted the invitation of the Board of Trade, of Richmond, to meet there, and, in accordance therewith, have made publication of the following:

In pursuance of the authority vested in the undersigned, by the Commercial Convention of the Southern and Western States, held in the city of New Orleans in January last, and at the public and official invitation of the Board of Trade of the City of Richmond, in Virginia, the Committee has selected the said City of Richmond as the place, and the third Monday (the 19th) in November next, as the time for holding the next session of said Southern and Western Commercial Convention unless the Board of Trade may prefer some other day, of which they will give timely notice.

The committee also take the liberty of requesting all journals and newspapers friendly to these conventions to publish this communication, or such parts thereof as may be requisite to give general notoriety of the time and place selected.

N. D. COLEMAN, Chairman.
LESLIE COMBS, of Kentucky.
JAS. L. LEWIS, of Louisiana.
C. K. MARSHALL, of Mississippi.
M. T. JOHNSON, of Texas.
W. C. DAWSON, of Georgia.
JAS. LYONS, of Virginia.
W. B. H. HOWARD, of Alabama.

BAD WEATHER.—We have had three or four days of the worst weather we have ever known at this season of the year. It commenced on last Saturday afternoon, and has continued ever since. It has been windy cold and wet. What effect it will have upon cotton we cannot yet determine; but it must be greatly to anything but good.—At this season of the year cotton needs warm, sunshiny weather, and we have had the very reverse. The planters have been picking out largely of late, the bolls having opened freely; but this weather has, of course, set them back. We hope it will soon clear up, and that we shall again feel the vivifying rays of a genial summer sun.—[Mobile (Ala.) Repub., Aug 23.

Dr. Stone, of New Orleans, one of the most eminent physicians of that city, arrived here by the Railroad cars on Thursday, and took lodgings at the National Hotel. He visited yesterday the United States Navy Hospital and the City Hospital, and saw many of the sick in Norfolk.

Dr. Stone expresses the opinion that the fever is not a general epidemic in Norfolk. He thinks that the patient should be covered with a sheet and thin blanket, and that the treatment should not be too active.

Dr. Thos. Pemberton, a distinguished physician, also of New Orleans, arrived yesterday, and tendered his services to the Board of Health. He visited several cases in the city during the morning, and in the afternoon went down to the Hospital at Julappi.—[Norfolk Beacon, Aug. 18.

Miscellaneous News Items.

On the 20th inst., says the Boston Chronicle, Roland H Macy and his clerk E F Cushman, of Haverhill, were charged with obtaining $25 000 worth of goods of sundry merchants of this city. The largest amount obtained at any one house was $2000. The complaint was made by E. B. Jordan, of the firm of Jordan, Marsh & Co. B F Bailey, Esq., appeared as counsel for the Government. The defendants were held for examination at a future day, each in the sum of $5000. Bail was furnished.

We regret to announce the decease, at Wheeling, Va., on Sunday morning, the 19th inst., of Mrs Reid, wife of Capt Samuel C Reid, an distinguished in our naval records for his defence of the brig General Armstrong against the English squadron at the port of Fayal in 1814. Mrs Reid was the daughter of Capt Nathan Jennings, of Fairfield, Conn., who shared the plaudits and glory of Trenton on the Continental army under General Washington.

The Boston Traveller states that on Sunday, 19th inst., about nine o'clock, a prize fight took place on Governor's Island, in Boston harbor, between two Englishmen. Three rounds were fought, when the parties stopped. There were about thirty persons present who witnessed the disgraceful proceedings.

As one of the New York city cars was passing down Fulton street, on the 20th inst., a lady with a little girl attempted to pass in front, the little girl being ahead. Before the driver could hold up, the child was nearly under the horse's feet, when a large Newfoundland dog seeing it, bounded to her, and taking her in his mouth, rescued her from the imminent danger of being trampled to death, brought her to the almost distracted mother and laid her down. He looked up and wagged his tail, and gave a short bark expressive of his delight, and away he went.

The Bucks County Agricultural Fair commenced at Doylestown, Pa., on the 21st inst. Some twenty thousand people were in attendance. Horace Greeley delivered an address on the subject of industrial progress.

We learn from the Baton Rouge Advocate that the work in the State Engineer's department is proceeding with great rapidity. A large surveying party are at the Teche, making a survey for the purpose of ascertaining the propriety of establishing locks on that river. The State Engineer is preparing to make a survey in Calcasieu. A large number of hands are engaged in cutting timber on the banks of the Amite, and below the rail on Red river. The boats are all actively employed. The Algerine, Capt White, is employed on the bayous in the Atakapas; the Governor Helm at Clapp, Bradley, &c. on the Teche, and the Governor Walker, Capt. Marks, is doing good service on Red river, above the Falls. A new boat, built on the Amite, has been ready to be launched for a long time, and as soon as the water rises will be set afloat, and the machinery, (which is now ready,) will be placed on board. The work on bayou Plaquemine will be resumed as soon as the stage of the water will permit.

Ex-Governor Thomas Metcalfe, of Kentucky, died at his residence in Nicholas county on Saturday last. In his death the State mourns the loss of a gallant gentleman, an able statesman and a [illegible] orator. Without the advantages of an [illegible] early life, by the forces of genius and its twin sister, industry, he rose to a high position in Kentucky.

The Charleston (S. C.) Courier, of the 23d inst., states that the city is entirely free from fevers of all types, and all other diseases. The health of the city has been remarkably good during the whole season.

The Baton Rouge Comet of the 24th, says that a difficulty occurred the day previous between Edward Hiriart, Warden, and A. N. Booth, Assistant Warden of the Penitentiary. They commenced firing on each other, and Mr Booth received a wound in the thigh. They then grappled and battered each other severely—both parties being much injured. The cause of the difficulty is not known.

The Galveston (Texas) True American says that a party of anti-Americans, composed of traitorous natives and drunken Mexicans, and led by a priest, marched out, on the night after the election, to the peaceful grave of the martyred Fannin, and gloried themselves in shouts of fiendish triumph over their success. What would our Government be in the hands of such as these?

From the Houston (Texas) Telegraph we learn that the fever which has prevailed there is decreasing.

The first bale of new cotton was received in Houston, from the plantation of J. O. Wallis, of Washington county, on the 24 inst.

The Lavaca Herald says an abundant harvest may be relied on.

The Bastrop Advertiser says the wheat crop in Northern Texas will be immensely large.

A correspondent from Freestone county says the crops are doing remarkably well—weather fine for cotton; new corn selling at 35 to 40 cents per bushel.

The cotton crop in Gonzales county is very large—the weather fine for picking.

In Matagorda county the prospects for superior crops are good, although they have a little more rain than is desired. Sugar cane was doing well.

It was reported that the cotton worm had appeared in plantations on the Guadalupe, and was doing serious damage to cotton.

The navigation of the Guadalupe is permanently established; a steamer is running regularly between Saluria and Kemper's Bluff.

From the various Northern cities the contributions continue to flow into Norfolk. They are now suffering more for the want of nurses than for money; with the latter they are amply supplied. A speedy trip to the delegation that left here on Saturday last.

The Kansas Tribune says that the majority of the ladies of Lawrence City have adopted the Bloomer costume, believing it to be more convenient than the style that prevails in this section. During a pleasant day they may be seen in all parts of the city—not walking out for the novelty of the thing, but making calls and pursuing their ordinary avocations, without even apparently suspecting that their costume attracted more than usual attention.

A working engineer, by the name of John Ross, residing in Montreal, has addressed a letter to the Mayor of Boston upon the subject of a recent invention of an extraordinary character. He claims to have discovered a new motive power which will waft a ship across the Atlantic Ocean in three days. And further, it is his theory to bore in the bottom, the vessel would float with equal safety and freedom. In order to complete a working model, which is wholly independent of steam, he asks the assistance of $1 500 from some gentleman's pocket. No progress, says Mr Ross, has been made in that direction (the sea) to keep pace with the movements over railroads on the land; but this desideratum will certainly be accomplished and demonstrated in his great discovery.

The Macon, Ga., Citizen, of the 18th instant says:

On Thursday last, the first bale of new cotton received in this city was brought to the warehouse of T. A. Harris, Esq., from the plantation of Ewell Webb, of Crawford county. The quality Middling Fair, and sold to D. B. Rogers, at eleven cents per pound.

The West Point, Ga., Beacon, of the 18th inst., says:

The first bale of new cotton was brought to this market on Monday last, and sold to Messrs. Frost, Cooper, & Co. for thirteen cents per pound. It was from the plantation of Mrs. H. M. Reid, of Chambers county, Alabama.

COTTON CROP.—The Selma Reporter of the 22d says, that the "rust" and "boll worms" are destroying the cotton at a terrible rate. They were informed by a gentleman that near one-half of the crop was literally ruined, and that it was general in his neighborhood. The "insects," with the cold weather for some time past, will materially lessen the crop, but to what extent they are not able to say. If the destruction is continued much longer, not more than half a crop will be raised. So say planters of undoubted authority.

The estate of the Hon. Abbott Lawrence, whose death was mentioned yesterday, is supposed to be worth $3 000 000.

The want of rain in De Soto parish is felt as a serious drawback to the crops. The interruption of navigation renders provisions very high and times very hard.

The first specimen of new cotton was sold in Charleston, S. C., on the 22d inst., by Messrs. E. H. Rodgers & Co., Factors. It was from the plantation of Mr. George Norris, of Orangeburg District; 10 grade it was classed as good middling, and sold for 13 cents.

A letter from St. Domingo, dated July 28th, states that recently a fleet of Spanish war vessels arrived at that port, to demand from Government an explanation touching some Consular difficulties. The affair was settled satisfactorily, and the vessels departed again.

The Little Rock State Gazette, heretofore a strong Democratic paper, has come out in favor of the American party. The Gazette is edited by Solon Borland and T. C. Dooley.

The Montgomery Mail thus figures up the party strength of the Alabama Legislature:

Senate—Americans 13; Democrat and 16; Whig and 2; and Independent 1.

House—Americans 49; Democrat and 52; Whig and 5.

A Catholic priest in Cleveland, Ohio, was fined five dollars and costs, a few days since, for fast driving.

The drought in the neighborhood of Natchitoches is severe. The town is supplied with water by means of water-carts, from a spring a half a mile from town. Red river is reduced to a rivulet.

A GREAT AND GOOD MAN GONE.

The Hon. Abbot Lawrence, of Massachusetts, died in Boston on the 18th. His demise has already been announced in these columns by telegraph. He was born in Groton, December 16, 1792, and was highly successful in trade for more than a fourth of a century. He was one of the most distinguished merchants of the North. The house to which he belonged, A. & A. Lawrence, was favorably known in every port to which American vessels traded. Throughout the commercial world the name of their firm was a synonym for solvency, honor and unbending rectitude. His great wealth gave him a commanding position in the old Whig party, and he was twice elected to Congress from the city of Boston. In 1848 he was a prominent candidate for the Vice-Presidency of the United States, and on the first ballot Mr Fillmore only led a few votes. A compromise was effected, and Mr Lawrence was sent to the Court of St. James, where he remained as United States Minister during nearly the whole of Mr Fillmore's term.

He represented the United States at the British Court with rare ability, and success. While he did not in the least sacrifice his dignity as a Republican Minister, he so comported himself as to become very popular with the classes that rule the country to which he was accredited.

A letter in the Ost Deutsche Post states that the Archbishop of Cherson has arrived in Sebastopol, having been sent for by Prince Gortschakoff to give his blessing to the army. On the 20th ult., the troops were drawn up upon the Place St. Catherine, and the Archbishop made an address, which is shortly to be published in the Gazetty Russe d'Odessa. Turning to them, Osten-Sacken, he said, "My son, the last time we met (after the bombardment of Odessa,) it was a divine inspiration which led me to say to you, 'Go and fight—and the Lord our God will give you victory.' The words and my prophecy are accomplished. By the defence of the fortress committed to your care, you have gained immortal laurels for yourself and your soldiers. And now I say to you once more—'Fight and triumph, for you are the elect of the Lord, destined to become the scourge of his enemies.'" The writer adds—"It is indeed surprising that General Osten-Sacken, whose military career extends over forty-eight years, who has assisted at more than one hundred battles and combats, in which he has usually been found in the first ranks, has never received even the slightest wound."

THE BLOOM OF AGE.—A good woman never grows old. Years may pass over her head, but if benevolence and virtue dwell in her heart, she is cheerful as when the spring of life first opened in her view. When we look upon a good woman we never think of her age; she looks as charming as when the rose of youth first bloomed on her cheek. That rose has not faded yet; it will never fade. In her neighborhood she is the friend and benefactor. Who does not respect and love the woman who has passed her days in acts of kindness and mercy? We repeat, such a woman cannot grow old. She will always be fresh and buoyant in spirits, and active in humble deeds of mercy and benevolence. If the young lady desires to retain the bloom and beauty of youth, let her not yield to the sway of fashion and folly; let her love truth and virtue, and to the close of life she will retain those feelings which now make life appear a garden of sweets—ever fresh and ever new.

It is stated that our new Minister to Spain, Mr. Dodge, has hinted at the acquisition of Cuba. The bare suspicion that he has done so has brought out the whole Spanish press, including the Official Gazette, against any such purpose.

At a meeting of the directors in Macon, Ga., R. R. Cuyler, Esq., the able President of the Central Road, was unanimously chosen President of the Southwestern Railroad, in the place of its late President, L. G. Reynolds, deceased. Mr. Cuyler will hold the office until the annual meeting of the stockholders in February next, when another election will take place.

IMPERIAL PRESENTS.—The Emperor of the French has sent over to the Institute Canadian, at Montreal, Canada, several beautiful and costly pieces of sculpture in marble—the group of the Laocoon, the Venus of Milo, the Apollo Belvidere, some beautiful candelabra, and a number of books.

QUEER INHERITANCE.—Prentice says: "Three years ago, a man in Mississippi cheated us out of twenty dollars, and now his son cheats us out of about the same sum. The young man's propensity to cheat is probably the only thing he ever came honestly by."

HEALTH OF THE CITY.—The mortuary returns of last week show a gratifying decrease in the city mortality, both by yellow fever and by other diseases. The decrease from the previous week is 41 in the total number of deaths, and 37 in the deaths by yellow fever. The decrease is principally in the Lafayette, St. Patrick's and St. Vincent de Paul Cemeteries. The following are the returns for the week ending Sunday morning, August 26th, at 6 o'clock:

A RUMOR.—It has been rumored for a day or two past that the wife of his Serene Highness, A. L. de Santa Anna, is in this city. We don't know how true it is.

SUNDAY IN THE OLD TOWN.—We spent a right pleasant afternoon below Esplanade street yesterday, strolling around, and observing the manners and customs of the residents of that end of the city.

The last quiet of the Portuguese Benevolent Society, at the Polar star Lodge, of course claimed our attention. It was very numerously attended—the tables groaned with good things, wine flowed like water, and enthusiasm like the wine. The lively buzz-ing of the men and rolling of the drums enlivened all the neighborhood round.

Rambling round through a num-ber of the cottage-lined streets, we were much struck with the numerical force and promising aspect generally of the rising generation; particularly that portion of the feminine half, who were rejoicing in their teens. Flowers in the gardens, flowers in the doorways, ev-ery-where. Who would have thought there was so much beauty in the Old Third?

The names of the streets down there are very taking. We could never have left Love street, but for seeing on it some of the oddest people that breathe. Nothing but a hand-gar which we met could have driven us from Music street. Some open ex-hibitions as on Piety street and a dog-fight in Peace street, released us from the thraldom of those pretty names.

At the junction of Music and Goodchildren streets, we found a grand Ethiopian tournament, covering a common two squares in size. On one side a tall post with a red pennon; on the other, ditto, with a blue pennon. Both all around decorated with colors of the contending parties, and dispensing gingerbread and gingerpop to the lively combatants; one booth in the middle, largely patronized, having a Know-Nothing flag flying. At least five hundred niggers were playing ra-ke-l, and five hundred white people looking on. An amusing and exciting spectacle.

The cars on both railroads—the Pontchartrain and the Mexican Gulf—we noticed were filled with gay excursionists.

Coming home, we took Washington Square in our route. In one corner of it, we find Gosling Ivy standing under his accustomed tree, dispensing the Gospel to a motley crowd of people as could be found in a year's travel—white people of all colors, negroes of all shades, people of both sexes, and all ages and conditions. It was the reverend gentleman's first appearance after a several weeks' interregnum during which he formally "became a citizen" by having the yellow fever. His motley friends of the Square who never go to church, were well pleased to see him.

Agricultural.

Keep Your Seeds Pure.—How shall we do it? Don't plant any two varieties of the same family within one hundred feet of each other. Every plander knows that his corn minds, because he sees the different grains upon the cob. Yet it is hard to believe that his cotton will mix, because he sees no difference in the fabric or any change in the seed. But next year will tell the tale. There are more garden seeds spoiled by being raised indiscriminately together than most gardeners imagine. Melons, squashes, gourds and cucumbers are fast blending into one. Okra and cotton will soon unite. Cabbage and long collards are blending the head and stalk. Turnips will put on heads instead of bottoms. Beets are becoming woody. Irish potatoes and tomatoes are about to change places. We shall soon eat potatoe balls instead of tomatoes, and the tuber of the tomato will most surely become a fibrous root. Whatever grain, vegetable, fruit or flower is saved, should be raised beyond the influence of any of its kindred plants.

Using a Whole Egg.

A friend told us a story a few days since, illustrating the free, generous character of the Irish, which we consider too good to be lost, and therefore give it to our readers.

One friend's wife being in delicate health, it was resolved that a girl should be procured to do the house work, that the lady might have an opportunity to recover her health and spirits.

After visiting an intelligence office for two or three mornings, a fine buxom lass of about twenty years of age, but six months from sweet Ireland, was selected and instructed as to the duties that would be expected of her.

"Now, then," says the lady, "pour the ground coffee into the pot, then pour in the hot water, and after a few minutes' boiling, put in one-half of an egg, so;" and the lady illustrated each description by demonstration. "You understand, don't you?" says the lady.

"Indade I do, mum," was the response. "Bile the coffee, grind in the wather, and dhrop in the half of an egg. Don't that it, mum?"

"All right," replied the lady. "Now, then, to-morrow morning we'll see how well you remember it."

To-morrow morning came, and the coffee was as good as could be expected. The third morning came, and to the astonishment of our friend and wife, the coffee was undrinkable and nauseating; even the odor of it was sickening. Bridget was called, and questioned, as follows:

"Bridget, did you first put the ground coffee in the pot?"

"Indade, I did, mum."

"Did you then pour in the hot water?"

"Sure I did."

"How long did you let it boil?"

"Five minutes, mum."

"What did you do then?"

"I put in the egg, mum."

"Just as I showed you the other morning?"

"Well, to tell the truth, mum," says Bridget, giving her garments a hitch with her brawny hands "to tell ye the truth, I would not put in the half of the egg, as ye told me, but the egg was a bad one, and I thought ye wouldn't mind about having the half of it, and so I dhropped in the critter as it was!"

Boggus Problems.—The New York Evening Mirror, of the 14th August, says:

There is a set of sailor-looking fellows perambulating the city with packages of Irish linen, so called, which they sell to verdant men and women remarkably cheap—say at from 30 to 50 cents a yard. The buyers having slack consciences and believing the fine looking goods must have been smuggled or stolen to be offered so cheap, snap at the bargain, and find, on washing it, that they have been sold with six-penny cotton—flax cotton beyond question. We saw one of these exulting purchasers take the deceitful starch out of his "bargain" a day or two ago. The peddlers are shrewd Yankee made-up sailors. Sometimes they offer "choice" razors cheap—and don't the buyer get shaved? They also deal in tin cans of molasses honey.

We have in this city some of the same sort of fellows, who pretend to be Spanish sailors, who do the young clerks and bargain hunters out of considerable, by selling them cigars, which they pretend to have smuggled from Havana, but which in reality are manufactured in this city out of the worst kind of Western tobacco.

Meeting of the Partington Family.—We clip the following interesting item of intelligence from the Boston Post of the 17th inst:

"Where pleased to learn that the descendants of Sairy the still continually Partyagetone, who came to this country in the second vessel before the Mayflower, proposes holding a meeting to "take measures" with regard to a Partington pic-nic, such as shall do honor to the great original. It is supposed that each household in the country has a member of the Partington family in it, and that by collecting these in some grove in the vicinity of Beanville, they might, by picking a little and sicking a little, make an hour pass pleasantly. There will be no charge at the door and friends of the family will be invited. N. B.—A collection taken to defray expenses.

A Cure for Rheumatism.—Lemon juice is recommended as a certain cure for acute rheumatism. It is given in quantities of a table spoonful to twice the quantity of cold water, with a little sugar, every hour. The effect of the lemon juice was almost instantaneous in one case mentioned; in ten days the worst case was cured, and in seven the other was able to go out, and there was a flexibility of the joints of the cured quite unusual in recovery after other modes of treatment. So says an exchange.

Judicial Brevity.—The late Judge Foster, of England, has left on record this example of brevity.

A short time before his death he attended the Oxford Court on a day that was unusually hot and sultry, and gave the following charge to the Grand Jury:

"Gentlemen, the weather is extremely hot; I am very old, and you are very well acquainted with what is your duty. I have no doubt but you will practice it."

That Daguerreotype.—"Do let me have your daguerreotype!" asked a dashing Fifth Avenue belle, lately, of a rather spooneyish young gentleman, who had been for some months annoying her with his attentions.

The gentleman was delighted, and in a short time the lady received the picture. She gave it to her servant, and asked—

"Would you know that gentleman if he should call?"

The servant replied in the affirmative.

"Well, when he comes, tell him I am engaged."

Cure for a Rattlesnake Bite.—The Madison (Wis.) Journal contains the following:

We are informed by Dr. Ward that the child of Mr. White, that was bitten by a rattlesnake, has recovered. The remedy used is so simple and attainable by every one that it ought to be generally known. The hand which was bitten and arm were enveloped in a poultice of meistened ashes, and the child was made to drink freely of whisky punch.

Tennessee Copper Ore in England.—The Tennessee copper mines have sold 2000 tons of ore in Liverpool since March last. The lowest price was £20 12s. 6d., and the highest £37 10s. per ton. The prospects of the Tennessee mines are stated to be good, the yellow sulphuret ore being in great demand in England.

SLANDER.

A whisper woke the air—
A soft light tone and low,
Yet barbed with shame and woe;
How might it only perish there!
Nor further go.

Ah me! a quick and eager ear
Caught up the little meaning sound!
Another voice has breathed it clear,
And so it wanders round,
From ear to lip—from lip to ear—
Until it reached a gentle heart,
And that—it broke.

It was the only heart it found,
The only heart 'twas meant to find,
When first its accents woke!
It reached that tender heart at last,
And that—it broke.

Low as it seemed to other ears,
It came—a thunder-crash to hers—
The fragile girl so fair and gay—
That guileless girl so pure and true!

'Tis like a lovely humming bird
That is a fragrant lily lay,
And dreamed the summer morn away,
Was killed by but a gun's report,
Some idle boy had fired in sport!
The very sound a death-blow came!

And thus her happy heart that beat
With love and hope, so fast and sweet,
(Shrined in its Lily too!
For who the maid that knew
But owned the delicate flower-like grace
Of her young form and face!
When first that word
Her light heart,
It fluttered like the frightened bird,
Then shut its wings and sighed,
And with a silent shudder—died!

A GOOD PARODY.

We do not rank "Parodies" as a very exalted kind of literature; but now and then we come across a good one, different in subject but close in imitation. Of such we think is the following:

'Tis the last cake of supper,
Left steaming alone,
All its light-brown companions
Are buttered and gone:
No cake of its kindred,
No cookie is nigh,
To steam on the platter,
Or sear its mate by.

I'll not leave thee, thou lone one!
To meet a cold fate;
Since thy mates are all eaten,
Come lie on my plate.
Thus kindly I'll butter
Thy steaming sides o'er,
And think on thy sweetness
When thou art no more!

Thus all cakes must follow,
Three times every day;
When the meal-times approach
They must vanish away.
When hunger is mighty,
And sickness has flown,
What cake can inhabit
The table alone!

We extract the following letter from the St. Louis Republican, of the 18th Inst.:

Kansas, August 14, 1855.—To-day the Wyandots are holding their election for Chief, and a more interesting and impressive scene I never witnessed. This nation was, a few years ago, the most populous, powerful and warlike of the whole region of the North, and are now dwindled down to the small number of six or seven hundred, all told. Some of them are men of remarkable sense, whose practical observation and sound discretion have induced them to quit many traditional and savage customs, and to form a sort of republican government. They now elect their rulers, and to-day they are to choose their Chief, or President. The polls are held at a lodge about two hundred yards from the confluence of the Kansas and Missouri rivers, and within full view of passing steamboats. The judges of election are three old braves, who have the confidence of the nation. The voting is done by ballot—and how gravely it proceeds! How unlike the elections of the white man! How much more orderly, dignified and quiet! There is no excitement, no noise—no electioneering or loud words. They come in singly from the forest; they assemble in small numbers beneath the boughs of spreading elms; they confer together gravely, and then, as stately relics of a mighty race, they step, with a mien of conscious sovereignty, to the ballot-box, and vote for the Chieftain of their choice. What an example to their white brethren!

Lafourche Items.—Last Saturday's Thibodaux Minerva says:

The health of this community is most excellent at present. There is no sickness worth mentioning, either in town or the surrounding country. The nights are cool and pleasant, while the days are roasting hot.

The Lafourche has risen about two feet during the last few days, but is now receding again. Where this rise originated is not known to the people hereabouts.

Last Saturday evening the special train up from New Orleans met with a serious accident. A short distance this side of Boutte's Station, the track "spread" as the locomotive and baggage car passed over, and the passenger cars ran off the track, and were completely wrecked. Strange to tell, none of the passengers were severely injured, although all were more or less scratched and bruised; and we heard that one man had his arm broken. The brakeman was thrown a distance of sixty feet from the car, and yet received only slight injury.

Washington Items.—We clip the following telegraphic dispatch from the New York Times, of the 18th inst.:

Washington, Friday, Aug. 17.—The statements in the Northern papers that the President intends visiting Canada are untrue; though it is quite probable invitations have been extended to him to do so.

Dr. Peter Parker, long a missionary at Canton, and late Secretary of Legation, accepts the appointment as Commissioner to China, and will soon return thither.

The War Department came very near being destroyed by fire this afternoon, in consequence of some loose papers carelessly left, becoming ignited. The flames were suppressed, however, without material damage, but intense alarm was felt for awhile among the West End officials.

The Union of this morning announces the appointment by the President of Dr. Parker as Commissioner to China. The Doctor has accepted.

The South of Olden Time.—In Mr. Benton's forthcoming volume of his Thirty Years in the Senate, occurs the following passage:

"It is a tradition of the colonies that the South had been the seat of wealth and happiness, of power and opulence; that a rich population covered the land, dispensing baronial hospitality, and diffusing the happiness which themselves enjoyed; that all was life, and joy, and affluence then. And this tradition was not without similitude to the reality, as this writer can testify; for he was old enough to have seen (after the Revolution) the still surviving state of Southern Colonial manners, when no traveler was allowed to go to a tavern, and was handed over from family to family through entire States; when holidays were days of festivity and expectation, long prepared for, and celebrated by master and slave with music and feasting, and great concourse of friends and relatives; when gold was kept in desks or chests, (after the downfall of paper) and weighed in scales, and lent to neighbors for short terms without note, interest, witness or security—and on bond and land security for long years and lawful usance; and when petty litigation was at so low an ebb that it required a fine of forty pounds of tobacco to make a man serve as constable."

Advertising.—A cotemporary truthfully remarks:

The persons who really understand the principles of advertising are few. Most people fancy that it is only necessary to advertise occasionally, forgetting that in the general competition they will soon be forgotten for some new advertiser to the best advantage; should remember that they must not only select the most proper channel, must not only set forth their wares or wants in explicit terms, but must keep doing this, day by day or week by week, or else they will fall short of their object in just so far as they neglect to advertise regularly. A newspaper has new readers every issue, and the greater its circulation the greater the number of these. If advertising is of any benefit, it is as useful in hard times as in prosperous ones; nay more so, for it is at such a period that a dealer must make up, by exertions, for the decline in his trade. It is a "penny wise and pound foolish" economy to stint your advertising in any way.

Mrs Le Vert.—From the latest letters received from our Alabama Ambassadress to Europe generally, but to the Grand Industrial Exposition at Paris in particular, we are kindly permitted to extract the particulars of an interview—one among hundreds that have tended to give strangers a better opinion of American society than prevailed before they date.. [Mobile Register, 25th.

An Evening with Lamartine.—"Then came an invitation to spend a social evening with him and his lady. There were only a few literary friends present in addition, and I passed some of the most enchanting hours I have known for many years with the historian, his lady, and their friends. Lamartine looks very much like Ports, but is entirely free from any French manners. He is tall and thin; has white hair, and an expression of face indicative of constant and intense reflection. There is a dreamy, poetical look about the eyes; and he speaks slowly and with marked emphasis His manner is self-possessed, but full of warm cordiality; and his words are genial and kind. He is charming in conversation—earnest and eloquent; with so much feeling in his language as impresses one constantly with his sincerity. He received me with the utmost warmth and kindness, and seated me by his side, so that I had all of his attentions to myself. The thread of conversation was unravelled by the usual topics, until it flowed freely from the ball; and then it soon wove itself into a thousand pleasant themes. But to me the most gratifying of all his kind expressions, were some that touched upon my native land, and my own descent.

"Some one was speaking of the adoration paid to relics in Rome, when Lamartine observed—'All nations have some object they reverence which, though perhaps insignificant in itself, is sacred from associations. Your country, Madame, has the most precious of all manuscripts in the world—the signed Declaration of Independence! Do not your people make pilgrimages to look upon it?' I told him it was indeed precious to all, but doubly so to me, as my grandfather's was among those sacred signatures. Oh! you should have seen the magic of those few words. Lamartine rose, and bowed to me profoundly. 'Madame,' said he, "in that name you have a noble heritage! It is the patent of true nobility—ever cherish your descent from such a patriot with honest pride."'

"Oh how my heart swelled with pleasure as I answered him; nor could the concentrated compliments of all the titled, the wealthy, and the witty in France have filled my soul with half the proud joy with which I now so faintly describe to you this evening with Lamartine.

He expresses his intention to visit the United States in the course of a year or two."

Turks Islands.—The group of Turks Islands in the West Indies, from which we derive our best varieties of coarse salt, oocotintes, with the adjacent groups of Caicos Islands, a little English colony of four thousand inhabitants, governed, under the supervision of the Governor of Jamaica, by a Legislative Council, half of the members of which are appointed by the Crown and half are chosen by the inhabitants. A correspondent of the New York Post, writing from the island of Grand Turk, gives an interesting description of the present condition of the colony. He states that it is the only British colony in any part of the world which not only pays its way but yields some revenue to the mother country. While all the other West India possessions of the Crown have, since the abolition of slavery, steadily declined, these barren fields of sand have gradually advanced in prosperity.

During the year 1854, the receipts of the government amounted to nearly seven thousand pounds, which was nine hundred pounds more than the whole amount of expenses; and this out of a population of four thousand, one-third of who are the lazy, unproductive negroes of the Caicos. The export of salt for 1854 considerably exceeded a million bushels. The amount might be enlarged to a very great extent if the waste lands of the islands were turned to advantage. The scarcity of labor has hitherto proved a serious drawback to the prosperity of the islands. So great is this deficiency that the President of the islands recommended that the Government should adopt the compulsory system to make the thriftless people of the Caicos work.

For the defense of the colony there is stationed at the barracks on Grand Turks Island a body of about forty African soldiers, who have been either imported by the British Government from Africa or reserved from slavery. Hardly any of them speak the English language, and thus the object of the government in forbidding them to have any communication with the citizens, from whom they might catch some revolutionary sympathies, is easily accomplished. In order still further to seclude them, their wives are permitted to share their dwellings in the barracks. They are generally stout, erect men, about five feet ten in height, and, wearing the red regimentals of the British service, they make very passable looking troops.

These soldiers are not the only imported Africans upon the Grand Turk Island. There are some three hundred others who have been taken from slavers wrecked upon the coast, and who now form a very respectable portion of the laboring population. When they first came they were not so tractable; but laid a plot to burn down the town, which luckily was frustrated before it was put into execution. So great was the white inhabitants' alarm at the revelation, that the black soldiers were called out to suppress the uprising. This, instead of disheartening, only re-inspired the handed insurgents, who now expected that they would be joined by their armed fellow-countrymen. Accordingly, as the troops marched toward them, they raised a shout of welcome, which was speedily changed as they saw some forty muskets deliberately pointed at them. Instantly falling on their knees, they threw up their hands in silence, as if imploring for mercy, and quietly surrendered.

National Debts of the World.—A new edition of "Fenn on the English and Foreign Funds," very recently issued, gives a statement of the existing National Debts of the principal countries of the world. This is interesting at this time, when the contraction of additional debt is very likely to be forced upon all the leading nations of Europe at least. The aggregate amount of European debt is stated to be £1,044,841,000, of which the debt of England is £773,923,600; France, £233,000,000; Holland, £102,451,000; Prussia, £3,500,000; Russia, £68,000,000; Spain, £70,000,000; Belgium, £26,000,000; £Austria, 211,000. The various countries of Central and South America, Mexico and Cuba, have an aggregate debt of £59,788,280. The debt of the United States is put down at £10,000,000, and that of British India at £48,000,000—making the total public or national debt of the world to be £1,762,629,480.

Methodists in the United States.—The N. Y. Express says:

In 1755, five Methodists settled in this city and formed the first Methodist Society in America. In 1855, one hundred years later, the Methodist Church in the United States numbers over four million worshippers.

Presidential Movements.—The correspondent of the New York Courier and Enquirer of the 17th says:

"The President's next departure from the capital will be to a Virginia watering place, under the escort of Senator Mason. This expedition will offset the visit to Cape May, and maintain a just equilibrium between social attentions of the Executive to the North and South."

An Odd Dress.—The Saratoga News thus describes the dress worn by a Mrs. F—r, of Rome:

Richly dressed in yellow moire antique and black lace, with two married daughters both with white lace."

The relaxing heats of summer leave behind them a long train of evils. The most universal of these are general debility, and its sure attendant, lowness of spirits. For these we can recommend a speedy and unfailing cure, in the shape of HOOFLAND'S GERMAN BITTERS, prepared by Dr. C. M. Jackson, Philadelphia. It is, in our opinion, a medicine not powerful—since unapproachable. It seems to reach the fountain head of the difficulty in the digestive organs first, and then to relieve the convulsions and the blood of the nervous world, or the cause of disease. Its tonic properties go to right to the membranes of the stomach, and promote the secretion of the gastric juice, with dissolves the food, while its mental, soothing, and alterative influence imparts general regularity and strength to the action of the secretive organs, and seems to fortify the constitution. Such is our own experience of its effects, and we believe it is confirmed by the evidence of all who have tried it, or had an opportunity of witnessing its operation. For sale by Dr. Jackson, 150 Arch street. See advertisement.

We invite the special attention of parents and guardians to the advantages here offered to young men desirous of a finished collegiate or business education. The location of the college in a quiet valley, ten miles from a town—the freedom, consequently, from temptation to vice—the full and thorough course of study—the experience and ability of the Faculty—the wholesome discipline—the facilities for lectures afforded by ample apparatus, libraries and cabinets, and, withal, the cheapness of terms and healthfulness of position, cannot fail to secure to this college, as heretofore, a liberal patronage.

THE NASHVILLE FEMALE ACADEMY

The next academic year will commence September 3d. This institution has enjoyed thirty-nine years of uninterrupted prosperity.
In regard to health, it is believed to have no equal in the United States. Cholera, chill and fever, typhoid and scarlet fever, and similar fatal diseases, have never occurred here. But three deaths of boarders in thirty-nine years.
In regard to maternal influence, claims equality with the best regulated private families, in all that relates to personal habits, moral and mental culture.
Employs, almost exclusively, Southern teachers. No Southern parent, who gives this institution a personal examination, will, we think, find a reason for going further North. [jy21—6t] O. D. ELLIOTT.

Payment to be made at the close of each term. Board, including lodging, washing, lights and fuel, can be procured in the village and immediate neighborhood at ten dollars per month. Students will be received at any time during the session, and will be charged only from the time of their entrance to the end of the term. We would however, respectfully urge all parents or guardians who design placing their daughters or wards in the institution, to do so at their earliest convenience, as it will tend much to the individual interest of the pupils, and the general prosperity of the school, facilitating, as it will, a proper arrangement of the various classes in their respective branches of study.
School books, stationery, &c., may be had at any of the various stores in the village at the most rates.
Reports will be sent to parents and guardians quarterly, in which will be stated the health, improvement, social and moral deportment of their daughters or wards, with such other information as may be deemed important.
As the design of the Faculty is to render the instruction thorough, and lay the foundation of a substantial education, no young lady will be permitted to rank higher than her attainments will justly entitle her, nor to pass into another department in the course of instruction without having made sufficient proficiency in the preceding studies.
The government of the school is to be understood as that of authority—though parental and mild, yet decided and firm. The institution, in a religious point of view will be conducted without reference to sectarian influence.
Pupils will be required to attend church at least once on the Sabbath, and recite a Bible lesson on each Monday morning.
The scholastic year, embracing ten months, will be divided into two equal terms of five months, one immediately succeeding the other.
The first session commencing on the first Wednesday in October, and closing the last week in February; the second session commencing on the first Wednesday in March, and closing the last week in July. At which time the annual examinations will be held, and the usual rewards and honors conferred. The vacation will embrace the months of August and September.
All applications for admission of pupils, &c., to be made to the president of the College.

FEMALE COLLEGES vs. MALE COLLEGES.

At the late commencement of the Centenary Institute, in Summerfield, Alabama, one of the most interesting items was the reading by the young ladies of a number of "The Centenary Wreath," a paper issued semi-monthly, in manuscript, and read publicly in the Institute.

One article was upon the above topic, "Female Colleges vs. Male Colleges," and its views were so sensible, and urged with so much force by the fair reader, that she well has accomplished her object—namely, the endowment of the Female College there with $50,000. The spirit of liberality was abroad in the assembly, and one gentleman, a very intelligent and liberal-minded brother, privately avowed his readiness to be one of ten to fill out the proposition. Timidity prevented his making a public announcement of it; the opportune moment passed, and now the friends of that institution await the coming of another anniversary for the accomplishment of the grand object.

To show the public the position which the young ladies assume in this matter, and to give them a fair hearing, I propose to quote a portion of the article aforesaid. In explanation, it may be well to state that upon the next day after the reading of this paper, the question of the location of the projected male college was to be settled, and the Commissioners were most of them in the audience. The reader was a young lady about to graduate. The eloquent blush of modesty mantled her cheek, and the still more eloquent flash of earnestness spoke from her eye, while she read the following appeal:

"What means all this noise and commotion about a male college? Why is there such a universal interest felt in its establishment? What is involved in the project that should move society to its deep foundations? Why all this talk about two or three hundred thousand dollars? Will not twenty or thirty thousand do as well? You do not propose to build dormitories for the use of the students. You only intend to erect buildings necessary for collegiate purposes, leaving out of the question the boarding item. Why, then, need you make so broad a demand upon your resources? When a female college is established, it must have dormitories, a boarding department connected with it, and the expense is therefore necessarily somewhat greater; and yet forty or fifty thousand dollars is thought to be a splendid outfit for a female college. Why this difference? Do you reply that a male college is something more grand and imposing than a female college? Then we repeat the question—why this difference? Are our moral and intellectual development and cultivation of less importance to than the young men's? Are we not susceptible of such cultivation than they? We believe your generous hearts will answer both to the first question, and a glance at history and literature will negative the second. We wonder, then, and we press the question home upon you, ye fathers, why this exclusion? And we ask the question not that we would have you love your sons less, but your daughters more. We would rather that you would double your subscriptions to the male college than diminish them. We love and think of our brothers walking amid those grand halls and drinking large draughts of those pure founts, and basking in the bright, yet mild, refreshing light of glorious science. But why are we permitted only to enter the portals of the temple, and, standing outside, merely to glance at its inner splendors? Why may we not enter, and feed with them the heavenly manna! We love it as much as they, and would worship with as pure a zeal and as fervent zeal at those hoary, classic shrines.

"True, we have female colleges in great numbers, and ours in Summerfield is excellent as far as it goes—and it goes farther than almost any other. Our professors have labored their host to pursue a rigid collegiate course. But they complain, and with good reason, of the great need of an endowment. They want a hundred thousand dollars to place them in a situation to vie, not with other female colleges, but with male colleges, so that readers an institution successful and distinguished. Come, then, ye fathers, and give us no more as if our mental cultivation were not of sufficient importance to call for the same recent preparation! We feel belittled and debased when, in counsel assembled, we resolve upon two hundred thousand dollars for a male college, and twenty thousand for a female college!

"Right here, in Summerfield, is the place to adopt these tactics. Right now is the time. Let you will endow in the old Centenary four scholarships, and furnish us with more than buildings, with extensive libraries, with all the paraphernalia and equipage of a scientific observatory, labratory and museum, we will show to the world in a short time the spectacle of a female college that will rank with Howard, Yale or Wesleyan Universities.

I imagine I see some one, who has always been in the habit of regarding the female mind as a kind of airy nowhere, filled with "airy nothings," smile at the absurdity of our propositions. But just give us the same capital with which you furnish the male college, and we will pledge you that we will show you, in 1860, as scholarly and accomplished, if not as numerous a senior class, as they.

Come, then, to the rescue, ye wealthy and public-spirited friends of the "Centenary." Imitate the noble example set by DeYamport, Erwin, the Nelsons, the Waltons, the Webbs, and many others equally generous, in Greensboro'. Follow in the footsteps of the determined and zealous philanthropists of Auburn. Five men could be selected in this audience who could make up for us a hundred thousand dollars with all ease. Why not come forward and do it at once? The proposition is in earnest—it is practicable—it is simple justice to your daughters. Oh! make it a generous, a speedy, a munificent response!

(Signed,) "THE YOUNG LADIES."

It is to be hoped that the appeal of "The Young Ladies" will not be in vain. The necessities upon which it is based must be apparent to every one. As I propose a subsequent article, to call attention to the importance of endowing female colleges of a higher order than any we have, I waive, for the present, any further remarks. MENTOR.

NOTES OF A SERMON OF ROBERT HALL.

To the Editor of the London Christian Observer:

The following notes of a sermon of Robert Hall, of Bristol, cannot be unacceptable to your readers, and may be valuable when certain modern theologists are laboring to get rid of the great truths to which it refers. S. L.

Isaiah liii. 8.—"For the transgression of my people was he stricken."

Substitution.—The doctrine of the whole chapter, of the Bible, of the law and the prophets.

The substitution of a victim in place of another, rare for three reasons:

1. Seldom to be found.—One seldom willing to die for another.

2. Too costly.—A bad man would not be accepted. The community could not spare a good man.

3. If common, the operation of justice would be debilitated.

Ten remarks on the substitution of Christ, to show the glory of that great event:

1. Necessity in substitution that there be a distinct exposition of the Supreme Power as an act of dispensation. No inferior power could divert justice from its natural course. The Father's consent proved from Scripture.

2. Necessary that there be the full consent of the person substituted; if not, equity would be violated. Christ's consent declared from Scripture: "I lay down my life; I have power to do so."

3. Necessary that there be no participation in the crime. Christ's qualification in this respect—a righteous person, holy, harmless.

4. There should be something in common, some previous relation between the parties—a brother should be given for a brother. Allusion to the next of kin among the Jewish ordinances. Christ of the same nature as the man whom he represented—"bone of our bone."

5. Necessary that such substitute vindicate that law by which he suffers. If he complained of the severity of it, all the glory of the act was lost. Christ magnified the law; came not to destroy it, but to fulfill; never had the law such an advocate.

6. No advantage should be taken of the enthusiasm of the moment. Not always that deliberate feeling agrees with sudden inclination. the substitute might repent. Christ counted the cost; He foresaw all the consequences of His interposition; He went onward with fixed purpose, settled determination.

7. In substitution, there should be an equivalent or a superiority of value in the substitute; a plebeian should not represent a prince. Here no comparison—no possibility of it between God and man. But in Himself, his own essential nature, Christ could not suffer. Hence he assumed the manhood, to be able to suffer; this the subject of wonder through eternity.

8. There should be a possibility of compensating such a substitute, if not here, in some future state of being. The Saviour's reward, to be King over all, to receive the praises of the Church; to be a Redeemer of millions.

9. This is a very rare occurrence; if common, the effect destroyed.

10. This occurrence should not be merely related as a fact, but its moral design should be made known. Christ preached not merely as a person crucified, but as a hope, the power of God to salvation. Better for our tongues to cleave to the roof of our mouth, if Christ is not exhibited by us as the salvation of a lost world. Concluding addresses to the congregation to fix their hope on the Saviour, the foundation Jehovah has laid in Zion.

BRITISH WESLEYAN PERIODICALS.—At the Conference the Book Committee reported that notwithstanding the dullness in the general book trade, in consequence of the excitement respecting the war and political affairs, the sales of the Book Room increased during the year. Of Hymn Books, 6,000 more were sold than in the previous year. The circulation of the periodicals has been kept up, except that of the large Wesleyan Magazine, which has declined. The sale of Newton's Life has exceeded expectations. Of tracts, twelve hundred thousand have been circulated; and a new "Biographical Series" has been commenced, which is to contain sketches of the life and experience of old Methodist worthies. There will be original tracts from the pens of some of the ablest ministers in the connection.

GETTING IN THE BRUSH.

An old local preacher, a good friend of mine, gave me an account of an exploit he performed "in the brush," which struck me as being the clearest case I have ever known. He said: "I had an appointment away up in the hills of B—— county, where a few families had settled. I preached there every four weeks for some time, and expected to keep on at it, if I hadn't got completely defeated one day by the devil. While I was on my way to my appointment, on that miserable day, I began to study a text that I thought would be suitable. When I got to my appointment, the log cabin was full of people, and I thought I'd have a good time; but while I was musing still on my text, and the crowd was still increasing, I found my meditations suddenly interrupted by discovering that the leaf of the Bible on which my text ought to be found was torn out. I did not know exactly how to quote the whole text, nor could I tell where it was precisely, but I knew it was not in that Bible. I was perplexed. But just then an exhorter came in, and I thought that he might have a Bible. Sure enough he had, and I felt better as he reached it to me. I turned over to the page where I know the text ought to be, and lo! in this, too, I was disappointed. The leaf was torn, as in the other Bible. I then tried to think of some text that I could find, and felt sensible relief as a good text and the outlines of a sermon flashed across my mind. I soon finished the preliminary service and commenced preaching. It seemed to glide smoothly along for some time, when all at once something whispered to me, saying, 'You are preaching a very familiar text.' Still I went on, but was troubled with the evident familiarity with the subject. I was slightly embarrassed, and began to feel unpleasant. Everybody in my congregation, I thought, understood the subject just as well as I. These provoking suggestions were followed by one which floored me, and that came, too, like a startling whisper: 'Yes, you preached on that same text just four weeks ago, in this house.' This fairly set my brains to wool gathering, and I made great exertions to get out of my confusion. Every sentence seemed more foolish than its predecessor. I prayed, and raised my voice to its highest pitch, and then it seemed to me the people were ready to break out into a broad laugh. I had heard of 'burning out' by the old Methodist preachers, but I could not feel anything but a sense of confusion worse confounded. I screamed, and roared, and tried to be pathetic, but every attempt made it worse, until it flattened out into a kind of whining, petulant squall. Still, determined not to be entirely defeated, I commenced singing a familiar hymn—got through the first line, but forgot the second, and again made a ludicrous failure, and uttered a most discordant yell while trying to catch the first word of the next line of my hymn. My sufferings were now intense, and my confusion overwhelming; but still standing, I determined to dismiss the congregation with a benediction. I raised my hands and said, 'We will receive the benediction.' The people got up, and I forgot every word of blessing I had ever pronounced. I stood with my hands up, but not a word came—the people looked confused, and I was blind, completely befogged. At last I stammered out, 'You'd better go home!, and away they went.

After my old friend's story was told, I asked, "Did you ever go back there again?" and he said, "No, and I never will." I will not pretend to give the philosophy of "getting in the brush." The best way to keep out, is to keep a heart full of the love of God, to study well the subject, to be sure and have plenty of fresh air, to preach short sermons and to pray much, especially just before preaching.—Zion's Herald.

BUILDING CHURCHES A GOOD WORK.—At the last meeting of the Presbyterian General Assembly Rev. Dr. Plumer remarked: "It has been said that building churches is not fit work for Christ's Church. And yet there was a sweet singer of Israel who, after all his psalms and noble works, had yet one great work to do which God would not permit him to do, yet God approved highly his intention. It was the building of a noble temple to the God of Israel. God is pleased with this work of building churches, when it is necessary. And he believed if the First Church in New York was burned down, and the congregation should put up a log house, God would be displeased with it. Look at what Haggai said to the Jews when God's house lay waste and they dwelt in ceiled houses. Look at Ezra's time, when under the great revival every 470 souls had a synagogue built for them—and, as if that were not enough, synagogues were so built as to bring a synagogue within two miles of every man's dwelling. Building of churches, then, is an appropriate work for the Church of God."

No man is a true divine but the child of God; he only knows holy things by a holy light.

AFFLICTION, WHAT IT TEACHES.

How fast we learn in the day of sorrow! It is as if affliction awoke our powers, and lent them new quickness of perception. We advance more in knowledge of Scripture in a single day than in years before. We learn "songs in the night;" though such songs were unknown. A deeper experience has taken us down into the depths of Scripture and shown us its hidden wonders. Luther used to say, "were it not for tribulation I should not understand Scripture," and every sorrowing saint responds to this, as having felt it; as did David, when he said, "Blessed is the man whom Thou chastenest, and teachest out of thy law; it is good for me that I have been afflicted, that I might learn Thy statutes." What teaching, what training of the mind goes upon the sick bed, or under the pressure of grief! And O, what great and wondrous things will even some little trial whisper in the ear of a soul that is "learning of the Father!

In some cases this profit is almost unfelt, at least during the continuance of the process. We think we are learning nothing. Sorrow overwhelms us. Disaster stuns. We become confused, nervous, agitated, or perhaps insensible. We seem to derive no benefit. Yet, ere long, we begin to feel the blessed result. Maturity of judgment, patience in listening to the voice of God, a keener appetite for his word, a quicker discernment of its meaning; these are soon realized as the gracious results of chastisement. The mind has undergone a thorough discipline, and has, moreover, made wondrous progress in the knowledge of divine truth, through the teaching of the Holy Ghost.

THE LORD LOOKED UPON PETER.

Surely no malefactor, condemned to suffer for the violated laws of his country, ever heard the last hour strike upon the prison bell with half the agony of feeling with which that cock-crowing rang upon the ears of Peter. Still there was a sight which smote far deeper than that sound: "The Lord turned and looked upon Peter." What can portray the silent eloquence of that last look? What volumes must it have spoken to the false apostle? Could he behold that well known countenance, and again repeat, "I know not the man?" Could he see his Divine Master, "as a sheep before his shearers is dumb," and again break forth in oaths and imprecations? Could he hear the reproach of that meek eye, and yet remain in the guilty scene amid those enemies of the Saviour and of his own soul? No! That single glance was all that was required to send home the arrow of conviction and repentance to his bosom; he instantly remembered the word that the Lord had spoken, and went out and wept bitterly.—Blunt.

Our time is an universal talent, that every man that lives to discretion hath. Every man hath not a talent of learning or of wealth, or of honor, of subtilty of wit, to account for; but every man that lives to the age of discretion has time to account for.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

A friend tells us an anecdote of Booth, the great tragedian, which we do not recollect having seen in print. It occurred in the palmy days of his fame, before the sparkle of his great black eye had been dimmed by that bane of genius, strong drink. Booth and several friends had been invited to dine with an old gentleman in Baltimore, of distinguished kindness, urbanity and piety. The host, though disapproving of theatres and theatre-going, had heard so much of Booth's remarkable powers, that curiosity to see the man had, in this instance, overcome all his scruples and prejudices. After the entertainment was over, lamps lighted, and the company re-seated in the drawing-room, some one requested Booth, as a particular favor, and one which all present would doubtless appreciate, to read aloud the Lord's Prayer. Booth expressed his willingness to afford them this gratification, and all eyes were turned expectantly upon him. Booth rose slowly and reverently from his chair. It was wonderful to watch the play of emotions that convulsed his countenance. He became deadly pale, and his eyes turned tremblingly upward, were wet with tears. As yet, he had not spoken. The silence could be felt. It became absolutely painful, until at last the spell was broken, as if by an electric shock, as his rich-toned voice, from white lips, syllabled forth, "Our Father, who art in Heaven," etc., with a pathos and fervid solemnity that thrilled all hearts. He finished. The silence continued. Not a voice was heard, nor a muscle moved in his rapt audience, until from a remote corner of the room a subdued voice was heard, and the old gentleman, their host, stepped forward, with streaming eyes, and tottering frame, and seized Booth by the hand. "Sir," said he, in broken accents, "you have afforded me a pleasure for which my whole future life will feel grateful. I am an old man, and every day, from my boyhood to the present time, I thought I had repeated the Lord's Prayer, but I have never heard it before, never." "You are right," replied Booth; "to read that Prayer as it should be read, has cost me the severest study and labor for thirty years, and I am far from being yet satisfied with my rendering of that wonderful production. Hardly one person in ten thousand comprehends how much beauty, tenderness and grandeur can be condensed in a space so small, and in words so simple. That Prayer, of itself, sufficiently illustrates the truth of the Bible, and stamps upon it the seal of Divinity."

So great was the effect produced, says our informant, who was present, that conversation was sustained but a short time longer in subdued monosyllables, and almost entirely ceased; and soon after, at an early hour, the company broke up, and retired to their several homes, with sad faces and full hearts.

LATER FROM TEXAS.

ARRIVAL OF THE CHARLES MORGAN.

The steamship Charles Morgan, Capt. Place, from Indianola, via Galveston, on the 2d inst., arrived on Monday night, bringing 144 bales cotton, $4,072 in specie, and 98 head of cattle. The following is a list of her passengers:

Mrs. Lockwood and son, Miss Lockwood, Miss Champion, Mrs. Fatonley, Mrs. Gonzales, Mr Arnold and lady, Mr Cepler, Mrs. A. H. Shaw, Mr. Meyman and lady, Messrs J. L. Latham, Hale, Stafford, Bowden, Clark, J. G. Chalmers, H. Erskine, E. P. Hood, Humphreys, A. M. Bradley, Evans, Pat Cook, Giddings, R. D. Brossman, Byrne, Jaquith, Gorman, J. H. Pace, Orl. R. W. Brown, Barkesdale, Dunbar, Rosenthal, Feltman—20 on deck.

The specie was consigned as follows: H. E Maignan, $2,072; Union Bank, $2,000.

The Charles Morgan reports that the steamship Nautilus, hence for Galveston and Brazos, entered the harbor of Galveston about 12 o'clock on the 31st inst., having lost her mainmast in a severe gale which she experienced off Ship Island on the night of the 30th. She was injured considerably otherwise, and was compelled to throw overboard part of her cargo.

Capt. Thompson, of the Nautilus, reported the light-ship on Ship Island as having been blown from her anchorage and not to be seen. It is supposed she had put to sea. Also a schooner, name not recollected, was blown ashore during the gale; the waves made a clean breach over her. There is no doubt but that she went to pieces and all hands perished.

The watchman of the Nautilus was lost overboard during the gale.

The gale had not been felt in Galveston.

We extract the following summary of the news in Texas from the Galveston News of the 1st inst.:

The company of Rangers has been divided into three detachments; one is stationed on Crab Apple creek, one on the Medina and one on Cypress creek. They will doubtless do good service. If anything of moment transpires we shall be advised of it.

Late advices refute the rumor of the arrest of Capt. Henry and command. There was a misunderstanding between some of the party and the Mexicans concerning a horse, which was adjusted, and the Captain continued his march for General Vidaurri's camp.

The Lipans have a camp on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande, five or six miles from Laredo, from which they issue in squads, and plunder on this side of the river.

The Seminoles are giving the Mexicans some trouble by committing robberies. Gen. Vidauri is reported to have sent a force of five or six hundred men against them.

They are making very excellent stoneware in Enterprise, Rusk county, and are sending it to all parts of the State for sale.

Salt of a superior quality is being manufactured by solar evaporation in the vicinity of Corpus Christi.

The Sunday law continues to be well observed in Houston.

Texas, with a population of about five hundred thousand souls, contains between fifty and sixty newspapers, most of them ably conducted and neatly printed. Six of them are devoted to the cause of religion.

Major Stein, at the head of six companies of dragoons, will leave for New Mexico by about the 1st September. He is in fine spirits and anxious for the trip. The only delay which can possibly occur will be owing to the late bad prospect for water. The raise which have since fallen will be of great service. No better commander could be sent to New Mexico, and he has our best wishes for his success.

The crops in the northeastern part of Texas have proved abundant. The emigration of last season was quite large, but an increased number is anticipated during the ensuing fall and winter, for which they are well prepared, provisions of all kinds being abundant and cheap. The northeastern countries of the State generally are in a most flourishing condition. All industrial pursuits are prospering. The culture of wheat is rapidly extending, extensive flouring mills are being erected. Much attention is being paid to horticulture, as well as agriculture. In the latter, a disposition is manifested to diversify the articles cultivated, and to adopt the most approved system of culture. Book farming is coming into vogue. Agricultural periodicals are patronized and read.

From the Houston Telegraph we learn that there had been several deaths from yellow fever since the last report of the sexton, which was made on Friday, the 24th ult. The disease was mostly confined among foreign emigrants, however. A general stampede had taken place among the unacclimated.

The returns from the election had not all come in, up to the date of our latest files. So far there have been seventy counties heard from. Pease's majority is but little over 3,400, and Jowers is still ahead of Runnels 251 votes. Evans is said to be undoubtedly elected. Fields leads Crosby 151 votes. It is hoped the next steamer will bring full returns.

The Central Texian, published in Anderson, Grimes county, reports that the caterpillar had made its appearance in that county, and fears were entertained of the destruction of the cotton crop there.

LATER FROM HAVANA.

The U. S. mail steamship Cahawba, R. W. Shufeldt, commander, from New York the 25th ult. and Havana 31st, arrived here Monday morning, having on board the following passengers:

A. D. Grossman, A. M. Holbrook, Mrs. J. N. Reynard and child, Miss. L. Romney, Mrs. L. S. Kurtz and child, Mrs. P. Rostwick and child, Mrs. R. Calder, Miss S. J. Hackney, Mrs. M. Jackson, R. J. Palfrey and sons, W. A. Ramsey, R. Carey, T. Shute, J. H. Gardner, B. J. Bujac, P. Hondecoeque, T. Layton and son, L. M. Sanney, J. Frederich, A. Chapell, A. Horn, G. A. Simon, E. Davis, B. Levy, E. Tracey, M. F. Bigney, J. Hughes and daughter, Madame Besse, L. Decoir, P. Davenberg, E. Oxnard, J. D. Decneron, Geo. Morgan, E. A. Del Camino and servant, B Augleda, P. T. Reqs, Miss N. Malcas, Mrs. L. Gregorio, O. Malcas, J. M. Basualdo, F. Masich, Jamin Mage, William Miller.

From Havana there is nothing of interest to report.

The Mexican war steamer Iturbide left Havana for Vera Cruz on the 30th; her consort, the Santa Anna, remained in port. Although there have been several cases of fever in the city, and some mortality among the unacclimated troops recently arrived from Spain, yet there exists no actual epidemic disease in the city proper.

Several prisoners have been brought from the country to Havana, formerly engaged as agents for slave traders; among them, Rio Diaz and his family are called upon to account for human bones secreted on his estate—said by him to be the remains of negroes who had died of cholera—by others, the crews of vessels killed for concealment of the trade.

Two French men-of-war were in the harbor.

The Cahawba has had a very pleasant passage, and brings a full freight of fall goods.

The Vicksburg Sentinel, of the 30th, has the following paragraph:

We have heard of but few new cases of fever since our last publication. We learn that two deaths have occurred since Tuesday in the locality in which the disease originated. Would it not be possible to obtain from our physicians tri-weekly reports of the number of new cases as well as those under treatment?

Later from California.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP GEORGE LAW.

The U. S. mail steamer George Law, A. G. Gray Commander, left Aspinwall at 11 o'clock, P. M., on the 16th inst., and arrived at the New York Quarantine on Saturday, the 25th inst., at half-past 4, A. M.

She brought the California mails of Aug. 1, $1,285,616 in treasure on freight, and 412 passengers. All in good health.

Steamship Golden Age, Com. S. Watkins, commanding, left San Francisco, Aug. 1, at 4 o'clock, P. M., with 420 passengers, and $1,160,000 in treasure on freight—$312 281 of which was on English account. Touched at Acapulco on 6th days from San Francisco and arrived at Panama at 10 30 on the evening of the 13th. A line of telegraph has been erected between Aspinwall and Panama, and is now in successful operation.

The health of the Isthmus is good. There has been but little rain, and the railroad is in excellent condition.

[From the San Francisco Evening News, Aug. 1.]

FOURTEENTH'S SUMMARY OF NEWS—State—A duel was fought on the 14th inst. near Brandy City, in Sierra county, between Messrs Charles E. Lippincott, and Robert Tevis; the weapons were double-barreled shot guns, loaded with balls, distance, forty paces. At the first fire, Mr. Tevis fell, and died almost instantly. Difficulty grew out of a Fourth of July speech.

The Supreme Court of this State has decided that if a man be convicted of murder in a lower court, and gets the verdict set aside on appeal to the Supreme Court, on the ground of informality, he cannot be tried again for the same crime.

There was a fire in Stockton on the 30th July, which destroyed twenty buildings and other property valued at over $30,000.

There were 12,403 acres of land cultivated in grain in Sacramento county, in 1854; 5417 of barley, and 5191 of wheat. The manufacture of butter in said county during the same period amounted to 56,125 lbs; and of cheese, to 40,940 lbs.

The work upon the Sacramento Valley Railroad is progressing rapidly. The company will commence laying down the rails on the Sacramento terminus about the 1st August, and expect to have ten miles completed by the 10th of the same month.

The banking house of Hamlet Davis, of Nevada, has suspended. The liabilities are understood to be heavy.

City—A street fight occurred between Mr. Jas. King of William, and Mr. A. A. Cohen, receiver for Adams & Co., in which Mr. Cohen was roughly handled. Cohen subsequently challenged King, who declined to fight, on the ground of being morally opposed to duelling. His course was sustained by a majority of the community.

A fire occurred in this city on the morning of the 15th inst., in the Sawing and Planing Mill of B. T. Chase, which extended from Market to Stevenson streets, between First and Second streets. Property to the value of $30,000 was destroyed.

In consequence of extensive frauds discovered in the U. S. $50 octagonal gold slugs, bankers have refused to receive them except for their real weight, at from 18 to $18 40 per oz., according to their fineness.

Capt. Joseph Libby Folsom, U. S. A., closely connected prominently identified with the history of the city, since the American occupation of the country, expired on the evening of the 19th inst., at the Mission of San Jose, at the age of 38 years. His remains were brought to this city and interred in the Lone Mountain Cemetery, on 21st inst. His funeral was numerously attended by the different military companies, public societies and citizens.

A fire occurred in this city on the evening of the 20th inst., in a frame house on the N. E. corner of Powell and Filbert streets, Washington Square. A little girl, daughter of Mr. Durken, was, in the confusion, accidentally left in the building and perished in the flames.

A splendid unmounted cane, richly mounted in gold and diamonds, and containing, in different compartments in the head, specimens of native gold and quartz, has been manufactured in this city at the cost of $500, and is intended as a present from natives of Boston residing here, to Governor Gardner, of Massachusetts, as a mark of their approbation of his course in the case of Judge Loring.

Several meetings of our principal citizens have recently taken place, with the object of devising means to encourage immigration to this State. No definite measures, however, have so far been adopted. Another meeting is called for the 7th proximo.

The allied fleet, consisting of the Monmouth, Admiral Bruce, and President (English) and the Forte, Admiral Tourvalon, Eurydice, Alceste and Obligado, (French,) arrived in port from Petropolowski and Sitka. The news brought by these vessels is to the effect that Petropolowski was evacuated in April last by the Russians, who removed their entire garrison and ammunition, in the frigates Dwina and Aurora, to the river Amoor in China. The fortifications of the place were destroyed by the Allies. Sitka, which was visited by the English portion of the fleet alone, was not attacked, but an exchange of prisoners was effected. Admiral Bruce, since his arrival, has removed his broad pennant from the President to the Monarch. We understand that our French and English citizens contemplate giving a splendid ball in honor of the officers of the fleet.

The new custom-house in this city is rapidly approaching completion, and will probably be ready for occupation about the end of the year.

A Board of Examiners has been appointed by the City Council, in pursuance of an act of the late Legislature, providing for the funding of the city indebtedness. The members of this Board are Messrs. Edmund Randolph, Chairman; Louis McLane, Jr., and Geo. W. P. Blancell, who entered upon the discharge of their duty on the 28th July.

The prosecutions which were commenced in the Mayor's Court against the managers of our theatres for infringements of the Sunday law, were dismissed on Saturday, the 28th July, by motion of the District Attorney, who expressed his determination to proceed against the offenders under an indictment by the grand jury.

A large number of the crew of the French men-of-war are suffering with scurvy, and have been removed to the French Hospital in this city.

The United States steamer Massachusetts arrived in port on the 22d July, from Astoria, O. T.

Col B. F. Washington, long connected with the editorial management of the Placer Times and Transcript, the leading Democratic journal in this State, has recently withdrawn from that position. It is said that dissatisfaction with the nominations made by his party is the cause of this step. The Times and Transcript is now edited by V. E. Geiger & Co.

QUANTITY OF AMMUNITION EXPENDED UPON SEBASTOPOL.—A letter from St. Petersburg, of July 14th, says: "The combats of the 17th and 18th of June were doubtless the severest and most desperate that have as yet taken place before Sebastopol. From private correspondence this appears much more than from mere official reports. In one is stated the following, namely: 'It is impossible to form an idea, except by personal inspection, of the amount of iron and lead which is used. The ground where the combat took place is entirely covered with shot and shell. From the 31st May up to the 9th June our soldiers have picked up 78,400 pounds of lead, and 1,015 bombs of 80 pounds, not exploded; and this is not one-third part of what has been used by the enemy.

THE ROTHSCHILDS.

The Hessians which—it would not be proper to say who—were bought by the British ministry to perpetuate the subjection of the colonies, but which—here which becomes inadmissible—generally managed to desert and contribute to the welfare and prosperity of the country they had been sent to destroy—were a better bargain to several other parties than they ever proved to the English government. The sector of Hesse received a fine sum for them; the corner stone of a colossal private fortune which has since made the house of petty tyrants one of the richest families in Europe. The operation also benefitted one Mayer Anselm Rothschild, a Frankfort Jew, then domiciled at London. Born in 1743, and deprived of both his parents at the age of eleven, this individual had received the education of a teacher, the occupation usually entered by those members of the Hebrew persuasion who lack the capital necessary to a mercantile pursuit. His tastes led him into other channels, and after a probationary service in a banking house at Hanover, he found himself in the commercial capital of the world, struggling, though as yet in a small way, on the road by which he ultimately obtained such splendid successes. He received the money paid for these Hessian recruits, and had time to turn them advantageously before being obliged to pay them over to his principals. Thus the American Revolution, besides freeing the people of these States, was the making of him.

But while this is the popular account of the origin of this great house, candor compels us to state that it is not generally received as authentic. He seems to have made money in this way, but the sum was only moderate; he was richer after the transaction than before, but he had not yet any idea of directing the money market of the world. The truth appears to be, that like all other great fortunes, that of the Rothschilds grew imperceptibly. The family have been poor, humble, well to do, moderately rich, wealthy, enormously rich, and what only the Rothschilds are; but the foundation of their present estate may be said to have been laid in the years when the founder was powerless, as when he was getting rich. The capital amassed in London was just sufficient to enable him to open, at Frankfort, the banking house, which has given the name to all subsequent operations. Not by any single stroke of genius or good luck, but by an uninterrupted series of business transactions always characterized by the same activity, intelligence, and integrity, he continually extended and fortified his credit. In 1801 the Landgrave of Hesse, anticipating a French invasion, or a revolution at home, or both, made him nominally absolute owner of his private fortune, annexing to the transfer, it is said, a mere honorary condition to restore it when the depositary would be in a condition to enjoy and use it in safety and comfort—an event which did not occur until after the Congress of Vienna. This is the avowed cornerstone of his greatness.

One curious speculation made, perhaps, with these very funds, is often related. The British Government, for some reason or other, found it very difficult to transport subsidies to the commander-in-chief their forces in the Peninsula. They therefore offered a heavy commission to any one who would undertake the responsibility of the transmission. Rothschild conferred on the subject with Napoleon, and offered to share the commission with him to return for being permitted to transport the specie to Spain by way of France, and through the French Armies! The offer was accepted, and, of course, all parties were satisfied.

What old Rothschild himself was wont to proclaim as one of the main stepping-stones of his ambition, was the good fortune which befel him in the shape of a large family of sons. This trait depicts one of the finest features of the Jewish character. Among Christians it is the rule to find the fortune amassed by the father scattered to the winds by the follies of the children. Who has ever seen a Jewish drunkard, gambler or devotee of other vices, to such an extent as to impair his acquisitive functions and make him a burden upon society? Again, among Christians the father's fortune is too often the subject of contention among the children, and serves to facilitate the machinery of public justice rather than to subserve the ends of private interests. Of this there is very little among the Israelites. Either their testamentary dispositions are more judicious, or their heirs and legatees less quarrelsome.

The "house" of Rothschild is no fiction; it consisted, besides the patriarch, of five sons—Anselm, born in 1773, who resided, till his death, at Frankfort; Solomon, born in 1774, whose decease was announced by the last steamer; resided alternately at Berlin and Vienna, principally at the latter place; Nathan, born in 1777, has lived in London since 1798. Charles, born in 1788, is at Naples; and James, born in 1792, at Vienna. The three last named are now the acting members of what may be called the firm.

They entered upon their present European position on the downfall of Napoleon, and have done more perhaps, to undermine the dynasties of Europe by the ivy-like support they extend to them, than the battering-ram impetuosity of their great predecessor would have effected had he been spared to hold his position. In twelve years, about five hundred millions of dollars were raised by the house for different powers by way of loan or subsidy, which were distributed in nearly the following proportion: for England, two hundred millions; for Austria, fifty millions; for Prussia, forty millions; for France, eighty millions; for Naples, fifty millions; for Russia, twenty-five millions; for several German courts, four millions; for Brazil, twelve millions; exclusive of various other large sums. All this has been greatly outdone by subsequent performances.

The actual amount of their fortune is, of course, known only to themselves. It is said, however, that they have recently set down their personal property, exclusive of their real estates, seigniories, fiefs, etc., at seven hundred millions of dollars, or a little over ten times the national debt of the United States Government at the accession of Gen. Pierce. [Philadelphia Bulletin.

DEATH OF AN EMINENT PLANTER.—On Sunday night of the present week, Major James Surget, a wealthy planter of Concordia parish, resident at "Cherry Grove," some five miles from Natchez, was taken with a congestive chill, which terminated his life on Monday evening. He was buried in the family tomb, in Adams county, Miss., on Tuesday afternoon.

He was one of the most eminent cotton planters of the South—a singular concentration of firmness and energy, which would have made him conspicuous in any position in life.

Belonging to a family that fled from the slave insurrection in St. Domingo, he was the youngest living of three brothers, and who are the owners of not only thousands of slaves but of some of the most valuable of the broad lands of Louisiana, Mississippi and Arkansas. In the family history of the Surgets, truth would indeed be stranger than fiction, and a volume might be written full of incident, replete with interest, and rich with the triumphs of industry and perseverance. [Concordia Intelligencer, 31st.

The city of Jackson, in this State, has passed a quarantine ordinance forbidding the importation of any dry goods or hardware, or other merchandise, or any bundle or box of movables into that city. The same ordinance forbids any person to enter the city of Jackson from any infected place, until ten days shall have elapsed after leaving such infected place. If this would give Jackson any protection, we should be the first to exclaim "well done Jackson!and an example worthy of imitation;" but alas! such is never the result.

NEW ORLEANS:

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 8, 1855.

Commercial Statement.—Our fourth page is devoted to this valuable summary. Few subscribers to the Advocate but have enough connection with the business world to find it interesting—to many, it alone is worth the price of the paper. It has been made up with great skill, care and cost by the Crescent, to which we are indebted. The Crescent's monetary and commercial statements, we believe, are unequaled for their amplitude and accuracy.

Methodist Books.—McGinnis, 36 Camp street, can now fill orders for the publications of the M. E. Church, South, at Nashville prices. He has on hand a supply of Hymn Books, Disciplines, Winans' Discourses, Newton's Life, Bascom's Sermons and Lectures, the Sunday School Library publications, besides others. Send him your orders. The Agents, for the present, order the sales to be made for cash only.

Catholic Paper.—The Southern Standard, with materials, good will, &c., has been sold out, and its successor appears as the "Catholic Standard," under new proprietors. Our "obituary" is quoted in full, doubtless as a spur in the sides of the faithful. We acknowledge the kindness herein professed:

"Our holy Church teaches us to pray for 'our enemies.' Why, then, should we not pray for the editor of the Advocate—pray that his mind may be enlightened to perceive the truth, and his will strengthened by divine grace to confess and embrace it?"

Pray for them—when you can't fine, banish, imprison or burn them!

Death of Rev. W. H. Turnley.—This worthy and worn minister died at his home, on Little River, Catahoula parish, La., August 23. He was a superannuate of the Louisiana Conference, aged fifty-eight years. His death was caused by bronchitis, under which he had labored for years. Rev. U. Riley, who gives these facts by letter, has furnished an extended notice, which will appear next week.

English Quarterlies.—Black wood for August, and the four English Reviews for July, as republished by L. Scott & Co. See advertisement. These American republications give the best thoughts of the English mind on current subjects. The conduct of the war, both parliamentary, military and diplomatic, is searchingly discussed. The British are great at abusing others; now they abuse one another, as only they can do it. Political and social questions are not ruled out.

New Kind of Tender.—Not so very new either. Do not some of the Protestant priesthood receive a paper gratuitously, and show no concern for the collection of its accounts, or the soul or body of the editor? Here is the way of the French:

"A French religious journal, called the Rosier de Marie, publishes a notice to subscribers, informing the priesthood that the members of that profession will receive the paper gratuitously on giving their assurance to say twenty-eight masses for the soul of the editor during six months. The editor, however, reserves to himself the right to refuse subscriptions of this kind!

A few weeks since a lawyer in Ferrara died, making his own soul heir to 6,000,000f. which were to be expended in masses for the repose of his soul. This, of course, all goes into the hands of the clergy.

Greek and Roman Churches.—Dr. Achilli has some such project in view, to be accomplished by his "Italian Church:"

"A renewed effort to restore unity between the Greek and Roman Churches is now in contemplation, and a Greek convert, M. Pitzipios, founder of the Christian Oriental Society, is now at Rome superintending the publication of a work entitled, "The Oriental Church." It is printed at the expense and by the order of the Pope himself, as a preparatory step to the hoped for reunion. It traces the separation to the apostacy of the clergy at Constantinople, and contends that the great body of the Greek laity is orthodox, and anxious to be restored to Rome."

Wesleyan University.—A correspondent of the New York Spectator gives the following as the result of the recent efforts for the endowment of the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Ct.: "The sum of $100,000 has been secured by the university during the past year, which will place it on a more permanent foundation than ever. The largest donation was made by a Boston gentleman—$20,000; a gentleman from your city gave $5,000; the Legislature of Connecticut appropriated $10,000 toward the sum. Nor is this all. On the present occasion it was proposed to raise an additional sum of $50,000 for new buildings, &c., when the Bostonians immediately pledged $20,000 of the amount, provided New York City would do the same, and Middletown and the alumni would raise the other $10,000. And further, at the usual gathering of the alumni a central committee was ordered to report some plan for their body to raise $100,000 for the more liberal endowment of their Alma Mater.

It is lost labor to commend the taste of the world; they will never approve of our conduct unless we approve of theirs.

Death of Rev. T. H. Foster.

This sad intelligence reached us on Tuesday, from Hon. J. Elam, at whose house, in Baton Rouge, Brother Foster died, at half-past 4 P. M., on Monday, Sept. 3. He died of yellow fever.

We have received no particulars as yet. His sickness must have been brief and violent, for on 30th August he wrote us on business, and added:

"The fever has been increasing at the rate of about one dozen cases per day. Three or four deaths every day. This is considerable, where the epidemics of the two preceding years acclimated everybody. I think it will soon run through the unacclimated, at this rate, and cease. So far it has yielded quite readily to prompt and judicious treatment.

Yours, T. H. FOSTER."

Not two months ago we met him, in finer health and frame than ever; making many friends, doing a good work, endeared to his flock, hopeful and happy. His death strikes us with stunning grief. One of the most efficient laborers has been summoned from one of the most needy fields.

He graduated at Transylvania University, under President Bascom; joined the Alabama Conference at Montgomery in January, 1848, one of a class of twelve. His first appointment was Eufaula; next, Lowndesboro; the following two years, Eutaw; for 1852-3, Demopolis; and last year, Macon, Miss. In all these places he left the impress of the Christian minister.

At the last session of the Alabama Conference, Bishop Andrew, whose eye surveys the whole field and comprehends the wants of places and fitness of men, transferred him to Louisiana Conference and stationed him at the Capitol of the State. There, he falls at his post.

He was about thirty years old. Of vigorous and refined mental structure; amiable in manners and effective in address; sincere, zealous and studious; his devotion to the ministry excited large hopes for the Church, and was not without its fruit of souls.

A widow and infant son are left to mourn—but not alone. The ministers of two Conferences, and a numerous membership, mourn with them.

Another Slander Refuted.

The Catholic Standard, of last Sunday morning, in a characteristic tirade against Protestant ministers, publishes with unctious approbation the following:

"We have a remarkable fact in support of our assertion in the epidemic at Portsmouth and Norfolk, Va. The Orleanian, in its Wednesday's issue, has the following truthful and appropriate remarks:

'From Portsmouth all the good shepherds, who watcheth over the safety of their flocks when their is naught to fear, have departed, leaving Father Delvin and the Sisters of Charity to carry out alone the last sad duties and perform the final rites for Catholics and Protestants, and every other sect who require there services or desire that the path to the grave may be made smooth by the whisperings of hope, the consolations of religion and truthful prayer. From Norfolk, four or five clergymen scampered off.'"

A similar statement was made by a Catholic Bishop about the epidemic in Savannah, last year, which the secular press nailed indignantly to the counter, as false coin. The Bishop's only retreat was a recantation, which he made.

It is time these hollow boastings were met. To let them pass, is regarded by some as admitting their truth. We have already given some facts and figures, showing what sacrifices the Romish priests make in epidemics. Protestant ministers stand upon a higher ground; theirs is a disinterested attendance; and yet, though it is not boasted of and paraded in public prints, with lying disparagement of others, Protestant clergymen are not found wanting.

"Observer," writing to the Richmond Christian Advocate, Aug. 23, says:

"The Presbyterian minister, three Methodist ministers and a Catholic priest, are at their posts, ready, if need required, to do the duty of ministers to the sick, the dying, the bereaved, &c. Let the Catholic priest be wrong in doctrine, wrong in everything that may be deemed orthodox, yet his visits to the sick while in the Row, and since their removal, deserves notice."

Compare Papal and Protestant candor in these statements. The latter is generous and frank in the notice and commendation of the "Catholic priest," though he braves no more and does no more than his cotemporaries, and risks not as much as they, who are fathers and husbands.

A correspondent of the Richmond Dispatch says: "High praise should also be accorded to our clergy, who have acquitted themselves like Christian ministers of God during these trying times."

Of Rev. Mr. Home, Baptist minister in Portsmouth, we have seen a mention as at his post, nobly doing duty; Of Rev. Mr. Wheeler, Methodist, likewise. The same correspondent of the Dispatch adds:

"The Minister of the Freemason street Baptist Church (T. G. Jones) is the only one who has proved recreant to his duty and unfaithful to his flock. He left the city shortly before the epidemia broke out, and has kept himself away ever since. As a Christian minister, he should have returned immediately to minister to the spiritual wants of his congregation; but in place, he wrote, we learn, to know whether it would be safe for him to return, and being advised that it would not, very prudently, but not very Samaritan-like, declined venturing back.

Rev. T. G. Keen arrived here yesterday from Petersburg, to take charge for the present of the Freemason street Baptist Church, in place of the regular pastor."

How far can the public rely on the Catholic Standard and its kind, who know nothing of justice or generosity toward cotemporaries, treat truth slightingly, and exhaust themselves in praising themselves?

In the worst of times there is still more cause to complain of an evil heart than of an evil and corrupt world.

Gospel Openings, Southward.

We are gratified to find in the Texas Advocate frequent articles on the accessibility of the Mexican population—both suggestive and instructive. Upon our Texas Conference Rangers does Protestantism depend for leading the advance. They are neighbors in territory, and not strangers in manners—and we trust in friendly sympathy. From Brownsville and the Rio Grande Valley, Ferguson and Addison write encouragingly. Rev. De Vilbliss, who has labored on the frontier, and speaks Castilian, says:

"I have said they are a people of warm friendships and sympathies; of this I speak understandingly. I had them for my neighbors when I passed through the severest bereavements, that I have ever endured. The females, especially, bear this character; and in confirmation of it, I saw them kiss the cold clay of my deceased companion, and with flowing tears of affection heard them cry, "Mi amigo, mi mucho amado amigo"—"My friend, my much beloved friend."

The Mexicans, especially the lower class, are very little inclined to learn the English language, and hence, the necessity of having men for this work who understand the Spanish language.

Another thought I will venture; I do not believe much could be done at first in the way of public preaching.

The missionary would have to visit them at their houses; get them interested in the word of God, and in good religious books; converse and pray with them, and thus open the way for more enlarged plans of effort. In order to do this effectually, he would have to devote his whole time to the work; and make it the one great business of his life. And in view of this extensive field with the advantages which surround it, what department of missionary labor offers so rich a harvest of precious souls?

There are many of the Mexicans much inclined to read the word of God; and a goodly number are doing so clandestinely.

On a visit to Bexar county, in May last, I found a Mexican in the employment of my father-in-law, who was very ardently engaged reading a New Testament in his own language, which had been presented to him. He spent all his leisure time in this employment, and evidently was turning it to good account. He told me one day that he had seen plenty of religion with his eyes, but now he wanted to feel it in his heart; and on one occasion, during preaching, when a lady got happy and shouted aloud the praise of God, this Mexican wept most profusely, and afterwards told a friend, that that was the kind of religion he wanted.

I could mention various other encouraging circumstances, which have come under my own observation."

The flight of Santa Anna—the upholder of the Papal tyranny with his own, and the consequent accession of the Liberals is not an unfavorable omen for Mexico.

There is cause to fear that Cols. Kinney and Walker may prejudice the States' people and their religion in Central America.

Last advices report Col. Kinney moving into the interior, to confer with the Government authorities of Nicaragua, and probably to offer them his services in case a war should break out between that country and Costa Rica, which is anticipated.

Costa Rica, by its present constitution, is one of the most favorably open points, southward, for planting Protestant civilization and religion. Baron Bulow, Chief Engineer of the Public Roads in Costa Rica, has written two letters to the Panama Herald on Imigration to that Republic. In the last he says:

It appears to me that the first point of interest to intending emigrants is to ascertain what will be their rights and privileges in the country they propose to locate in. I shall, therefore, proceed to explain their position in this respect, in the Republic of Costa Rica.

The constitution of the country is based upon that of the United States; perfect personal liberty and equality exist, and tha foreigner is not restrained, taxed or debarred from any of the rights of citizens, except, of course, the elective franchise. There are no taxes or contributions levied on him, and he may acquire real estate without forfeiting his nationality. He can, moreover, always claim the protection of the representative of his nation, whenever he conceives himself injured or aggrieved.

In regard to religion, the most perfect liberty of conscience is allowed; the majority of the inhabitants are Catholics, but the priests do not exercise any influence in political affairs. Both by law and by custom, all religions are tolerated, and for sometime past a Protestant chapel has been in existence.

The entire population is divided into two classes only, namely, agriculturists or landed proprietors and merchants; the class represented by the mechanics and artisans of other countries is among the natives, altogether wanted, the few who belong to that class being entirely composed of foreigners. Even the great majority of what might be termed the laboring class, are also landed proprietors, and only work for hire when their time is not required on their own farms.

The rate of wages for laborers throughout the entire country, (except Puenta Arenas,) is $8 a month, or 2½ reals per day, and their board, which consists of three meals a day; the day's work is ten hours. The few who work as carpenters and masons get $25 a month and their board. Foreign mechanics, such as carpenters, smiths, painters, bricklayers, command wages from one to two dollars a day and board, according to their skill.

The expenses of living are in proportion to the rate of wages; house rent and all the necessaries of life, both food and clothing, are so reasonable, that a laborer or tradesman can live well on one-half of his monthly earnings. Spirits and tobacco are the only monopolies, and are dearer in proportion to other articles. The people are very temperate, and a drunken man is seldom seen.

The race consists of two classes—Spanish, and Spanish and Indian mixed. There are few of negro descent in the State. The people are hardy, strong and healthy, and work with energy and willingness. The temperature of the interior is cool, and the climate salubrious. Intermittent fever and all the diseases of tropical climates are unknown.

The entire population are well disposed towards foreigners, and are anxious to have them among them. They are willing to learn, and ready to adopt improvement in their various callings.

Labor is always paid for in cash, and the credit system is unknown. The currency of the country is dollars of eight reals (of 12½ cents each) and ounces of seventeen dollars. All foreign gold bears a premium of five per cent.

If the statement I have hastily made should induce mechanics or laborers to go to Costa Rica, they may rest assured that they will find the sketch I have given is not overdrawn.

New Publications.

From the publishers, Harper & Bros., New York, we have, through McGinnis, 36 Camp street, the following books, just from their presses:

History of the Council at Trent—From the French of Bungener, pp. 538.

In 1845 was celebrated the three hundreth anniversary of the opening of this council. It was the convention, that fixed, authoritatively, the dogmas of Romanism. When polemics push them to the wall, with arguments against tenets and practices found in catechisms, sermons and books, the reply is, "they are not authoritative exponents." Here is the law and the testimony; and it would save a good deal of slippery controversy to bave it by. Dr. McClintock, the editor, appends a "Summary of the Decrees and Canons of the Council," and an index. This edition is from the second London.

Letters to Rev. John Hughes — By Kirwan.

The completest edition, we take, it of Kirwan's pills for John. Dr. Murray was born an Irishman and bred a Papist, and knows whereof he speaks. His letters have been translated into Spenish, French and German, and by some American missionaries into the vernacular of India. To the present edition is added an introductory letter, "Romanism Not the Religion for America." The lecture, heretofore published separately, on the Decline of Popery, is included.

Letters to the People on Health and Happiness—By Miss Beecher.

The authoress deals, femininely, in the line of physiology, with pictorials. Doubting the propriety of some of her pages, she sent proof sheets to judicious women, and received their approbation. The subject is skin deep if not deeper, and it can't be helped. To be treated beneficially, it must be treated thoroughly. A "Lady" is now reading a copy.

Learning to Talk—By Jacob Abbott.

Mr. Abbott has the art of interesting children and leading them on pleasantly to learn. He makes reading as truly an amusement as catching butterflies. The pictures excite curiosity, the well adapted reading lets them into the story; the story is not too deep or complex for infant entertainment. And so the children soon find out that learning to read, instead of that dry, dogged task it is represented to be, is a way of getting at amusing stories. The will is excited, and thus attention and memory. Disgust of application, that slough of despond, is avoided, and the mental faculties are naturally, rapidly and safely educated. Considering the field of mind he operates upon, and his felicitous ability, Mr. Jacob Abbott is the chief educator of the country. It happens well that the Harpers, with their capital artists, clear type and clean paper, have the doing up of this educating machinery.

Harper's Story Books, No. X.

Tells how the books are made, at "Franklin Square," with pictures illustrating the process and progress.

Waikna—Adventures on the Mosquito Coast, By S. A. Bard.

A poor New York artist, in search of adventures, finds himself at Kingston, West Indies. Leaves for the Mosquito Coast in a skipper, seventy tons, commanded by an ex-slave of Jamaica. Has a nice wreck—catches turtles—gets to Bluefields, the capital of the Mosquito Kingdom—has a Yucatan Indian for a "Man Friday"—rows and sails along up the lagoon coast to civilization.

The adventures read like. "Twenty years in the Phillipines." Mr. Bard writes like an artist—at word-painting, a master. We do not know a book in this line more readable. The route is not worn, and besides the unfailing novelty of tropical life, he really gives information.

The protectorate of England over the Mosquito Kingdom and the Mosquito King himself, is shown to be a grave joke. He gives an account of his first acquaintance with the august potentate of that region, in this wise:

"At a word from Mr. Bell (an Englishman whom the author meets at Bluefields) the torpid black girl disappeared for a few moments, and then came back with some cups and a pot of coffee. I observed that there were three cups, and that my host filled them all, which I thought a little singular, since there were but two of us. A faint, momentary suspicion crossed my mind that the female polypus stood in some such relation to my host as to warrant her in honoring us with her company. But instead of doing so she unceremoniously pushed open a door in the corner, and curtly ejaculated to some unseen occupant, 'Get up!' There was a kind of querulous response, and directly a thumping and muttering, as of some person who regarded himself as unreasonably disturbed. Meanwhile we had each finished our first cup of coffee, and were proceeding with a second, when the door in the corner opened, and a black boy, or what an American would be apt to call a 'young darkey,' apparently nineteen or twenty years old, shuffled up to the table. He wore only a shirt, unbuttoned at the throat, and cotton pantaloons, scarcely buttoned at all. He nodded to my entertainer with a drawling 'Mornin', sir,' and sat down to the third cup of coffee. My host seemed to take no notice of him, and we continued our conversation. Soon after, the eleven youth got up, took his hat, and slowly walked down the path to the river, where I afterwards saw him wash his face in the stream.

As I was about leaving, Mr. Bell kindly volunteered his services to me in any way they might be made available. I thanked him, and suggested that, having no object to accomplish except to 'scare up' adventures and seek out novel sights, I should be obliged to him for an introduction to the King, at some future day, after Antonio should have succeeded in rejuvenating my suit of ceremony, now rather rusty from saturation with salt water. He smiled faintly, and said, as for that matter, there need be no delay, and, stepping to the door, shouted to the black youth by the river, and beckoned to him to come up the bank. The youth put on his hat hurriedly, and obeyed. 'Perhaps you are not aware that this is the King?' observed my host, with a contemptuous smile. I made no reply, as the youth was at hand. He took off his hat respectfully, and there was no introduction in the case, beyond the quiet observation, 'George, this gentleman has come to see you; sit down!'

I soon saw who was the real king at Bluefields. George, I think, had a notion of his own on the subject, but was kept in such strict subordination that he never manifested it by words. I found him shy, but not without the elements of an ordinary English education, which he had received in England. He is nothing more or less than a negro, with hardly a perceptible trace of Indian blood, and would pass at the South, for a likely young fellow, worth twelve hundred dollars as a body servant!"

Rejoice With Trembling.

In the almanac for 1856 just issued by the American Baptist Publication Society, occurs the following editorial note; accompanying the Statistical Table:

"It appears from calculations made on the Minutes that there is (in the Baptist denomination in the United States) an average loss of 36,000 members every year by death, exclusion, and excess of dismissal over reception by letters. The proportion is nearly thus: Annual loss by death, 11,000; by exclusion, 12,000; by excess of dismissal, 13,000. To meet this loss there is an average gain by restoration of 2,500, beside the number baptized. From this it follows that if the number of converts baptized in any year should fall below 33,000, there would be a positive decrease of our churches. What a startling thought is this! What a call to dependance, to labor, and to prayer! And when we find, as in the past year, that the net gain, after all these deductions, is over 30,000, what shall we render to God for such a steady stream of grace to our churches, continuing and increasing year by year? What a solemn and sublime thought, that our churches yield an annual revenue of 11,000 redeemed souls to Heaven!"

Quoting the above, the True Union (a Baptist paper) remarks as follows, presenting a gloomy and soul-depressing view of religious instability:

"We agree with the excellent editor—this is indeed 'a solemn and sublime thought;' but there is another thought suggested by this statement, equally solemn, but fearfully painful. It is that our churches yield an annual revenue of about 22,000 decieved souls to the world and to perdition. It is that, in all probability, of the vast multitude who join our churches only one-third go to Heaven, while two-thirds are lost. Look at the figures. Thirteen thousand are dismissed by letter who never join the Church again. What becomes of them? A few may join other denominations, and a few may go to other lands, but the proportion of this class must be very small indeed. The great mass of those who have not love enough for Christ and his cause to use their letters of dismission by uniting with other Baptist churches undoubtedly neglect all their religious duties, break all their baptismal engagements, and mingle again with an ungodly world. There are thousands of such 'lost Baptists' all over the land. Eighty-five hundred are annually excluded, and never restored to church fellowship. They are excluded for conduct utterly inconsistent with the Christian character, and must therefore be considered as hypocrites, or self-deceivers."

Without classifying all who have fallen away "as hypocrites or self-deceivers," but setting down many of them as those who once were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, we agree with our cotemporary that this view is "fearfully painful." We know not what might be the proportion of apostates, if the statistics of other denominations were sifted, doubtless enough to silence all boasting.

Besides their own loss, what serious injury do they inflict on the cause of Christ! Truly is Jesus "wounded in the house of his friends." His own churches furnish a large supply of recruits to the army of Satan. They yield annually thousands of false witnesses, to testify that religion is worthless, to give the infidel new arguments, and to put into the scoffer's hands fresh material for reviling the Saviour.

Can no means be devised for checking this instability in the churches? Going back a little, is there not too much anxiety about figures—a lust for swelling the numbers in membership, in the first instance? Less arithmetic and more grace would help the Christianity of the nineteenth century. Rev. Isaac Taylor makes one sound and reproving remark—that Paul attached less importance to statistics than we do.

The World's Graveyard.

Whether this cyphering is accurate, we say not, not having verified it. It is an interesting calculation, and may be made useful variously:

If all the human race, from creation to the present day, were buried side by side, how many square miles would they cover?

The population of the globe at the present time is estimated at 900,000,000. It is also estimated that a number equal to the entire population of the globe, existing at any one time, passes away three times in every century. As the present population of the earth has increased from a single pair, created about sixty centuries ago, one-half of the present population might be taken as a fair estimate of the average number who have passed away during each of the 180 periods or thirds of centuries during which the earth may have been inhabited; which would give 8,100,000,000 for the whole number who have lived on the earth. Allowing an average of three square feet for the burial of each person, on the supposition that one-half die in infancy, and they would cover 24,300,000,000 square feet of earth. Dividing this by 27,878 400, the number of square feet in a square mile, and we have less than 872 square miles, which would afford sufficient room to bury side by side all who have been buried in the dust of the earth—all of whom would not suffice to cover the little State of Rhode Island.

This estimate shows how widely those persons draw on their imagination, who affirm that not a foot of earth exists on the globe that has not served as the burial place of man; or who deny the possibility of the resurrection of the body, on the pretence that the earth could not afford room for its resurrected inhabitants to stand!

EDUCATION OF PREACHERS' CHILDREN.

Permit me to say a word to the preachers and members of the Alabama Conference upon a subject that is near my heart.

My position for twelve years as President of the Board of Trustees of the Centenary Institute has enabled me to see the good results of efforts in the education of the youth of our country generally, and especially in the education of young men for the ministry and of the sons and daughters of our traveling preachers; also, of the orphans of the deceased preachers of the Alabama Conference.

With our want of endowment this has been a work of great effort and no little embarrassment, yet one so laudable that it could not be relinquished. I was therefore glad when the Conference organized a society and pledged themselves to bring this subject before the membership of our numerous and wealthy congregations. I thought then our noble object would be attained; but how sad the disappointment to find our means still inadequate!

Suppose that everything is not done in this way, as we may think best; yet who but exults in gratitude to God to see so many of the youth of our self-sacrificing ministry being educated in the various schools in our State, and thus being fitted for useful stations in life. I have witnessed here the education of a large family of the orphans of one of our deceased ministers; two of them now, with cultivated heads and hearts, are successfully engaged in teaching, and the good thus accomplished will only be known in eternity.

Neither Dr. Mitchell, President of the Female Department, nor either of the Principals of the Male or Primary Departments, connected with the Centenary Institute, is at all benefitted by the collections so far as our schools are concerned. The Trustees, who have arranged for the education of the children of our ministry and of those orphans whose fathers died in the work, must look to the ministers and to the members of the Church—to the ministers to present the subject, and to the membership and friends to aid in doing good by bestowing a religious education on the sons, daughters and orphans of those who will rise up in eternity and call us blessed. Other high and primary schools in the bounds of the Conference are bearing a part in this great work; and may we not expect that every brother in charge of a circuit or station will bring this matter fully and clearly before their congregations, and that thousands of our members, who have not hitherto understood its noble object, will determine, by the grace of God, to share in the duties, and thus participate in the blessings of this great field of usefulness?

Yours, respectfully,

R. A. BAKER, Pres. Board Trus.

Voluntary Societies.

SOUTHERN AID SOCIETY.

Of irresponsible organizations, even with a fair name, the Methodist Church has a growing distrust; not, however, without having been victimized to some extent. It is not our work or wish to oppose the Southern Aid Society, the American Christian Union, the American Tract Society, Sunday School Union, and such like; but let them do their own work, with their own means, while we do likewise. Churches passing resolutions of encouragement or accepting aid, will have it to pay for. Their pulpits will be besieged with pushing agents, the best hours asked for to present their claims, &c.

The Presbyterians (O.S.) are also acting on the protective. The Southern Aid Society, at a late meeting in New York, resolved:

"That one thousand dollars be, and is hereby, appropriated to the Domestic Missionary Board of the Old School Presbyterian Church, in aid of the missionary operations under their care in the Southern and Southwestern States."

This was communicated by Dr. Styles to the Board in a polite note, in which he remarks:

"The New School Churches south of Mason and Dixon's line, you are aware, are, as a general thing, very much weaker in themselves and in their sources of supply than are those of the Old School. Most of our funds have consequently been expended upon them. We wish, however, to cherish a sympathy with all evangelical churches, and have thought it proper, with your consent, to disburse what we have to spare to the churches of your connection, through your Board."

The Board respectfully declined, and these are some of the reasons assigned. Methodists might profitably consider them, with a general application:

"Because the said Southern Aid Society is founded upon the voluntary principle, is not amenable to any ecclesiastical body, and is therefore irresponsible for its principles and acts to any Church. Warned by our past experience as a Church, of the mischievous interference of voluntary associations in our ecclesiastical affairs, we deem it inexpedient to form any alliance with any missionary society founded upon the voluntary principle.

Because, so far as our branch of the Church of Christ is concerned, there is not, in our judgment, any necessity for any other organization besides our Board of Missions, for the purpose of aiding our churches in this country. All who desire to assist our churches can contribute directly to the Board of Missions, established and controlled by our General Assembly.

Because the multiplication, unnecessarily, of organizations and agencies is extravagant, and an unjustifiable waste of funds that ought to be saved to the cause.

Because, by accepting the proffered donation, we might be regarded as endorsing a society with whose principles and measures we are not and cannot be fully acquainted, and which might be repugnant to the sentiments and policy of our Church.

Because, by consenting to act as a distributing agent of the said society, it might be regarded as furnishing an occasion for the collection of funds by that association among our people, and thus diminish the resources of our own ecclesiastical Board. For every dollar received by us from that society for distribution among our churches, ten would probably be raised from our people by the agents of the Southern Aid Society, for the purpose of advancing the interests of other denominations, whose peculiar doctrines and polity are not congenial with our own."

There are sixteen counties in Kentucky in which, it is said, there is not a single piano.

The New Chronology.

We have already noticed Dr. P. A. book. His Chronology is well received portion of the religious press, who, how from the "depth of the subject," on its and "want of leisure," on their own waiting to see what "British Barb Scotch Reviewers," will say. According Dr. Akers, the flood took place 1,500 later in the world's history than has generally supposed, and which date deemed settled heretofore. The Chri Sabbath and the "seventh day" on w God "rested" at the close of creation, chronologically, as well at harmonizing demonstrated to be the same. The Sabbath was not the cosmopolitan Sabbath our race, but simply a Jewish Sabbath, local obligation and of temporary dura The old doctrine of a change of the da the apostles, therefore, is set aside as error. The "Lord's Day" was restored the restoration of Christ to life, and world received again its long lost Sabb with that gospel which was to be preached every creature. By the phrase "Lord's Da is not only meant that Christ rose on t day, but that creation's author origin rested on that. To-day (Thursday, S tember 6, 1855) the world completes 7400th year. A right old world, to be and has seen wondrous events, and will more.

The Northwestern Advocate writes in a great book:

"It is to be classed as a work embo new discoveries on the subject of wh treats, and such as tend powerfully to firm and illustrate the truth of Scripture is the most original and elaborate wo the last half-century, whether in this try or any other. If chronology be th of history, it has undergone, in the ha President Akers, what it certainly need an operation for cataract or ophthal some other optical ailment."

Deaths.

Died—In Columbiana, Ala., on the 9th of August, 1855, Ella Nancy, dnughter of Samuel and Margaret S. Brasher. Born on the 9th of August, 1854.

Near Columbiana, Ala. L. B. McDONALD,

A MOTHER'S SAD TRIBUTE.

'Tis sad to part with those we love,
However light that love may be;
Yet I gather solace from above,
Sweet Ella when I think of thee.

Died—In Auburn, Ala., on the 24th ult., Wesh B, Kidd, formerly of Harpersville, Shelby county, Ala., aged 45 years. He had been a consistent member of the M. E. Church for five years.

Died—Near Forklnnd, Greene county, Ala., Mrs. Elizabeth C. Bullock, in her 50th year. She was born in Edgefield District, South Carolina, was converted to God in her 21th year, and united with the M. E. Church at old Ebenezer church, in Greene Circuit, in the same year. As a christian she took the Bible for her guide, read and meditated therein at stated times, and in her deepest troubles and afflictions, found sweet consolation in its exceeding great and precious promises. As a Methodist, when her health and other circumstances would allow, she was at the class and prayer meetings regularly. I have often had the pleasure of taking sweet counsel with her around the family altar, with her now motherless children, and not without profit to my own soul. She gave satisfactory evidence that all was well and that her way was clear, and in the hour of death, she earnestly requested her children to meet her in heaven.

[Commercial Advertiser.

A very curious affair is, says the Sentinelle of Namur, about to occupy public attention in Belgium. In the siege of Boulgnes, 1455, the Duke de Brabant made prisoner a nobleman named Legrain; but instead of taking his life as he was entitled to do, the duke consented to spare it on condition of receiving all his estates and property. Legrain made over all he possessed; but stipulated that at the end of four centuries it should return to his family. The duke made no objection. The four centuries expired in July, and already a great many persons are preparing to claim the property. It is forseen that the claims will give rise to numerous lawsuit.

Health of the City.—Since our last publication, the yellow fever has made its appearance here in an unmistakeable form. It will be seen by reference to the Sexton's Report, that up to last evening four deaths have occurred from the disease within the city limits. We know of several cases under treatment, who are said to be doing well. The disease appears to be of an extremely mild and manageable type. Of the four deaths reported by the Sexton, two occurred in one house, where the rooms were crowded and unfavorably situated; the other two deaths occurred near the same locality. It is very doubtful whether the disease will spread and become epidemic. [Vicksburg Sentinel, 28th ult.

Frightful Accident

ON THE CAMDEN AND AMBOY RAILROAD.

We get the following particulars of this terrible accident, from the Philadelphia Sun, of the 30th ultimo:

It appears that the 10 o'clock A. M. train from Philadelphia proceeded as usual on the way until they got about a mile above Burlington, N. J., when they discovered the train from New York coming down at full speed. The eastward bound train then attempted to hook on to a sideling to let the New York train pass, when the track was crossed by a carriage and two horses, driven by Dr. Hannigan, of Columbus, N. J. The horses were caught by the hinderment car, knocked down and crushed to death. The Doctor was thrown out, and made a very narrow escape, the carriage being smashed to pieces. The collision caused the rear car to be thrown off the track and dragged some distance, smashing it up, and dragging after it the emigrant car, which was smashed to pieces. The major part of the passengers in all of the five cars were instantly killed or seriously injured. The scene after the accident occurred beggars all description.

Nearly every house in the town of Burlington contains one or more of the sufferers. During the whole day the quiet town of Burlington was the scene of the wildest excitement. It will be well to state that when we arrived on the spot many of those who were slightly injured had taken their departure. One of the victims had his arm torn off in the most shocking manner. Another had the same limb torn off and thrown some distance up the embankment. His legs were torn asunder, his heart torn out, and the viscral strewn along the track for a considerable distance. One or two others were buried in the sand, and others were crushed to death between the sleepers. One man had his scalp taken off, another had his thighs broken. Several other arms were broken, lacerated and bruised most dreadfully. Four of the cars were completely destroyed. We give below a list of the killed and wounded:

LIST OF THE DEAD.

Edward F. Bacon, residing near Spring Garden and Seventh streets, Philadelphia.

Isaac M. Kay, residing at Haddonfield, N. J., has both legs broken. One of them has a compound fracture. He is also seriously cut about the head, and much bruised.

J. M. Little, Pittsburg, Pa., is slightly injured about the left shoulder.

Dr. Andrew Porter, of Harrisburg, Pa., dislocated his elbow-joint. Not seriously injured. He dressed his own wound, and then assisted to dress the wounds of others.

Mr. John Kelly, agent of Ohio and Pennsylvania Railroad Company, is badly injured, but not fetally.. He is cut and bruised over his entire body.

Daniel Sonrbeck, of Alliance, Ohio, was injured. He is the proprietor of the hotel at that place. He has a severe cut on the back of his head.

Mr. Carroll, of Wilmington, Del., is badly bruised and cut about the head and body. He went to Agnew's Hotel, and walked about, but soon after fainted upon the floor and in a few minutes expired. His body was conveyed to the City Hall.

George F. Harlan, of Elkton, Cecil county, Md., is badly cut and bruised about the face, but no internal injuries. His collar-bone is fractured.

Samuel Labm, a resident of Canton, Starks county, Ohio, is terribly crushed. His injuries are internal, and are of a serious character. It is next to impossible for him to recover.

James M. Petton, residing at No. 8 Summer street, Philadelphia. He has one thigh broken, and is much bruised about the head and body. He will probably recover.

Later from Europe.

BY THE STEAMSHIP HERRMANN.

The steamship Hermann, from Bremen and Southampton, arrived at New York on the 29th ult. A dispatch to the Philadelphia Inquirer, relating to the prorogation of Parliament, says:

England.

The British Parliament was prorogued on the 14th, the Queen's speech having been delivered by proxy. The speech congratulates the country on the increasing strength of the union between France and England, and the accession of Sardinia to the alliance. Regrets are expressed that the Vienna Conference failed to accomplish the result so desired. These endeavors having failed, no other course is left but to prosecute the war with all possible vigor, and rely upon the patriotism of the people, and the gallantry of the army and navy, to carry it out.

The Parliament stands prorogued until the 23d of October.

BY THE STEAMER CANADA.

A dispatch from Halifax to the same paper gives a somewhat fuller account of the Canada's news than that already published by us. We subjoin the more interesting portions:

Operations in the Baltic.

The announcement that the Allied fleet in the Baltic had destroyed Sweaborg, was taken out by the Hermann, but the Canada brings subsequent details, which modify the first accounts.

The following is the first dispatch on the subject, from the French Admiral:

"On Board the Jonxille, Aug 11.

"The bombardment of Sweaborg by the Allied squadrons has been attended with success. An immense conflagration, lasting forty-five hours, has destroyed nearly all the store-houses and magazines of the arsenal, which is a complete ruin. Various powder magazines and stores of projectiles blew up. The enemy has received a terrible blow, and suffered an enormous loss. Our loss is insignificant in men, and nothing whatever in material. The crew are enthusiastic. "Penaud."

The dispatch of Admiral Dundas is less highly colored, and is as follows:

"Off Sweaborg, August 11.

"Sweaborg was attacked by the mortar and gunboats of the Allied squadron on the morning of the 9th. The firing ceased very early this morning. Heavy explosions and very destructive fires were produced. In a few hours nearly all the principal buildings on Vargot, and many more on Swarto, including those of the Dock Yard and Arsenal, were burned. Few casualties have occurred, and no lives lost in the Allied fleet. Signed, Dundas."

Dantzic, 16th.—The Allied squadron returned to Nargen from Swaaborg on the 13th. None of the Allied ships were seriously damaged. The British casualties were killed, none; wounded, two officers and thirty men. The French loss is equally trifling.

Swaeborg seems not to be in possession of the Allies, and as it is not a key to any important position, its destruction must be regarded as a detached enterprise, and not as any part of any comprehensive operation. Its successful bombardment, however, has had the effect to revive the spirits of the fleet, and to satisfy expectations at home.

The Crimea.

The news from the Crimea is important, a grand battle having been fought on the Tchernaya. The British Government received the following dispatch:

Vienna, August 16.—The Russians attacked the position at the Tchernayn this morning at daybreak, in great force. The action lasted about three hours, but they were completely repulsed by the French and Sardinians.

Second Dispatch.—One o'clock.—The Russian attack this morning was under the command of Liprandi, with from fifty to sixty thousand men. Their loss is estimated at from 4,000 to 5,000, and about 400 prisoners taken. The loss on the side of the Allies was very small.

Pelissier telegraphs on the 16th, as follows:

For some days past rumors of an intended attack on the part of the Russians had excited our attention, and this morning, at daybreak, they realized their intentions against our lines on the Tchernaya; but in spite of the movement of imposing masses which had been collected during the night, the enemy were repulsed with great vigor by the troops forming the divisions of Gens. Herbillon, Canova, Faucheure and Morris. The Sardinians placed on our right, fought bravely. The Russians left a large number of dead on the field, and we made many prisoners. The Russians were in complete retreat on Mackenzie's Hill when our reserve came up, and with the aid of our brave Allies, particularly the English cavalry, the enemy received a severe blow.

Our losses, although much less numerous than those of the enemy, are not yet known.

Pelissier:

Affairs before Sevastopol were unchanged.

The London Morning Post (ministerial paper) says editorially: "We have reason to believe that stirring and hitherto unexpected intelligence may be looked for from the Crimea within the next six days." It is supposed to refer to the secret expedition or field movements.

Asia Minor.

The latest accounts from Kars say the city was surrounded by the Russians, and the first parallel opened. The communication with Erzroum had stopped; provisions were abundant, but forage was scarce. Turkish reinforcements were being hastened to Erzoum.

Negotiations.

A lively exchange of notes continue between London, Paris and Vienna respecting Austria's continuation in the Principalities.

A London paper says that negotiations have arrived at a point for the conclusion of a triple treaty binding France, England and Austria not to conclude any arrangement separately with Russia.

France.

Wednesday, the 15th, being the fete of Napoleon, there was a holiday on the Bourse. The fete was shorn of its full proportions, but was celebrated by the theatres with spectacles and illuminations. Charities were distributed, and the sentences of 2000 prisoners commuted.

There is again a vague talk of a fusion among the Bourbonists, and of a contemplated meeting of their heads at Vienna.

Ex-President Fillmore was introduced to the Emperor on the 15th by Mr. Mason.

Italy.

Something is said of a Congress of Sintesmen at Vienna, to settle the affairs of Italy, but it is not likely to be carried into effect at present.

The Austrian Gazette contradicts the statement of a concordant between Austria and the Holy See.

The Russian Government interposes every obstacle it can towards recruiting a British Italian Legion.

It is stated that France and England have sent an energetic notice to the King of Naples that they are dissatisfied with his Russian tendencies.

Germany.

Saxony proposes raising a new loan of $5,000,000 at 4 per cent.

Denmark.

Letters from Hamburg state that the subject of the Sound Dues causes much anxiety to Denmark, and that Admiral Mourier, of the Danish Navy, has gone to Paris to ask advice and assistance of France. No middle course appears possible to Denmark, and serious complications are apprehended. Denmark much fearing that the United States would commence hostilities by taking possession of the Danish West India Islands.

An extra meeting of the Danish Chambers was in session, constructing a uniform constitution for the whole kingdom.

Russia.

The Russian paper, Le Nord, says we may now look for great events and horrifying revoltals.

It is declared that the commissariat of Southern Russia has declared it impossible to provision more men than are now in the Crimea, consequently, no other reinforcements will be sent. This is doubtful.

One hundred and fifty bales of cotton were seized at Aix, in transitu from Antwerp to St. Petersburg, and were each found to contain revolvers—so at least it is said.

India.

The overland mail has arrived, bringing dates to July 4th.

Affairs throughout India are tranquil, and trade rather active. Two cotton factories are being erected.

Lamartine's Last Visit to Count D'Orsay.

M. de Lamartine has written, in one of the newspapers, a biographical and obituary notice of the late Duke de Grammont. In it there is an interesting allusion to the late celebrated Count D'Orsay, which a correspondent of the Boston Atlas thus translates:

"One looked in vain among this family procession for the brother of the Duchess de Grammont, ravished a few months before the noon of life from the tender friendship of his sister. The world has not known all it lost in the Count D'Orsay, brother-in-law of the Duke de Grammont. He was known only by the hereditary beauty, by his adventures, by his talents, by his light celebrities, which would have been excused in another, and which possessed eclat only because in himself was born brilliant.

"Woe to those who ruined their faults share the splendor of their nature. M. de Chateaubriand, who has spoken of the Count D'Orsay in his memoirs, has been bitter when he should have been charitable for the impulsiveness of youth and passion. Dante himself does not speak with that harshness of the fate of love, when Francesca de Rimini has spoken, Dante does not condemn, he does not excuse, he does not absolve—he is recited, he pities, he weeps. Naught but a tear should have been given to that youth of D'Orsay. He quitted that youth a man, and the man gave promise of real talents and solid qualities. These natural qualities are less esteemed, we know, than acquired qualities, because they cost no effort; they are certainly less meritorious, but we do not know that they are less amiable.

"Nature has always more grace than volition. All was nature in D'Orsay, and that nature for a moment bowed by excess of wealth, became rigorously straight amid the agitations of misfortune and years. Yet a little while, and France would have cherished in him a child prodigal of his genius. Let those who have not known Count D'Orsay judge him without indulgence and justice, but let his friends (and we were among them) retrace to themselves in his person one of the richest luxuries of nature. The very faults and repentances of his youth made, so to say, a part of the perfections of his manhood. They gave to his still young physiognomy that melancholy which is the increasing shadow of our convictions on our face, as the sun of our life sets in its West; they gave to his mind that intelligent and merciful tolerance which one can better bestow on others, when one has once felt for himself the pleasure and the necessity.

"When during his last and only sickness (a disease of the heart) we visited in his sculptor's studio, in that little museum, changed into a sick chamber that he might breathe his last before the objects of his love, when lying on that bed of repose in the midst of his paintings, his marbles, his drawings, his unfinished busts, he looked like a statue of Antinous, which was uncolored, without losing a line of its beauty in the beams of the sun, on the eve of sinking from the sky, we could not tire of contemplating with a secret tenderness the serenity not to say the splendor of that dying man. He lay under no illusion, he raised illusions to those who loved him, to spare them a premature grief. He would willingly have concealed his last sigh to steal away a pain from his friends, from that sister, from those nieces who were about to weep him forever."

Yellow Fever at Portsmouth and Norfolk.

The pestilence continues its awful ravages in these afflicted places. There is no abatement in the work of death. From the Baltimore American, of the 29th, we take the subjoined sad record:

Dr. J. Morris returned to this city yesterday morning from Norfolk, whither he had been for several days, and represents the condition of the city as deplorable in the extreme. There are more physicians in Norfolk he says than are necessary, but there is a great want of nurses, which it seems impossible to obtain. All the physicians of the city are attending to their business, but there is now no one to direct the affairs of the city, or to enforce sanitary regulations. Mayor Woodis died on Sunday last, which left the city government without a head; there is no quorum of the City Council, or Board of Health, nor is there any one to attend to anything, except the Howard Association, and the whole time of that body is absorbed in distributing food to the population. The scenes witnessed by Dr. Morris, while in Norfolk, he says are indescribable. The stores are all closed, the market houses deserted, and out of a population of twenty thousand, there are only about eight thousand left, of which number there are only three thousand white. Dr. M. visited a family on Sunday last, and found the wife lying in a dying condition on the bed, and the husband with black vomit on the floor, without a friend to attend them, or a nurse to administer the necessary medicine. He made an effort to procure a nurse for them, but could not, and when he left they were both in the agonies of death. During the illness of Mayor Woodis there was not a citizen of Norfolk at his residence, and on the last night of his life two of the physicians remained with him.

In the midst of this distress, those who own vehicles for public use have taken advantage of the times, and refuse to physicians their carriages, except at rates which the Howard Association cannot pay. Dr M. states that the malaria is such that all the people, even those who are apparently healthy, look sallow, and their eyes partake of a yellow hue. There are but few people to be seen in the streets, except those who have charge of the hearses, and the physicians who are constantly going. It is impossible for any one to form any proper idea of the distress which prevails, and even those in comfortable circumstances are obliged to obtain their supplies from the Howard Association, there being no other means of procuring it.

In Portsmouth there are better regulations, the authorities standing at their posts and doing all they can to relieve the afflicted. The city has been divided into seven districts, each of which has its own physicians, and the patients are made more comfortable than in Norfolk. The epidemic rages quite as severely as ever, though it has assumed a less malignant form and yields more readily to medical treatment. The average number of deaths is about twenty per day, and the number of new cases are as great per day as they have been at any time since the epidemic broke out. Dr. M. states that he left because there were more physicians than are needed, but the authorities cannot tell those who are constantly arriving that they require no more medical help. Many of the physicians are young and inexperienced, though they might be very effective as nurses. All the people seem more or less indisposed—the malaria which fills the atmosphere producing a disagreeable fever in the head. There is now no hope of arresting the ravages of the disease, and so thoroughly infected has become the cities that it will continue to rage until dispelled by frost, there being nothing else which can stay its progress.

Egyptian Discoveries.—Mr. John B. Greene, son of an American banker, has succeeded, notwithstanding the difficulties attendant upon clearing away the Palace of Medinet Habou, in discovering the celebrated Egyptian Calendar, of which Champollion could only copy the first lines. A cast of this monument was taken on the spot, by means of a particular kind of composition, photography not reproducing it properly. Different colossal figures, the upper part of which were only visible, have been now cleared away and brought to light; one of them, in excellent preservation, shows the features of Rameses III., and is about nineteen metres high. Mr. Greene, in clearing around this colossus, was able to discover and take drawings of the inscriptions of the pylone or grand portal erected between the two courts; and he has also proved the existence of a pavement in granite which probably covered the whole court, and above which rose a passage which appears to have led into a second court. The excavations of Mr. Greene, which have just completely made known one of the most important edifices of Pharaonic Egypt, will, by the numerous inscriptions which they furnish, throw fresh light on different points of Egyptian philology.—[Boston Post, 21st inst.

Miscellaneous News Items.

We learn from the Charleston Mercury of the 29th inst., that the rice crop in South Carolina promises to be good, and if the weather continues favorable during the period of harvesting, the quality of the rice will be excellent.

Dr. Swearborg and another gentleman, has visited Florida, in the neighborhood of Palatka for the purpose of examining the country, etc., with the object of establishing a number of German families in that section, to cultivate the bear grass, and fiber in the swamps, which is supposed can be cultivated for cordage and sail cloth. The fiber is extolled with the country and its practicability of the enterprise.

The number of deaths in the city of New York during the week ending on the 25th inst., were 565. This shows a decrease of 48, compared with the mortality of the week previous.

We are sorry to announce, says the Concordia Intelligencer of the 31st ult., that some twenty or more cases of yellow fever have occurred at Bartholomew, thirty miles distant, in Catahoula parish, brought thither by the Black River packets, and that four or five deaths have occurred—some carried down to the vicinity of Trinity before death.

The number of deaths in the city of Boston during the week ending on Saturday, the 25th inst., were 125, of which 70 were those of children under five years of age.

The yellow fever is still raging in Norfolk. The Board of Health published a report in the Norfolk Herald of the 27th ult., in which we find the number of deaths which took place in that city on the 24th and 25th ult. On the 24th there were 16 deaths, and on the 25th 17, making a total of 33 in two days.

The Richmond Whig says that cases of yellow fever have appeared in King and Queen, Gloucester and Mathews counties, Va. The persons attacked were from Norfolk or Portsmouth.

We learn from the Norfolk papers that the conduct of the clergy of that city during the present epidemic, is worthy of all praise. They have remained at their posts, doing their duty without fear of contagion, preferring rather to die than desert their flocks.

The Richmond Enquirer, of the 28th ult., states that the contributions in aid of the sufferers at Norfolk and Portsmouth, thus far sent in from different parts of the Union, amount to $48,318. Of this amount the Young Men's Christian Association at Richmond gave $4,500.

Three physicians left Richmond for Norfolk and Portsmouth on the 28th ult., intending to remain there during the prevalence of the epidemic.

A writer in Saturday's National Intelligencer suggests an expedient for staying the ravages of the yellow fever, by the removal of the whole population of Norfolk and Portsmouth to Old Point and the Rip-Raps.

Trenton, N. J., has now a total of 18,810 inhabitants, being an increase of 3,364 over the total of the year 1850, which was 10,445. Of the present total 3,368 are of foreign birth.

Commodore Stewart fell from a pear tree in Philadelphia, on the 24th ult., and was taken up insensible. At last accounts he was alive, though not much improved.

At a meeting of the Can't-Get-Away Club, in Mobile, on the 30th inst., a physician, apothecary and five female nurses were selected to proceed at once to Virginia. Eleven hundred dollars was collected and a much larger amount subscribed, which was doubtless paid in during the next day.

A Mixed Speech.—An excited gentleman recently announced to the Connecticut Legislature a steamboat explosion, as follows: "Sistar Mecker, and ledgers of the membleynature, the Eliver Ollsworth's biled her buster." He was evidently a little confused.

According to the late census, it appears that New York city has a population of 624,170. This shows an increase since 1850 of 108,634, which is less than was anticipated, yet it is large enough to maintain the reputation of New York as a city of rapid growth.

In Tioga, county New York, there is a well which has been in it all the year round. It has been one eleven years. The depth from the surface to the ice is 61 feet. This ice is so thick that it cannot be broken by a heavy weight attached to a cord and dropped down upon it.

In Albany, a city containing only 57,000 inhabitants, the numbers of arrests during the past year was over 5000, or one out of every fourteen of the population. The number of arrests made during the first six months of this year are 2676.

Health of Baton Rouge.—Within the past few days, says the Baton Rouge Comet, of the 31st ult., a number of new cases of fever have occurred, but nearly all seem to be of a milder character than the first few, which spread consternation, and sent our people to foreboding a recurrence of the dark days of '53. From the observation and experience of old residents of the place, who have passed through many seasons of epidemic, we do not hesitate to say, that mild and gentle remedies, and good nursing, will discern nearly every case of its malignity.

The Relief Committee, of the City Council, is doing much good. Our fellow-citizen, James M. Elam, Esq., as Chairman of the Council Committee, is devoting a great portion of his time to visiting the sick. Applications for relief from the City Treasury, should be made to him.

We learn from the Mobile papers that a fire took place at Point Clear, on Thursday last, which entirely destroyed the stables attached to the hotel. By great effort all the horses were rescued. Fortunately, there was little provender in the stables at the time. The cause of the fire had not been ascertained.

James C. Thompson, Esq., of Albany, N. Y., has received the appointment of chief engineer of the Russian navy, and is now in Washington making the necessary arrangements with the Russian minister. The offer is made for three years, at a salary of $6,000 per annum, with house rent free.

In New York the question is not now—since the passage of the liquor law—"Will you drink?" but, "Will you violate?"

Quarantine.—Our town has, says the Woodville (Wilkinson co., Miss.) Republican, at the 28th ult., been placed under strict quarantine regulations, which will be rigidly enforced. We profess to be a hospitable people, but for a month or two we shall have no accommodations, we fear, for strangers who cannot give a good account of themselves—tell clearly and credibly "where have they been, and what they been about."

Steamer Frank Lyon.—The steamer run on the bar just above Vicksburg on the 8th July, where she has been lying high and dry nearly ever since. She floated off yesterday morning, says the Whig of the 8th, with the present rise in the river, and we suppose will soon be in readiness to take on board a load of cotton. The river commenced falling as soon as the boat floated off.

The Baton Rouge Gazette, of the 30th ult., learns that the detachments of U. S. troops, numbering between two and three hundred, under the command of Capt. Jones, was to leave that place on Friday morning, to join their regiment stationed in Arkansas. The Alex Scott will convey them as far as Memphis, from which place it is proposed to take the overland route. These troops have been detained here since the early part of spring, on account of the low stage of water in the upper rivers. Lieut. Stephenson and Asst. Surgeon Anderson accompany the detachment.

We learn that on the 15th inst., at Lake Providence, La., Wesley Pennington was shot and instantly killed by Alfred Jones, son of R. P. Jones. Young Jones was arrested; but subsequently effected his escape. The difficulty originated in a billiard room.

Branson, Miss.—The quarantine regulations of Brandon are very strict. They do not even allow passengers on the railroad to take the stage and pass on through.

Speaking of the yellow fever in Vicksburg, the Jackson (Miss.) Mercury, of the 28th says: "No case has as yet occurred in Jackson. A strict quarantine is enforced; and we trust our town may escape another visitation. Our friends in the country should pay no attention to idle rumors. If the fever should appear here, we shall promptly announce the first case."

In consequence of the fever at Vicksburg, the Natchez city council have revoked the permission they gave to descending packets to stop at the landing under the hill for cotton and passengers. The roads leading to the interior, as well as the river landings, are all strictly guarded night and day, by vigilant officers. As yet, not a single case of yellow fever has been officially reported in Natchez.

The Franklin Planters' Banner, of the 30th, says it has heard of no new cases of yellow fever in the Parish of St. Mary.

Horace Greeley, of the New York Tribune, went to a dance-house in London, and describes the sight after this manner:

I endured the spectacle of men dancing with women whom neither is my soul and stocking; but at last the sight of a dark and by no means elegant mulatto waltzing with a fleecy looking white girl, while pulling away at a cigar he had just stolen, proved too much for my Yankee prejudices, and I started.

Where is Mr Greeley's consistency? Has he forgotten what a fuss he made about a negro being ejected from an omnibus some time since.

We clip the subjoined from the Alexandria Democrat of the 29th ult.:

We have had heavy showers of rain within the last few days. Injurious to cotton in general, which is but open; they have been beneficial to cane which is backward for the season. The sugar crop here will be very short.

A letter from Morganza, Pointe Coupee, received in Plaquemine on the 31st, says: "We are very much frightened about yellow fever. Col. Morgan has had a number of cases here slightly. It is shrewdly conjectured that the cadet-Hungarian Mexicans" who are here, who, it is known, are expected to take up their abode here for the present.

There were only sixteen interments in the city of Savannah during the week ending on the 30th ult.

The total number of deaths in Norfolk, on the 23d and 27th ult., was 26 among a falling off in two days of 17, though it is supposed the want of material is the cause of the decrease.

We learn from the Mobile papers that it is there rumored that Mr. Geo. F. Smith, ex-Treasurer of the Tennessee Company is to be removed from his post. This seems to cause great dissatisfaction.

Mobile appears to be remarkably healthy, at present, there was only eighteen deaths during the week ending on the 1st September.

We learn from the Elyton Central Alabamian that a gentleman of Jefferson county raised, last fall, twenty-seven bushels of wheat on fifty acres of land, and lately threshed out and measured, as the product of said fifty acres of land, eight hundred bushels of good wheat, which he sold at sixty-five cents per bushel. We consider this hard to beat.

The citizens of Charleston are certainly enjoying the blessing of health this season. There have been but two cases of sickness at the Marine Hospital of that city, since the beginning of warm weather, which shows an extraordinary state of health.

Mr. Browne, manager of the agricultural division of the Patent Office, goes to Europe in the steamer of the 8th September, for the purpose of obtaining seeds of the different kinds of European plants which are not to be found in the United States. We wish him all success, for his mission is an important one.

We learn from the Charleston Mercury that the steamer Florida has been purchased by Messrs. E. C. Rogers & Co., of this city, who intend placing her in their line of New Orleans and Key West packets.

A convention of the citizens of Massachusetts opposed to all unconstitutional and fanatical laws, and particularly to the Maine Liquor Law, was to be held at Worcester on the 30th ult.

The New Orleans Christian Advocate.

ANNUAL COMMERCIAL STATEMENT,

For the Year ending September 1, 1855.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE OFFICE,
Saturday Morning, September 1, 1855.

The Commercial Year ending this day, has been more remarkable for high prices, than with regard to the amount of business done in our market. In the latter respect it may not have fallen much behind previous years of average crops, but a review of its leading features develops no marks of that improvement for which we naturally look in the statistics of an American seaport. The navigation of the Ohio River, and of the lower tributaries of the Mississippi, has been obstructed to an unusual extent during the year, and thus greater restrictions have been placed upon our commerce with the great Western Valley, and even with the sections producing our southern staples, than we have had reason to complain of for some years past, greatly as the evil has been felt heretofore. The losses suffered by New Orleans from this cause during the last year have been very large. They are not, however, confined to the past, but extend to the future, involving as they do, the opening of new channels of trade, or of widening and deepening old ones, between the interior and those seaports and markets which long ago recognized the importance of artificial means of communication with the producing regions of the West and South. The enterprise of our rivals, directed by efficient managers, and consequently favored with the ample use of capital, has extended their railroads in all directions that offer commercial advantages, and it is daily tapping the resources of the trade which naturally belongs to New Orleans. In the mean time our Great Northern Railroad comes to nearly a "dead lock" at the State line! The cities of Charleston and Savannah are obtaining large returns for their investment in public improvements, and are now becoming exporters of breadstuffs, besides augmenting very largely their business in the great southern staple. The following table compares the receipts each year of Cotton at Charleston, Savannah and New Orleans, with the total crop, during the last four years:

	1851-'52. BALES.	1852-'53. BALES.	1853-'54. BALES.	1854-'55. BALES.
Charleston	467,047	450,162	413,176	501,754
Savannah	368,444	341,657	314,473	396,660
New Orleans	1,429,163	1,664,864	1,440,779	1,997,085
Total crop	2,416,500	3,262,500	2,930,000	2,995,493

From this it will be seen that the receipts of this staple at Charleston during the year just closed har exceeded those of the previous year over 21 per cent., and at Savannah the increase is nearly 23 per cent., while in New Orleans there is a decrease of 462,544 bales, or over 10 per cent. A large amount than this has probably been detained by the low stage of water in the Red, Arkansas and Washita rivers.

The receipts of several of the leading articles of Western Produce at this port during the year, show a large falling off, when compared with those of last year. In Flour this decrease amounts to 109,000 bbls, in Corn more than half a million sacks, and in Wheat 120,000 sacks. In Provisions, on the other hand, notwithstanding the falling off in the Hog crop, there has been an increase of receipts equivalent to some 30,000 bbls of Pork. The Sugar crop in this State, as will be seen under the heading of that staple, has been more than 100,000 hhds short of the product of 1853-'54, and the receipts here show a corresponding diminution.

The following table exhibits the receipts and exports of the principal articles of Southern and Western Produce during the past year, compared with the year before:

	RECEIPTS. 1854-55	1853-54	EXPORTS. 1854-55	1853-54

COTTON—We estimate the Cotton crop of the year 1854-'55 at 2,995,493 bales, of which 1,997,085 bales have been received at this port, including 27,187 bales from Mobile, and ports in Florida and Texas. The exports of the year embrace 1,274,029 bales, including 716,990 to Great Britain; 170,146 to France; 44,061 to the North of Europe; 140,135 to other foreign ports, and 202,695 to domestic ports North. The stock remaining on hand last evening, including all in presses and pickeries, and on shipboard not cleared, was 60,037 bales. The total receipts last year at this port were 1,413,677 bales, including 26,899 from Mobile, Florida and Texas. The exports last year embraced 1,426,573 bales, comprising 774,128 to Great Britain; 191,316 to France; 142,978 to the North of Europe; 136,504 to other foreign ports, and 191,646 to Northern domestic ports. The stock on hand on the first of September, 1854, was 26,079 bales. The decrease in the receipts this year thus proves to be 122,780 bales, and in the exports 99,996 bales to Great Britain; 32,170 to France; 38,338 to the North of Europe; 32,504 to other foreign ports, and an increase coastwise of 11,858 making a total decrease in exports of 152,544 bales.

The following table exhibits the receipts and exports of Cotton at New Orleans each year for twenty years:

The editor of the Economist remarks:

This table of British consumption of course includes cotton from all sources, but the quantity consumed in both countries in 1845 was equal to 33 per cent. of the United States crop. In 1854, a year of general depression and very high prices for food, the two countries consumed equal to 41 per cent. of the United States crop. In 1853, which was the large crop year, the two countries used 39 per cent. of the crop. The figures for United States consumption embrace only the quantities taken from the ports. The general result is that under very unfavorable circumstances, was and famine, in the consumption of the two countries is overtaking the production, notwithstanding that that production is stimulated by continued high prices for the raw material. The first months of the year 1855, show depression in the trade, after more than a year of high prices for money and feed, but the promise is now fair of good harvests, that will reduce the prices of food, at a time when money will have become very abundant, and restored peace have induced the disposition to use it.

It is a remarkable feature of the war, that the demand for English goods in the Levant and those countries where the large war expenditure has taken place, is very great. The cotton goods sent thither reach eighty-seven millions, against twenty-eight million yards last year, and the effect of the introduction of those goods in those quarters it is anticipated will be permanent.

The following is the Liverpool Cotton statement for the year endlog 1rt of January, 1855:

1847	974,067	358,716	1,332,707

The exports from Great Britain in 1854 were 318,400 bales, against 292,800 the year before. The total consumption was 1,940,227 in 1854, including 1,626,539 American. The stock on hand in all the ports of Great Britain on the first of January, 1855, was 624,450 bales, against 717,860 in 1854; 657,520 in 1853; and 484,500 in 1852.

Our latest advices from Liverpool are to the 18th of August. They report a good demand for Cotton, with sales during the week of 80,000 bales, of which 20,000 were taken for speculation. Prices are quoted ⅛@¼d. higher than at the close of the previous week, and closed at 7¼d for Fair Orleans; 6 7-16 for Middling Orleans; 6¾c for Fair Uplands, and 6¼d for Middling Uplands. The stock of American Cotton in Liverpool on the 18th ult. was stated at 385,000 bales.

Our Commercial Year opened with a moderate demand in the Cotton market and a degree of irregularity in prices—Middling ranging at 7¾@8⅛c ₱ lb. The tendency was slightly upward during September and October, and about the middle of the latter month was quoted Middling at 8¼@8c. The fluctuations were slight until the middle of November, when a downward movement commenced, and the rates gave way about one cent during the next five weeks. They recovered partially in the latter part of December, but fell off again to 7@8c for Middling in the middle of January. At the beginning of February our quotations for Middling were 7¼@8¼c, then falling to 7¼@8¾c, the changes were slight until the latter part of March, when the rates were 8¼@8¾c. The market continued to improve throughout April and May, and until the middle of June, an advance being established, during that period of more than 3c ₱ lb. For about two weeks in June we quoted Middling at the wide range of 10¾@16c. Good Middling at 12¾@13, and Fair at 14c, and upward. This was the highest point reached during the year, and was maintained but a short time. In the last of June Middling was quoted at 9¾@10¾, and in the next week the price fell off to 9@9¾c. It subsequently rallied, and in the middle of July rose to 9¾@10¾c, then fell off again to 9@9¾, and then advanced ¼c, which was lost about the middle of August, and the market closed last evening, at the following range of quotations for all qualities of the New crop:

NEW ORLEANS CLASSIFICATION.

Inferior	6¾@7¼	Middling Fair	10@10¾
Ordinary	7¼@8¼	Fair	10¾@11¼
Middling	8¼@9¼	Good Fair	—@—
Good Middling	9¼@9¾	Good and Fine	—@—

The sales of the past week have embraced 11,000 bales, including 3000 on Saturday and Monday together 2500 on Tuesday; 1500 on Wednesday; 1000 on Thursday, and 1000 yesterday.

The range and fluctuations of prices in New Orleans will be shown at length by the subjoined tables. The first of which exhibits the rates at the beginning of each week for the year just closed, and the next those of the preceding year:

Our Tobacco market opened in September last with a limited demand and a heavy stock, though the latter was some 4500 hhds less than that on hand September 1, 1853. Holders, however, relying upon the moderate promise of the new crop, exhibited no anxiety to sell, and few of them were willing to make concessions of sufficient importance to induce buyers to operate to any considerable extent. As the season advanced, prices gradually advanced, until in May, an advance of 2c ₱ lb was established. During that month and a portion of June the rates continued firm, but in July the market was extremely heavy, and in the latter part of the month prices fell back about 1c ₱ lb. During August some sales have been made at a further reduction of ½@¾c. The market has been quite dull during the past week, and we heard of only about 300 hhds sold, including 47 hhds, a medium lot of Admitted and Refused, at 7 3-16c round, 10 at 6@7c 12 at 8¾, 3 at 0, 2 Selected at 12, 26 Clarksville, Old crop, at 9¾, 4 at 7¾, 6 Selections at 8c ₱ lb, and the residue on private terms. Our quotations, as below, are now entirely nominal:

SUGAR—The receipts of Sugar during the past year have been 129,217 hhds, against 272,084 the preceding year, and 180,217 the year before. The exports embrace 148,922 hhds, against 159,370 in 1853-'54, and 99,117 in 1852-'53.

The crop of Sugar in Louisiana for the year 1854-'55, is stated by Mr. Champomier, in his last annual report at 946,636 hhds, produced in the following parishes:

PARISHES.	Sugar Houses.	Hhds. of Sugar.
Rapides	40	10,134

Making the total crop		hhds 340,630

Of which are 292,333 hhds Brown Sugar, made by the old process, and 54,302 Refined, Clarified, etc. The weight of the crop is estimated at 345,227,000 lb. Last year the crop was stated at 449,324 hhds, or about 405,166,000 lb. The decrease this year thus appears to be 102,689 hhds, or about 107,939,000 lb.

The number of sugar-houses by which this year's crop has been produced is stated by Mr. Champomier at 1338, of which 648 were worked by steam and 390 by horse power. Last year the number of sugar-houses was 1437, of which 950 employed steam and 481 horse power. The average quality of this year's crop has been much higher than that of last.

Mr. Champomier makes the Texas crop for the past year only 7013 hhds, against 8285 the previous year.

The crop of Sugar in Louisiana each year during the last twenty years, was as follows:

Year.	Hhds	Year.	Hhds.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

REV. WM. H. TURNLEY.

...d at his house, on Little River, in Cata... parish, La, August 23, 1855, Rev. Wm. TURNLEY, a member of the Louisiana ...ference, aged 50 years, 7 months and 15 ...

...is death was caused by bronchitis, a dis... he had labored under for years. It is ...ble that this disease extended to his ... and thereby occasioned his death.

...the 7th inst., previous to his death, he ...ed on the latter paragraph of the 25th ...er of St. Matthew, which we believe ...his public labors. He was taken very ...Friday before his death, and suffered ...during seven days, when his happy ...took its flight.

...was not sensible of any local pain, but ...ed much from (as he expressed it) a ...ked feeling.

...murmured not at his afflictions, but ...ed all the while to be possessed of a ...of unusual kindness, love, patience and ...gation.

...said nothing of his future prospects ...ing his illness, being most of the time out ...right mind; but we have no cause to ...t. Jud ging from his godly walk, the ...inder: to future happiness, his incessant ...d natiring efforts for the preservation ...Master's kingdom; we cannot but say ...wearing the long fought for crown.

...We not know the minister who seems ...better qualified for an itinerant than ...Wm. H. Turnley. Not lacking of talent ...faithfulness to duty, religion was his ...and he taught it from the pulpit, and ...house to house. He seemed peculiarly ...ted for the instruction of children—a ...he never neglected; while the aged ...conversed with him without instruc... Though he was not possessed of great ...ary attainments, he had his mind well ...ed with a stock of general knowledge, so ...he was not out of his place while among ...men. Nevertheless, he would sit, as it ..., at the feet of the most simple.

...It was a living rebuke to arroganoy—a humble and never aspiring save for the ...ation he now enjoys—a saint with God.

...He was a minister that was much persecu... from the cause of his plain and heart ...ching discourses; but it seemed to afford a great pleasure to know that his persecu... arose from formalists and wicked peo... and never from the truly pious.

...Stung with his keen reproofs, the wicked ...ld often rail against him; but he bore ...r insults with grace and Christian forti..., never returning evil for evil or railing ...railing. His friends loved and respected ...; his one foe dreaded him, because they ...ld never unhinge his temper, and he ...ded with effect the "sword of the Spirit."

...Long was he known to the writer, even ...m my childhood, and therefore I know ...reof I speak, when I say he was truly a ...od man and an humble follower of his ...aster. To say that he never erred, would ...e saying too much; but to say that his er... were as few and far between as those of ...y man I ever knew, is the truth.

...Not long since, while in social conversa..., we heard him remark, in substance, as ...llows: "It is usually the case that as per... grow older, they become irritable, but I ...n of giving that it may be the opposite in ...y case—that I may be more mild and ...even-minded as I advance in age."

...Such was the aim of this man of God—..., as he neared the tomb, he might become ...re imbued with the Spirit of Christ, and ...e better prepared for mansions on high ...when life's slender thread should be broken.

...In the death of Bro. Turnley the commu...ity has lost a friend, the Church one of her ...ablest ministers, and his helpless family, con...sisting of his wife and seven children, an affectionate husband and father. But in the midst of our sorrow and loss, let us rejoice that he rests from his labors and his works ...follow him."

"Servant of God, well done,
Rest from thy loved employ,
The battle fought, the victory won,
Enter thy Master's joy."

We have not writen this brief and imperfect sketch of our loved friend and father in the gospel to supercede the necessity of a more extended one of his life and labors. We hope some one having the facts of his early history will prepare a more extended sketch of his life and labors.

Louisiana, Aug. 25, 1855. URIAH RILEY.

REV. THOMAS H. FOSTER.

...rious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His Saints."

...Died, at the residence of James M. Elam, ..., Baton Rouge, on Monday, September 3, ...5, at 6 o'clock P. M., Rev. THOS. H. FOS..., a native of Monroe county, Ala., in the ...year of his age, and the eighth of his ministry.

...When a faithful servant of Christ is called to his rest while yet in the vigor of manhood and in the midst of usefulness, we can...ot should lament that the faithful are de...ished from the earth, that the ranks of ...ministry are vacated, and that society and kindred have been bereaved of their choicest ornaments, and of the objects of their affections.

But looking beyond the vale of tears to the bright mansions above, our sorrow is turned into joy, and our tears to gladness, that the beloved friend and associate whose loss we mourn was not taken by surprise, nor terrified at the approach of the stern messenger death. Surrounded by pestilence and death, he had determined upon remaining faithful at his post, and, as he said to the writer, of this, eight days before his death, he wished if he died to die with a good conscience, and not be found lying from duty. And so it was with him. From the bedside of the sick whom he was visiting he went to his own couch, from which he never again rose.

It was the writer's privilege to be with him at times during his illness, and especially at its close; and to have his own faith strengthened by his steadfast reliance upon the sweet promises of the gospel to the last moment. "I am not afraid to die," he said. Jesus was with him to comfort and sustain him. Calmly and resignedly he took leave of the beloved partner of his bosom, and their sweet infant child. Words of Christian exhortation were addressed to the surrounding friends and attendants. Prayer and praise employed his lips and tongue almost to the last, and when those members failed to do their office, his voice yet mingled with the hymns sung at his bedside, until those feeble notes were changed for the triumphant song of praise and glory in the Immediate presence of the saints in bliss.

The writer had known him only since his residence here, from February last, but was soon drawn towards him by the feeling of Christian sympathy and the true catholic spirit which seemed to animate him. "We are all one," said he, with emphasis, as we mingled our prayers together a short time before his departure; and the thought seemed to afford him much pleasure.

In view of my brief acquaintance with the subject of this notice and of the closing events of his life, I am constrained to say, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his."

His remains were followed to the grave by a large number of sorrowing friends and the bereaved members of his flock; among whom were conspicuous the colored people of his charge, to whose welfare he was much devoted, and who were correspondingly attached to him.

The Odd Fellows' Lodge, of which he was a member, rendered their last honors to his memory; and the burial service of the Episcopal Church, said by its minister, who prepared this notice at the suggestion of the friends of the deceased.

Baton Rouge, Sept. 0, 1855.

CLERICAL ZEAL.

Awhile ago, a party of British travelers, among whom there were no less than three prosperous clergymen of the Church of England, were making a long passage through the desert, from Cairo to Jerusalem. They followed on the track of the Israelites, as they believed, and on week days they read, and consulted, and explored, and were full of interest about that sacred old history. On Sundays they stopped, for at least half the day, to have service in the largest of the tents. On the first Sunday one of the clergymen preached a sermon, old, and wholly irrelevant—subtle, and yet superficial—abstract, and yet anything but elevating. There was not a word in the discourse, nor a tone in the preacher which met the real desire of every heart present for some reference to the place and circumstances in which they were. On the next Sunday, the two other divines excused themselves from preaching, on the ground that they had no sermons with them. "Can't you speak to us?" asked one of the laity. "In such a place as this, have you nothing to say to us that our hearts are thirsting to hear?" The cold reply was, that extempore preaching is not allowed by the Church of England; and that it was impossible to write a sermon in the desert. Yet this same man wrote an ample journal; and the party were not a congregation, but a tenful of comrades—a family, as it were, in the desert. The former preacher read again the old sermon; and so he did, for the same reasons, on a third Sunday.

SLOW BUT SURE.—During the anniversary week in New York, a meeting was held to promote Church Extension among the Dutch Reformed. Dr. Bethune, one of their most distinguished and eloquent divines, made an address. Among other things, he strongly urged the necessity of spreading the Dutch Church. Although everything else in this country grows rapidly, he felt the truth conveyed in a remark of a satirical friend who said he was always reminded of the Dutch Church, by a line in one of her hymns:

"Tremendous as a host she moves,
Majestically slow!"

Truth is always consistent with itself, and needs nothing to help it out. It is always near at hand, and sits upon our lips, and is ready to drop out before we are aware; whereas a lie is troublesome, and sets a man's invention upon the rack; and one trick needs a good many more to make it good.

THE CHURCH AND HER CHILDREN.

One of the most interesting problems now before our denomination, and pressing upon us for solution, is that which regards the relation of baptized children to the Church. Upon this subject our practice has long been at variance with our theory, and we are pleased to see, in the present discussion of this great question, the promise of a better order of things. But our denomination is not the only one at fault here. We know of no other that has met the question as it should have done, and made that provision for the spiritual culture of its children which their moral exigencies demand, and which the Bible obligates us to secure.

The Westminster Confession of Faith, which represents the theological views of a large class of persons in this country, holds the following language in relation to children: "Elect infants, dying in infancy, are regenerated and saved by Christ through the Spirit, who worketh when, and where, and how he pleaseth. So also are all other elect persons, who are incapable of being outwardly called by the ministry of the world."—Chapter x, § 3.

This passage is sufficiently indefinite to allow of two constructions, which shape the views of different parties in the several Churches receiving the Calvinistic creed. The first is: that a portion of the human family including some "infants dying in infancy" are elect, and consequently "some infants dying in infancy" are non-elect, and lost. The second is: that all "infants dying in infancy" are among the elect, and therefore saved. The particular consideration of these views would involve the discussion of the doctrine of election as held by the Calvinists. That is foreign to our present purpose.

Among the Baptists, those who do not hold to either of the above views, regard the question of infant salvation as unsettled and one on which we have no data for reasoning. Dr. Carson who represents the views of no small number of Baptists in this country as well as England, says: "The Gospel has nothing to do with infants, nor have gospel ordinances any respect to them. The Gospel has to do with those that hear it. It is good news; but to infants it is no news at all. The salvation of the Gospel is as much confined to believers, as the baptism of the gospel is. None can be saved by the Gospel who do not believe it. Consequently by the Gospel no infant can be saved." (Baptism in its mode and subjects, p. 173.) According to this reasoning, there is no ground for believing in the salvation of the little ones taken from our arms and hearthsides in infancy. We may believe they are pillowed on the bosom of Almighty love, but it will be rather because we desire it, than of any assurance we have of its truth. Thank God! we have not so learnt the Scriptures. We believe the salvation of infants is as really a matter of revelation as the salvation of adults. Nor would our Baptist friends believe the above if not compelled to do so by the trammels of a preconceived creed.

In consequence of the above views, the Calvinistic Churches practically throw off their children; they are not regarded as coming within the scope of Gospel means until after reaching the age of accountability—an indefinite point somewhere in the course of their lives. Up to this time their characters are forming for good or evil; not a word salutes their ears, not an not meets their eyes, but gives its hue and complexion to their minds or morals; yet of all this the Church is practically regardless, and leaves to other hands (except so far as Sunday Schools may exert an influence) the work of training them up in "the nurture and admonition of the Lord."

In the Protestant Episcopal Church there is some diversity of opinion on the subject of infant salvation, rather as to the mode than as to the fact. A very large portion of this Church—the high Church party—believe in baptismal regeneration, which would evidently make their salvability conditional upon their baptism.* The language of the Prayer Book clearly favors the view of this party. In the Catechism, to be learned before confirmation, we find the following questions and answers:

"Q. What is your name?"

"A. N, or M."

"Q. Who are you this name?"

"A. My sponsors in baptism; wherein I was made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven."

In a Catechism, published by "the Sunday School Union of the Protestant Episcopal Church," it is explicitly declared that before baptism the child belongs to the family of Satan. This makes the salvation of the child conditional upon its baptism—a doctrine we denounce as utterly unscriptural.

But a very large number in the Protestant Episcopal Church deny baptismal regeneration, with all its concomitants, and hold a Scriptural view of the relation of children to the Church, but the Church itself takes no special action to secure the spiritual culture of her children, beyond the Sunday-school and a few catechetical exercises previous to confirmation.

The other orthodox Churches severally hold one or other of the above views, or that which we shall attempt, in a subsequent paper, to deduce from the Scriptures. But whatever be their opinions, they all, like ourselves, come short in practice, and this very diversity of opinion and practice on this subject, among evangelical denominations, as well as the great interests involved, will, we hope, lead to an earnest and thorough discussion of the question, and the settlement of a more uniform and consistent course of action.

D.

* We hold the doctrine of baptismal regeneration. The baptized infant is, with us, a member of Christ, a child of God, an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven. And this be is made by a sacrament—a mysterious and inscrutable means of conveying God's grace, the regenerating influence of the Holy Spirit. And this is no figure, no metaphor embodied in action, no type, no bare symbol, no signifying that which may be, or may be not; no Jewish sacrament, as Timothy Dwight would make it—but a saving ordinance, a reality tenfold more real than any phenomenon that is presented to us in type, or yet in space.—N. Y. Churchman.

PREACHING.

If a man had anything in him, anything to impart, really worth knowing, anything to contribute to the stock of human knowledge or human happiness, how glorious an opportunity would he consider that he possessed of doing justice to his convictions, and disseminating his opinions, if he had the exclusive audience for two half hours one day in every seven, of an intelligent assembly which has set apart that day from the cares of the world and devoted itself to the quiet contemplation of its temporal and spiritual interest! What would Mr. Robert Owen give for such an opportunity of proving the perfectibility of man—what would M. Louis Blanc give for such a chance of proving the principles of socialism—what would a Birmingham political economist give for such an occasion of finally and clearly establishing the philosopher's stone in the shape of the little shilling! Our tables and our waste-baskets groan under the weight of circulars and pamplets from misapprehended geniuses, who are bursting with instruction which the world will not listen to, and discoveries by which it will not profit, while that very hearing which we refuse to them we patiently accord as a matter of duty to any one who may happen to occupy the pulpit of our parish church. It is not common among the clergy to undervalue the dignity of their sacred office, but we really think they are at this moment fairly obnoxious to the reproach levelled against them by Archdeacon Sinclair, of under-estimating the vast opportunity for good which they enjoy, but fail adequately to employ every Sunday morning and evening. Man is, after all, a thinking and reasoning creature, and there is something in his mind that never fails to respond to the hand that touches aright the chords of that wonderfully attuned instrument. If the clergy preach to inattentive audiences—if people leave the church with little notion of the sermon that has been addressed to them—if it has become fashionable, as Archdeacon Sinclair complains, to praise short sermons for their shortness—the fault, rely on it, is not in the audience, who are always willing to be interested and excited—the fault is in the speaker himself. For, in the first place, the church needs administrative reform as much as any other department. Care is taken that our preachers should understand the dead languages, but no trouble is ever taken to see that they are men capable of stirring the feelings, convincing the reason, or awakening the conscience of living men. Their own language, that in which they speak and read, is sure to be the last to the structure and literature of which their education has directed attention, and no Bishop, in ordaining a clergyman, ever seems to consider whether he possesses command of language and readiness of expression. And yet for men whose principal utility consists in the bold they can take of the ear of their audience, who are nothing if not persuasive and convincing, there is no qualification so important—indeed so absolutely necessary. Watch the poorest sputter at a public meeting, and see how a man ill educated in general, and probably ill-informed on the subject on which he speaks, possessing neither fluency nor correctness of language, can still, by adapting himself to the comprehension of his audience, stirring their feelings, and looking at matters from their point of view, beguile them of their sympathy, their applause, and their assent? Why cannot the clergy do this? There are many reasons, but one must strike everybody—there is a great gulf between them and their audience, an imperfect sympathy, a totally dissimilar point of view.—London Times.

WITNESS OF THE SPIRIT.

"How," says the Rev. John Wesley, in his first sermon on Romans 8: 16, "does God's Spirit bear witness with our Spirit that we are the children of God?" It is hard to find words in the language of men to explain the deep things of God. Indeed, there are none that will adequately express what the children of God experience. But perhaps, one might say, (desiring any one who are taught of God to correct, to soften, or strengthen the expression,) the testimony of the Spirit is an inward impression on the soul, whereby the Spirit of God directly witnesses to my Spirit, that I am a child of God; that Jesus Christ hath loved me, and given himself for me; and that all my sins are blotted out; and I, even I am reconciled to God. "I do not mean," observes Mr. Wesley in another place, "that God testifies this" (the believer's adoption) "by an outward voice: no, nor always by an inward voice, although he may do this sometimes. Neither do I suppose that he always applies to the heart, though he often may, one or more texts of Scripture. But he so works upon the soul, by his immediate influence and by a strong though inexplicable operation, that the stormy wind and troubled waves subside, and there is a sweet calm. The heart rests in the arms of Jesus; and the sinner is clearly satisfied that God is reconciled."

MANSFIELD AND ITS SCHOOLS.

Mansfield is the County House site of De Soto parish. This parish, with Caddo on the north, and Sabine and the major part of Natchitoches on the south, cover an unbroken body of country, well settled, lying between Red River and Texas line. Extending from the Arkansas line or lakes above, to the sterile, long-straw pine regions below. The access to Mansfield from the alluvion, or immediate bottom lands of Red River, is as easy as from thence to any other inland point. At the period in which vacation is fixed, there will rarely, if ever, be any inconvenience in crossing the bottom. This will naturally place the school convenient to the river country, but also to all the country over east. East Texas will find nothing to obstruct the travel to this place, and we are persuaded, that when they have ascertained all things relative to the case, they will find it much to their advantage to educate their daughters in this institution.

Mansfield is located on well elevated ground, 15 miles from the river, or any overflowed lands, with heavy intermediate forests. The surrounding country, undulating, diversified by frequent small bayous, with branches, leaving it in the warm season free from sloughs and stagnant waters, to infect the atmosphere. In the immediate vicinity of Mansfield, the soil is thin.

The population is about 1000. Society compares well with the best communities in this half of our State. Our citizens are generally awake to the importance of a high moral tone to society, and are laboring steadily for this end.
